The amendment was read, as follows:

Page twenty-seven, line six hundred and forty-five, insert:

For purchasing for the use of the State Department one hundred copies of Little and Brown's edition of the United States Statutes at Large, and the same number of the pamphlet laws of the Thirty-Third Congress, $3,537."

Mr. STANTON. It is possible that I may have allowed the place to be passed by in which this amendment would more properly come in; but it is perhaps quite as well here as anywhere else.

The Secretary of State addressed to me a letter, some time since, in which he states that, in consequence of casualties by fire to the offices for which those books are to be supplied, it is necessary to furnish one hundred additional copies.

Mr. HOUSTON. I must object to going back, and offering amendments to parts of the bill which we have passed. If we do so, there is no telling when we shall get through with the bill.

Mr. STANTON. I do not propose to go back.

Mr. HOUSTON. But we have already passed the part of the bill in reference to the State Department.

Mr. STANTON. This is an amendment to provide for the purchase of books for their use; and I presume it is perfectly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would remark that it would have been more regular at an earlier stage of the bill; but he will still hold it to be in order now.

Mr. STANTON. The Secretary of State asks for a small appropriation for the purchase of books, to supply the place of those which have been burnt, and which are necessary for offices to be furnished, and offices which have been recently erected. It seems to me it would be a very technical objection to say that this is not the proper place to insert the appropriation.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman may suppose what he pleases about technicalities; but if he expects me to consent to go back in this bill to insert appropriations, he will find himself mistaken. If he had been present, and attended to the bill, he would have had no difficulty in offering his amendment at the proper place. The Chairman has, however, ruled this amendment to be in order, and I have nothing further to say.

Mr. STANTON. Then I shall have nothing further to say. I ask that the communication from the Secretary of State may be read.

The following letter was then read:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
WASHINGTON, May 25, 1854. }

SIR: I have to request that an appropriation be made by Congress of $3,500, for the purchase of one hundred copies of Little & Brown's edition of the United States Statutes at Large.

It has become necessary to procure an additional supply of that work, partly in consequence of the losses occasioned in different parts of the country by fire, and partly by an increase of the number of officers of the Government, who are, by existing laws, entitled to receive the work from this Department.

An additional supply of one hundred copies of the pamphlet laws of the Thirty-Third Congress will also be required for distribution, rendering necessary an appropriation of seventy-five dollars.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. L. MARCY.

Hon. F. P. STANTON, Chairman Judiciary Committee,
House of Representatives.

The question was taken, and the amendment adopted.

Mr. PHELPS moved to amend in the six hundred and forty-second line by striking out "$9,000" and inserting "$9,400;" so that the paragraph, as amended, would read:

For compensation of the district attorneys, $9,400.

Mr. P. said: I move this increase in order to embrace the district attorneys for the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PHELPS. I move, for the same reason, to increase the appropriation in the next paragraph from $7,800 to $8,200, in order to embrace the marshals for the same Territories.

The paragraph, as amended, would read:

For compensation of the marshals, $8,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRUM. I move to amend by adding, at the end of the following paragraph:

For annuities and grants, $750,

—the words:

And that the eighth section of the act of Congress approved the 3d March, 1853, entitled "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th of June, 1854," be, and the same is hereby, revived and continued in force.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that that was a usual provision when there were temporary clerks in the Treasury Department. There are not such clerks, however, now. The classification which was provided for last year has dispensed with all the temporary clerks in the Treasury Department, with the exception of the Third Auditor's office, and they are provided for in the bill in another place. The amendment of the gentleman is therefore unnecessary. The classification made two years ago dispensed with all the temporary clerkships, and there are none now legally in existence.

Mr. DRUM. All I can say in reply is, that the act of 1842, creating these temporary clerkships, was revived in 1846, and again in 1853; and that the Secretary of the Interior and the Fourth Auditor recommend that it be again revived. If the matter be provided for in another part of the bill, as the gentleman from Alabama says that it is, I shall press my amendment no further.

Mr. HOUSTON. I spoke of the clerks in the Third Auditor's office. The temporary clerkships are all dispensed with, excepting those in the Third Auditor's office, which are given for the purpose of examining the rolls connected with the bounty land laws. The temporary force in the Pension office was discharged a few days ago, and a few additional permanent clerks substituted. The law of 1853 requires that the Treasury Department shall have a certain number of clerks. It takes up the Second, Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Auditor's office—all the Auditor's offices—classifies the clerks, and provides expressly that these offices shall have only the clerks specified therein. In this view of the case I make a point of order on the gentleman's amendment. There is no law for it; really it is against law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, on the ground that the amendment proposes a change of a general law. We are now considering an appropriation bill into which nothing can come in order but appropriations under laws, and directions for their disbursement.

Mr. PRESTON. After the heading "custom-houses," insert as follows:

For completing the custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000.

For completing the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000.

For completing the custom-house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000.

For completing the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000.

For completing the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000.

For completing the custom house, Bath, Maine, $20,000.

For completing the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000.

To purchase a site for custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $24,000.

Mr. PRESTON. I dislike to trouble the House again with this amendment for the custom-houses, for they are old acquaintances, every one of which has been approved by this body upon the yeas and nays during this session; but I desire to recall to its memory the reason assigned by the Committee of Ways and Means for resisting the insertion of these appropriations in the deficiency bill.

When that was under consideration, they said that these appropriations should not be ingrafted as amendments upon it, but that it was proper they should be contained in a separate bill. The Committee of Ways and Means having, through its chairman, engineered the original bill until it was defeated, a younger member was authorized to report a second bill, accompanied by another providing separately for the custom-houses, and in this manner succeeded in getting through the last deficiency bill. The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PHELPS,] seduced by this proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] together with some other of our friends, acted with this hope; and the consequence was, that we lost the custom-houses, which we had previously carried separately by ten or twelve votes. Now, the Committee of Ways and Means again tell us not to be impatient, and we will reach the separate bill for the custom-houses, which they have reported in the regular course of parliamentary resurrection. For my own part, I believe it a desperate hope. If we entertain it we will again be disappointed, and merit to be laughed at. I have seen a ludicrous out in one of Hood's works, of a fellow riding a donkey, who is seated so near his tail that there is barely room for himself, but laughingly invites a weary traveler to get up behind. [Laughter.]

The appropriations asked for the custom-houses in this amendment are in conformity with the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury; they have been approved by this House each upon separate votes upon yeas and nays; they have met the sanction of the Senate, who ingrafted them upon the deficiency bill, and the only reason urged by the committee against that course was that it was not the appropriate bill to provide for them. The objection cannot now apply. Last year the custom-house appropriations were made in the shape of an amendment to the civil and diplomatic bill, and this, now asked, is the usual course. The Committee of Ways and Means have themselves set us the example, and in this very bill provide for continuing the construction of the custom-houses at Charleston and New Orleans, and elsewhere, and are ready also to provide by an amendment for an item not embraced in this bill when it was reported, being the money requisite to continue the custom-house at Richmond. Why, then, do they exclude us from having the other custom-house appropriations inserted in this bill? It is the place in which such provisions have always been made heretofore. Why should not this act contain the appropriations approved by the committee, and recommended by them in the separate bill, approved at both times by both Houses of Congress, and advised by the Administration as necessary.

So far as the appropriation for $40,000 for the completion of the custom-house at Louisville is concerned, I can afford either to forego, postpone, or abandon it altogether, if the public necessity require it; but I see no reason for refusing to grant these estimates of the Administration, or for not inserting them in this bill, and therefore again, in behalf of its friends, once more submit the proposition to the committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not want to engage in a discussion on the subject of the custom-houses. I presume the committee understand that subject perfectly. There is a very broad difference between the Richmond custom-house and the custom-houses included in this amendment.

Mr. PRESTON. Will the gentleman from Alabama answer me on this point; is there any difference between them, except that between western interests and Atlantic interests?

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman knows very little about my course on these custom-houses if he supposes that I am influenced by any such consideration as that which he presumes influences me. The gentleman seems to intimate that my consideration for locality directs my course in relation to some of these custom-houses.

No, sir; there is a difference between the Richmond custom-house and the custom-houses included in this amendment. It is, that in relation to the latter they have all got what, at the time, was said to be sufficient to complete them. And therefore I am unwilling to vote any more for them in this bill, or in any other bill. That is the ground I have taken all along in opposing further appropriations to them. I believe that the sums appropriated are sufficient to complete these custom-houses in the most approved plan as fire-proof buildings. In Richmond that is not the case. Richmond received an appropriation of $100,000, while it collects a revenue from foreign imports to the amount of $140,000 or $150,000. Louisville collects some $45,000 or $50,000 of customs in the year while the labor is all done in New Orleans, and Louisville has got appropriations of $178,000—within a very few thousand of the amount which the Committee of Ways and Means have proposed for the custom-house at Richmond.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no argument to show that the parallel between these cases holds in the most remote degree. It was contemplated to give Richmond more than it has got, and perhaps, in the amendment which I expect to offer hereafter, we will bring Richmond up to about the average of the custom-house appropriations. I believe it is now below the average of Mobile, Louisville, St. Louis, and Cincinnati. St. Louis has received $227,000; Cincinnati $212,000; Louisville $178,000, and Mobile $200,000. That is the condition of these appropriations. And we propose now to give to Richmond that which will make the custom-house appropriation for that port $200,000. That is all. And when we shall have made this appropriation to Richmond, I shall be unwilling to increase it. As far as I am concerned,

I will place it in the same category with the others, and vote against all further appropriations to it. That is the difference which, in my opinion, exists between the custom-houses for which the gentleman proposes appropriations, and the custom-house at Richmond.

Sir, we have the evidence of the gentleman from the Louisville district, [Mr. PRESTON,] and from the Treasury Department, that, at the last session of Congress, they had appropriations to meet every bid that was then before the Department. They had appropriations to enable the Department to comply with the bids for the erection of a fire-proof building; and under no circumstances, therefore, would I be willing to vote further appropriations for Louisville or St. Louis, because there is evidence on record that there were bids in the Treasury Department proposing to complete the custom-houses at these points in the manner desired and for the money appropriated. I would like to know what became of these bids and that money?

Mr. DISNEY. I move to amend the amendment by increasing the appropriation for the Cincinnati custom-house one dollar.

Mr. Chairman, to me, I confess, the course pursued by the Committee of Ways and Means in regard to this custom-house matter is totally inexplicable. It is novel. That committee not only directly and openly disregard the recommendations of the head of the Department, who, from the necessity of the case, is familiar with the wants, character, and condition of those things which are necessary to promote the interest of the Government: I say that committee contemptuously disregard all the reasonings and judgment of that officer. They pay not the slightest regard to his estimates upon this or any other subject. Not only that, but, as is seen from the statement which the chairman of the committee has just made, they go further, and entirely disregard the solemnly recorded opinion of this House, over and over again, in relation to this matter. I ask why is it? What reason has this House heard from that committee which should influence it to sustain them in this course of which I have spoken—and spoken in proper terms, too?

Take the case of the Cincinnati custom-house. You have in the document, which is before me, the facts and reasons of the Secretary given; and I undertake to say, that no impartial and unprejudiced man can sit down and peruse its statements without being satisfied that the appropriation ought to be made. And yet it has no effect upon this Committee of Ways and Means. I again ask, why is it? Why do gentlemen stand up here, as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has just done, and state that, in their judgment, proper and appropriate buildings, having regard to form, character, and dimensions, could be contracted for and constructed for the sum already appropriated? Such is not the judgment of the Secretary; and in reference to the Cincinnati custom-house he goes on and gives the facts. He says:

"The plans and specifications for this building were prepared and arranged with great care to meet the purposes contemplated in the act authorizing its erection, and with reference to the most economical construction in a fire-proof manner.

"Bids were solicited for its erection by advertisement of December 11, 1852, for sixty days, the lowest of which, on examination, were found to exceed, in the aggregate, the amount appropriated; but as the last appropriation was for the completion of the edifice, and there could be no reduction of the size of the building, no resource existed but to curtail the expense of its interior, and its fire proof quality, very much, however, to its injury in appearance and its safety.

"As the cutting down of the building in this manner would greatly injure it, and evidently be the very worst economy for the Government to pursue, the Department considered that when the subject was brought to the attention of Congress, the necessary additional appropriation to complete it in the manner it should be constructed, would be made.

"Accordingly, contracts were awarded and made in accordance with the plans and specifications, with the proviso, that should Congress not make the additional appropriation, the above alluded to alterations should be made, and the building cut down to the amount of the appropriation. Hence the $40,000 asked for, which will complete the building agreeably to the plans and specifications."

The Secretary, believing Congress to be an intelligent body, supposed that when Congress should be placed in possession of the facts of the case, they would make the appropriation recommended. But whatever recommendations he may have made, certain it is that the Committee of Ways and Means have disappointed them all. They interpose their judgment about the appropriations heretofore made, and believe them sufficient to erect a building of the proper sort and character. This judgment, too, is given in direct opposition to the mature judgment of the Secretary, founded upon a deliberate examination of all the facts by the experienced head of the Department, who has carefully looked into them all.

Now, sir, I again come back to the question originally propounded. Why is this? Have the Committee of Ways and Means given to this House an intelligent and satisfactory reason, in reply to the facts stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to the case of the custom-house at Cincinnati?

Mr. CASKIE. I should not take part in this discussion, but for some remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON.] His allusion to the Richmond custom house perhaps calls for some notice from me. I do not propose now to enter upon the merits of the appropriation which it is understood will be recommended for that object. It is not now before this committee. When the proper time comes, I shall be prepared to say whatever is necessary and right about it. At present, I shall confine myself to that which alone has induced me to rise.

I think I have a right to complain of the way in which the Richmond custom-house has been drawn into this debate. When the deficiency bill was up, and gentlemen having custom-houses in their districts—appropriations for which were estimated as deficiencies—made their propositions, I voted on them without allusion or reference to Richmond. I did not attempt to put the Richmond building in that bill, and for the plain reason that the estimate of the Secretary in reference to it was not for a deficiency. It was his business to determine where he would make his estimate. He made it for the civil and diplomatic bill. I was content to take it up when we came regularly to the point at which he had placed it. Such has been my course, although I believe that if we could have sooner got the appropriation, we might perhaps have expedited the building. We certainly desired action at the earliest possible moment.

In voting upon custom-house appropriations, I have looked only to their claims. I voted when we were on the deficiency bill for such as were recommended by the Department, because I thought its recommendations were reasonable, so far as I could judge. Besides, although no one can condemn more strongly than I do the abuses which have occurred in past times, I was satisfied that at last the buildings I voted to complete would be faithfully finished for the amounts asked. Here I should like very much to present some general views in reference to these buildings; but my five minutes do not permit. Mr. Chairman, when my time, which I have quietly bided, shall come, I only ask gentlemen to do unto me as I have done unto them. I voted upon their propositions in advance of my own, and without reference to what might be its fate. If they did not succeed, it was not my fault. Now, let each case stand on its own footing, and be judged by its own merits. Let not the fact that the committee of Ways and Means have recommended an appropriation for the Richmond building, while they have refused to recommend appropriations for some others, operate with any gentleman against it. Let it come in its proper place, and be considered unembarrassed by such allusions as we have heard from the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON.] I have a right to expect this, when my own action has been such as I have described; when, looking to nothing but the character of each application, I have always been willing to vote such amounts as I thought fair and right.

Mr. PRESTON. I beg to assure the gentleman that the remarks I made were in no spirit of hostility to the Richmond custom-house.

Mr. CASKIE. I did not suppose the gentleman had any hostility to that work. I spoke of his remarks which I thought had a tendency to excite some prejudice against it—that not unnatural prejudice which results from the idea that anything is unduly favored.

Mr. DISNEY, there being no objection, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. We have progressed very rapidly with the bill to-day, and as it is growing late, the House is thin, and this is a very important amendment, I move that the committee do now rise. There should be a full House to act upon this question.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Speeches are to be made on the question, and they may as well be made now as at any other time. I trust the motion to rise may not prevail.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. It is evident there is no quorum present.

Tellers were demanded, and refused on the motion to rise.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon, at three o'clock, p. m., the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 16, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives was received by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills:

An act for the relief of the widow and heirs of Elijah Beebe;

An act for the relief of Thomas Frazer; and

An act regulating the pay of deputy postmasters.

Which were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PRIVATE BILL DAY—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, this is private bill day, and I suppose it will require the unanimous consent of the Senate to do any other business. The bill which is immediately under consideration, as the first on the Private Calendar, it will be recollected, is one which I have more particularly in charge. On that matter the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] has the floor. I understand, however, that there is quite a unanimous desire in the Senate to proceed with the consideration of the veto message; and feeling very anxious myself that that subject should be early disposed of, I wish to say to the Senate that, so far as I am concerned, I shall waive all desire to proceed with the private bills to-day, if the Senate are disposed to go on with the consideration of the veto message.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, it has now been about four or five weeks since private claims were considered by the Senate; and although we are greatly in advance of the House in the consideration of private bills, claimants are constantly besieging me, as chairman of the Committee on Claims, to insist upon the consideration of their bills, according to the rules of the Senate. I hope, therefore, sir, that unless it is contrary to the general sense of the Senate, or unless the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD], who has the floor on the indigent insane bill, particularly desires to proceed with his remarks to-day, we shall go on and consider the Private Calendar.

I therefore submit two points for the consideration of the Senate: The first is the fact that we have done nothing with private claims for the last four or five weeks. The second is, that if the honorable Senator from New York does not particularly desire to go on with his remarks to-day, and if it is the general sense of the Senate, that we should proceed with the Private Calendar, I hope we shall do so.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that we can make an arrangement by which both ends can be accomplished. I would suggest, therefore, that we proceed with private bills until one o'clock. We can then take up the veto message, and the Senator from New York can address the Senate upon it. I presume he will not occupy more than an hour.

Then we shall have an hour more for other business.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; let us go on with private bills.

Mr. GWIN. I am very anxious to have a claim acted upon to-day, which was before decided by the Senate, and sent to the House, but which, at our request, was sent back to us.

The PRESIDENT. In the opinion of the Chair, this discussion is altogether out of order.

Mr. HAMLIN. I call for the regular order of business.

MOORE AND HASCALL.

The PRESIDENT. The regular order of business is the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. The first bill is one for the relief of Hiram Moore and John Hascall, which is now under consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALKER said: Mr. President, when I addressed myself to this subject before, I remarked that after hearing the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] I might have something further to say, and might go to some extent into the proofs of what allegations I might make. I propose to do it now; and I ask the Senate, or as many of them as can possibly give me their attention, to do so, for I promise them that, while I was charged before with making very broad and unqualified assertions, I said nothing but what I feel myself now able to prove, and more than prove.

The question before us, I repeat, as I did then, is one of very great importance. It is one that should be well considered by the Senate. It ought not lightly to pass upon it, for I think that, after very full examination, if the Senate shall pass the bill, very great and serious detriment will result. I shall take up many points in the speech of the honorable Senator from Michigan, and endeavor to reply to them, with what success the result must prove, or the judgment of the Senate must determine.

He commenced his argument in reply to me by saying, what, if it amounted to anything, amounted to a charge against me of making the most unqualified assertions which were not based in fact or in reason. I will read from his remarks, for I intend to quote him correctly as I reply to him. He says:

"It perhaps is not the least difficult task for a man to undertake to answer an argument that is made up wholly of illimitable statements and declarations. I conceive that if a gentleman were to rise in his place to-day and tell the Senate of the United States that to-morrow, at noon, the sun would be extinguished, the earth would be annihilated, and the whole planetary system would be utterly and entirely destroyed, there is not a man in the world who could refute that argument by reason and logic. He could only say he did not believe it. Now, sir, I find myself very much in that position."

The comparison here could not be stronger. It compares the statement which I made to one so egregiously erroneous, and unfounded, and baseless, as that all nature was to go to wreck to-morrow. This, sir, is pretty strong language to use in reply. It implies a great deal; and if he has sustained that comparison against me he certainly has placed me not only in a very ridiculous position, but in one which is most false.

Sir, I shall use language upon this occasion about as strong as upon that; but I shall do to-day what I did not do then: I shall follow myself, step by step, with the proofs.

The next statement made by the Senator is:

"I trust the Senate will indulge me in saying that this whole transaction, from the time of its inception down to its completion, has been carried on in the county in which I reside, within twelve or fourteen miles of my own residence; and if there is any subject which I have had an opportunity to understand by observation and by examination from first to last, it is the subject which is now before the Senate of the United States; and when the Senator from Wisconsin tells me that I am here the advocate of a measure which carries upon its face, and in its effect, such perjury as he ascribes to this, when I know all about it, no other inference can be drawn from his language, however he may intend it, except that I am here in the dishonest advocacy of a very dishonest measure. This is a subject about which I cannot plead ignorance."

Again, speaking of Moore & Hascall, he says:

"They are men who claim for themselves to be meritorious; and they are men whom I claim, on my responsibility as a man and a Senator, to be meritorious. I speak from knowledge, for they are my neighbors. This thing has been done in my community. It has been done where I know all about it, if I know anything."

If, in the progress of what I shall say to the Senate, I shall prove that in every respect where he contradicts me I am right, I will leave it to the Senate to determine how far he is mistaken in regard to his own knowledge, or to make what other inference it may please.

After comparing the statement which I made to a statement that the world was to become a wreck to-morrow, what is the first point he specifies as worthy the institution of such comparison? It is this. He says of me:

"He tells you that an attempt is made by this bill to give to Moore & Hascall, not that which they have invented, and to which they have a right, but all that they claim; and he says he knows they will claim everything that attaches to any reaping machine that has ever been invented, or is now in use."

If the Senator possesses the knowledge he claims for himself, he knows that Moore & Hascall will make no such claim. He knows that. I will ask the honorable Senator if he is acquainted with a gentleman in his own State by the name of Lakin Brown; and also another, of the name of A. Y. Moore?

Mr. STUART. It will probably be more convenient for the Senator and myself to answer his inquiries after he has got through with them. I know those gentlemen, and I believe, also, I know the statements to which he refers. I think I can satisfy the Senator that I know all about the matter.

Mr. WALKER. I wish to state that since I was arraigned, as it were, before the Senate the other day; and more particularly since the case of Mr. McCormick, now of Illinois, late of Virginia, was arraigned, and he was brought upon the stand as a man of fraud, as a man who usurped the right of others, he has furnished me with additional testimony not only to sustain my statements, but to sustain his own position. He has never sent an agent to me. I have never seen an agent of Mr. McCormick, never conversed with one, never knew that he had one. In the absence of all agents, when he was here advocating his own cause, as I have said before to the Senate, I gave him my ear often, and whenever a man comes to me with his own case, and presents it for himself, and does not send his hiring agents, I will listen to him. I feel it to be my duty to do so, and if what I notice after that is charged against me for so doing, I have an answer to make to it, and shall make it plainly.

Then the statement which the Senator arraigned me for first making is this, that Moore & Hascall designed to claim what was embraced in the patents of other claimants for reaping machines.

I find that in the testimony of two witnesses taken in the State of Michigan, in a suit pending between Mr. McCormick, and the infringers of his patent, this statement was made:

"Hiram Moore has repeatedly stated to me in conversation that all the main features in McCormick's reaper were his, said Moore's, invention; and he also stated to this deponent, that the reason why he had not prosecuted persons for an infringement of his patent was the fact, that he wanted to procure first his renewal of the patent for Moore & Hascall's harvesting machine."

That is the statement proved by Mr. Lakin Brown. Then we have the testimony of a man of the same name with one of the claimants, but whether a relative or not I do not know, to the same effect. Mr. Moore says:

"Hiram Moore has several times told him, this deponent, that said plaintiff, McCormick, and others, were using substantially his, said Hiram Moore's, invention in all the reaping machines; but that he did not intend to prosecute for an infringement of his patent, inasmuch as he wanted first to procure an extension or renewal of his patent by Congress."

Now I contend that this fully proves what I asserted, that Moore & Hascall do not seek an extension of this patent for the purpose of manufacturing, but solely for the purpose of coming down on those whom they may claim to be infringers of their patent, and levy black mail on them, and make them pay what will constitute a profit on the patent. I prove this by sworn testimony, certified under seal by the proper officers, and sworn to have come from the lips of Mr. Moore himself. That is not all. It not only proves that they claim what is contained in McCormick's machine, but this also lets out the motive why they have, up to this time, remained so peaceful, and not prosecuted infringers of what they claim to be their patent. That motive is admitted by Mr. Moore himself. It is that he wanted to get this patent extended, and then he says he will come down upon others and show that these people are all infringing his patent.

What did I say when I spoke before? I said this was the object. I now prove it by sworn testimony. I said the object was not to manufacture the machines, but to get the community in such a position that they could not use machines which have already been bought from McCormick, without being subject to damages and to an injunction. Then the first charge which is brought against me, of having stated what is not so, falls to the ground, for I support my statement by proof.

Now, Mr. President, bear in mind another thing. I stated that, as this bill was now framed, it would enable Moore & Hascall to go back for eighteen years, and claim all they should allege they have invented within that time, and obtain a patent for it. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. Stuart] takes issue with me on that, and says, they only propose to go back fourteen years. Now let us see what he said about this matter. Speaking of Mr. Moore, he used this language:

"Looking abroad, sir, upon our prairies in 1832, he discovered at once that a single man, with a team, could, besides attending to his ordinary farming business, put in eighty acres of wheat; but he saw instantly that it required a great many men to harvest that wheat in the ordinary method, by a cradle. He therefore saw, either that a great portion of the western country, consisting of prairie land, must be comparatively idle and unproductive, or else means must be employed to provide for harvesting after the crop was in and ready to be harvested. He said to his neighbors, 'I believe I can invent a machine which will harvest this wheat perfectly.' As a matter of course, they all laughed at him. They did not believe him any more than a man would have believed, a few years before it was demonstrated, that intelligence could be communicated by telegraph. He went to work, however—to do what?"

Remember, this was in 1832.

"I wish to call the attention of Senators to the work which this gentleman set about. It was to produce a machine which would go into the field, and could thresh, clean up, and put into bags the wheat at the rate of three acres an hour. That was a pretty large undertaking. Has he succeeded? The report of the committee says he has; and as the matter has passed under my own observation, I know it to be so. Since he began, in 1836, to try his machine, I have seen it operate annually; and I tell you, sir, and I pledge myself to the Senate of the United States, that it does this work more thoroughly than it can be done in any other way. It is done with less waste. There is less loss of wheat by shelling. The farmer gets more bushels of wheat into his barn by this mode than any other which has yet been proposed."

In the bill in this case bear in mind there are two points. First, the patent is to be renewed. For what? For what was contained in the original patent? No, sir; but it is to be renewed for what was contained in the model, drawings, or specifications. When can we infer that he got up his model? The Senator tells us it was in 1832. If he can show that he made a model in 1832, when he commenced operations, that will carry him back not only eighteen years, but twenty-two years. Then it is the renewal of a patent for what is contained in this model, drawings, or specification; and I asserted he could go back eighteen years. I now go further, and prove, by the Senator's own admission, that he can go back for twenty-two years, if he can show that the first thing he did was to get up this model, which is, in all probability, the fact.

Then, what becomes of these broad denials of my assertions, when I prove from the statements of the Senator himself, that not only do these constituents of his claim what is contained in other reapers, but I show that they commenced in 1832, making twenty-two years that they can go back and prove they invented anything, by bringing up the dead body of this burnt model? How are they to get at it? The Senator tells you, in another part of his speech, that the model was burnt in 1836. It has, therefore, been burnt up for eighteen years. How are these men to bring to the knowledge of the Commissioner of Patents what was in that model? They are to do it by oral testimony. They are to fish around the country and find some man who will swear that so far back as 1836 or 1832, he saw a model containing such improvements as they now specify in their claim, and when they do that, and prove it, they get a patent for it. And what else do they get a patent for under the provisions of this bill? They are not only to go back to the utmost limit to which they can trace this model, but then comes in another provision of the bill, that for everything from the day of the issue of the first patent to the time mentioned in the bill, which is fourteen years, they are to have the patent extended for every particle of improvement. Every improvement which they can show they invented within that time is to be included within the renewed patent. Then, I say, it is an enormity. It is such a proposition of legislation as perhaps never was submitted to the Congress of the United States before.

Sir, in ordinary cases what are the solemnities to be pursued? An inventor goes to the Patent Office, and files his claim and specification. What else? He has solemnly to avouch for the fact, that in his opinion, he is the true and original inventor. He files an affidavit of that. If any other person sees fit to come forward and contest the originality of his invention, he has a right to do so, and a contest for priority takes place, and it is decided on the proofs. But here this bill provides that these men shall go before the Patent Office and file their claim and specifications, and shall be entitled to a patent for whatever they can prove is embraced in their claim. I have shown, that according to the admissions of these men, they may go back not only eighteen years, but twenty-two years, and have a patent for all which they may allege was contained in the model, which was burnt long ago. Let me ask what security is there to the public.

The Senator from Michigan made a great deal of sport, as he supposed, in regard to what I said about stopping reapers on the western prairies. Why, sir, I can stand at my door at home in harvest time, and be within the sound of many reaping machines. Men on those prairies have incurred the expense of buying harvesting and reaping machines; but did they ever think of buying one of Moore & Hascall's machines? No, sir, they have not got one of them.

What is proposed, as is now shown by the testimony? It is proposed by Moore & Hascall themselves to lie still, to keep quiet, to allow other patentees to come in and perfect their patents and secure their rights, to say nothing about their own patent, to let people buy other reapers, and, at last, when they have secured an extension of their own patent, they will break in on the community, and without furnishing reapers themselves, will stop the operations of others, or levy black mail on them to a greater extent in value than they could ever realize by making and selling such machines as theirs. This is sworn to, as their intention; and yet I am told that when I said so before, I made an assertion as broad and unreasonable as would be an assertion that all matter would go to wreck to-morrow.

But, sir, there is something further upon the question, not only of what they claim, but of the intention with which they make their claim. In speaking of the machine, the Senator from Michigan said:

"It could only be tried in harvest time, and Senators who are acquainted with grain growing, will see it would only be tried while the wheat was fit to thresh."

Now, Mr. President and Senators, let me beg of you to take, in connection with what is here said, what I asserted before—that this machine was worthless, and never would be manufactured. I stand by the assertion, and will endeavor to prove it. But what is the statement here? The Senator further says:

"With the cradle you begin a week before the wheat is ready to thresh; but with this machine you cannot operate until the wheat is ready to thresh, because it cuts, threshes, and cleans up at once. For this reason the time during which the machine can be operated is reduced to ten days, or two weeks at the outside."

If there was no other objection to this machine than what is here mentioned by the Senator himself, it would be deemed by every farmer and miller in the country, who knows his business, to be utterly worthless. Who ever thought of putting off the harvesting of his grain until it is ready to thresh? If it must be ready to thresh before you can operate with the machine, all must be so ready. Suppose, now, that you have a field of one hundred acres upon which you are to enter; suppose it is all ready to thresh to-day—that is, it is dead ripe, ready to fall off; you set in with your threshing-machine, and you find that before you come to the last it will have fallen out. Notwithstanding this, the Senator asserts that the farmer gets more bushels of grain by this process of harvesting than he can in any other way. But he says that with the cradle you can commence before the grain is dead ripe. If the Senator does know anything about farming, I wish him to pay a little attention to this. If he ever owned a mill, or knows anything of milling, I wish he would pay attention.

Let him inquire of any flour merchant or miller in the world, whether he prefers wheat cut when it is dead ripe, or cut before that? The miller will tell him that he wants it cut before it is dead ripe, for then it makes better flour, and there is more of it. Besides that, everybody's common sense will tell him at once, that if wheat be dead ripe before you commence to harvest it, the last must be fallen out before the machine reaches it.

Take this in connection with what I said, and it shows clearly that this machine must be worthless, and that it is not the intention to manufacture it, but to fall back on claims contained in other reapers which are already in the hands of the farming community, and if these men can make them pay, it will be profit enough for them, without putting them to the annoyance and trouble of making machines. I have already said, and I shall prove it before I conclude, that it does require $1,600 to build one of these machines, and does take sixteen horses to work one of them. Whatever may be the intention of the honorable Senator, and I do not speak of his motives, I ask, is it not apparent, from their own admissions, and from the facts in the case, that these men desire an extension of their patent in order to make money out of the investments of others, and not out of their own exertions? I said, when I was speaking on a previous day, that when it was first introduced into Congress, it did not contain a provision giving them what is given by the present bill, and I showed a copy of the bill to the Senate at that time to sustain that assertion. The Senator from Michigan, speaking on that point, said:

"The Senator says there is one portion of this bill that is wrong, because it seeks to renew whatever was contained in the 'model, drawings, or specifications,' instead of saying 'the model, drawing, and specifications.' I draw the attention of the Senate to this fact, because I want the bill understood. I want it to meet every objection, and I wish to have the judgment of Senators on this question after it is thoroughly tested and understood. If it will not bear the light of examination, far be it from me to ask them to pass the bill."

Sir, that is fair. The Senator says he is willing to submit the matter to examination, and if the bill will not bear the test of examination and scrutiny, he does not want to have it passed. Then I address this inquiry to the Senator: if what he says in a subsequent part of his speech is correct, that all these men seek by this bill is relief from any objection of abandonment which might be made on account of the time which has elapsed since they first presented to their case now, why, I ask, is this peculiar provision put in the bill at this time? Was it any less necessary at first? And why is it now incorporated into this bill? There is something about this matter that I wish to get at.

The Senator says he wants the fullest scrutiny. Well, I ask, why has the provision to which I have referred, been put in since the bill was first reported, if not for the purpose of resorting to oral testimony, which will not only go back eighteen years, as I said before, but twenty-two years, to enable them to show what was contained in the model, which has been burnt up for eighteen years? I can see no other reason why it should have been put there. I can see no other beneficial use which it could answer. It must be for some purpose, or else the Senator would be willing to have it stricken out. I can see no other purpose which it is to answer than the one I have mentioned. If the model by which Moore & Hascall are to be concluded in their claim was in existence, there would not be so much harm in it; but it is not in existence. Has it been exhibited to a member of Congress? Who has seen it? Who can tell what is in it? Can anybody else who has patented a reaping machine say whether the model these men are going to bring "from the vasty deep," contains important points in their machines or not? No, sir; it would, however, be the most convenient thing in the world for men who are lying low, as they say they are, and seeking an extension of a patent, to bring forward such a model as no mortal man ever saw, if they could only get some one to swear he had seen it twenty-two years ago, with these very important parts in it.

But the Senator, in his reply to me, says what I think is rather unjust. He charges me, by implication, with censuring the Commissioner of Patents, with declaring that he will act fraudulently, and will not be governed by the right and justice of the case. Sir, there is no necessity for presuming any such thing against the Commissioner of Patents. I do not presume it. He has to decide according to the proof before him, whether it be false or true. If these men bring up testimony to show that in this dead model there were certain features, then this bill, if passed, will make it his imperative duty to take outstanding patents from everybody else, and to give the benefits over to Moore & Hascall; and if given to them, they can reap the benefit of them in a much more profitable way, by making others pay the cost, than by paying it themselves. The Senator from Michigan on this point said:

"The bill proposes to give them an extension for such improvements as they made in perfecting it. Why is this necessary? Without the provision, the extension is good for nothing."

If the bill did not give them the improvements they have made in the mean time, the Senator from Michigan says, it would be good for nothing. Now, let me inquire again, if the extension would be good for nothing, what is the reason for it? It is because their original machine was good for nothing. Then, to make it good for anything, they have made improvements in it, and consequently these improvements must have been much more important than the original machine. If they are so much more important, why did not these men go to the Patent Office when they got up any improvement of value, give the community notice, and obtain a patent for it, and then let the community have the benefit of the improvement by the use of the improved machine? But no, sir, they lay still during the whole time these improvements were running on—fourteen years—while others were complying with the law, who lived thousands of miles from them, and were going to the Patent Office and getting patent rights for their improvements.

I say they lay still for this great length of time, until rights were vested in others, saying in the mean time that they were waiting to have their own patent extended by Congress, and that then they would come down on those whom they considered infringers of it. It is true, then, that but for the improvements which are to be covered by the renewed patent, this renewal would be good for nothing to these gentlemen. That is admitted by the Senator from Michigan in his speech; and consequently they are to be relieved from abandonment of their rights, not only here but before the Patent Office. Now, Mr. President, we have, upon another important case, a report from a committee of the House of Representatives, in which a doctrine is laid down that touches this very point. Senators will recollect the celebrated Woodworth planing machine case. Congress was asked to renew the patent for that machine. In the report of the House Committee on Patents on that case, they hold this language in regard to the question of abandonment; I think it sound law, and consequently I quote it:

"Even if he had actually invented all that is embraced in the reissue, the omission to claim it at any time during the fourteen years was an abandonment to the public of all which he did not choose to embrace in his original patent."

Such is the doctrine laid down by the committee in that case, that whatever a patentee abandoned to the public during the term of his original patent was dedicated to the public, and could not be recalled. The Senator told us in one part of his speech that all these patentees asked was to be relieved from this difficulty of abandonment.

But, sir, in order to show that it was not by the fault of Moore & Hascall that the model was burnt, the Senator from Michigan said:

"The office took fire and burnt up, and in that burning these men's model was consumed. They, therefore, must produce another model, and must resort to parol evidence to show its identity. Is there any other way known by which they can secure other evidence. Certainly not. Then where is the danger? If you give men what they have actually invented—for the bill limits them to that—what they are the first and actually inventors of, has anybody else a right to it? I ask the question, has anybody a right to what these men invented?"

I say, yes. Others have a right to what they invented, if these men did not let the public know that they invented it. Suppose that nine, or ten, or fifteen years ago these men, living in Michigan, invented something, and a man living in Rockbridge county, Virginia, at that time should have come forward and patented a similar invention. Will you say he is not entitled to the benefit of his patent because they invented the same thing; or will you, after a lapse of fourteen years, pass a bill to set aside the patent of the first patentee, and vest his rights in one who abandoned everything, which he could claim from his invention? Then I tell the Senator that there may be others who are entitled, even to the detriment of his own constituents; for if they have not followed up their rights, according to the law, they have abandoned them, and it is contrary to public policy that they should be permitted to take them back.

But, Mr. President, there is something more to be inferred from this language of the Senator. He says "they therefore must resort to another model, and must resort to parol evidence to show its identity." Is not this an admission of the uncertainty of what we are to rely upon under the bill? He says these persons must bring forward another model, and must resort to oral testimony to show its identity. Is it a safe course of legislation to depend upon the failing memory of man in regard to transactions which occurred eighteen or twenty years ago? Would the Senator act upon any such foundation as that in the prudent management of his own affairs? I think not; but still he asks Congress to do it, and it is for Congress, in its wisdom, to determine whether it will do it or not. Let me remind the Senator also, that he commits a great error when he supposes there is no other way to do this. He asks, "Is there any other way known by which they can secure other evidence?"

Yes, sir, let me tell him there was another way; and, if he will examine the patent laws, he will find that there was an act of Congress passed expressly to meet such cases, which enabled these gentlemen, as far back as 1837, to go forward to the Patent Office and deposit another model; and it was their duty to do it; but it does not seem to have suited their convenience. It appears to have been more convenient to them to let the matter be for fourteen years, to let the model go, and to act as if they did not care about it; and then, when McCormick and Hussey, and others, have made improvements, and have patented them, to come forward and say, "These are all Moore & Hascall's," and ask us to legislate them into their possession, and for their benefit, to the detriment of the community. Then I tell the Senator there was another mode by which his constituents could have supplied themselves with testimony which we could now look at; for if they had redeposited their model in the Patent Office, we could send for it, and have it produced here, and see what conflicts there were between that and other machines.

But, sir, the Senator said further:

"Here is another fact to which I will refer in this connection. If these men were of the character that the Senator from Wisconsin seeks to satisfy the Senate they are—mere blood suckers upon the producing community—they would have gone on and patented those little inventions for improvements as fast as they made them. They would have done what has been done by some others in this country, whom I could name, who are undertaking to get great écât before the community, and every two or three years are taking out patents for a part of the identical machine originally patented. But, sir, I can tell the Senator from Wisconsin that there is a wide distinction between these individuals and some others. They are honest men."

That is, Moore & Hascall are honest men, and there is a vast difference between them and others. To whom did he evidently allude? Mr. McCormick is referred to, and it is made a matter of censure against him that he redeemed the credit of his country at the World's Fair at London. While Moore & Hascall, like sloths, were loafing in Michigan, he was there struggling, with his money and his genius, trying to sustain the honor of his country. He was one of those who redeemed its name at that fair, and now the Senator censures him for having endeavored to get écât for a machine so useful as his. The Senator censures him for doing that for which the world considers him as entitled to their credit and esteem; the exertions which he made to perfect a machine which saves so much labor in the main pursuit of life, that of acquiring the bread of life. Yes, sir, an invidious distinction is made between him and Moore & Hascall. It is said that Moore & Hascall are honest men, and the Senator intimated plainly, if not distinctly said, that McCormick is a scoundrel.

What else did the Senator say in regard to him? He says he was one of that kind of blood-suckers who has been running every year to the Patent Office to obtain new patents for new improvements and inventions. Yes, sir, he has done that, and it is the first time I ever heard an honorable Senator censure one of his fellow-citizens for obedience to the law. Is it otherwise than commendable that he should have followed the law? Would the Senator have had him lie still, like his constituents, and go on and make improvements and boast to witnesses brought against him that he was only waiting for a renewal, to come down on those who were using other machines? Would that satisfy the Senator that he was a moral and honest man? Yet such is the category of men who are held up here in contrast with Cyrus H. McCormick, because he obeyed the law, and did not seek to obtain a dishonest advantage over the farming community, or over other inventors. He, according to the Senator, is a blood-sucker, while the very men who are lying by and endeavoring to suck the blood, not only of McCormick, but of the whole farming community, are honest! For my part, sir, I commend McCormick. I say the country owes him a debt of gratitude. If it had not been for him and Samuel Colt, and Stevens, Hobbs, and Powers, God only knows what would have become of the reputation of the country at the London Fair. Yet McCormick is denounced, is held up in comparison with other men who have done nothing for the community, and is considered as a dishonest man in comparison with them!

From the speech of the honorable Senator, men would be led to suppose that McCormick lived immediately in the neighborhood of Moore & Hascall, and that he was there prying into their movements, seeing what they invented from time to time, and then running off and securing patents for their improvements. Let the Senator be candid, and tell the Senate that McCormick lived in Rockbridge county, in the State of Virginia, when he obtained his patent. He first commenced to manufacture his machines in New York, and it was not until a recent day that he got to be a neighbor of Moore & Hascall. He is now manufacturing his machines at Chicago; and there it was that he heard for the first time that Moore & Hascall were in existence as the patentees of a reaping machine. McCormick was not their neighbor. He was not watching them. He was not endeavoring to steal or pirate from them what they were inventing. He was an inventor in Virginia as far back as 1834, and as late as 1845 he obtained his last patent. Never, up to that time, as I am assured, did he know there were such men in existence as Moore & Hascall.

It may be well for the community to take warning not to obey too strictly the laws, for it may be that hereafter the doctrine of the Senator will prevail, and that the greatest amount of disobedience to law will constitute the highest merit. Certainly if that should ever become the standard, these constituents of his can claim a high place, for they have paid no attention at all to the law, until others have made what are claimed to be valuable inventions, and then they come forward, by the mouths of sworn witnesses, and say that as soon as they can get the advantage, they will use it on these patentees, and the public.

Now, sir, we come to something very definite from the lips of the Senator himself. I hope I do not misunderstand him; and that I may not misinterpret him, I will give his own language:

"The Senator from Wisconsin may well tell the Senate that he is perfectly willing that their original patent shall be extended for the crude and imperfect machine for which they took out a patent in 1836. He may say so, because there is no claim that the original patent of 1836 interferes with certain other claims which, but for the agents of some men, would not trouble the Senate. I wish Senators to understand, that if Moore & Hascall simply asked for an extension of their original patent, men who have made $300,000 or $400,000 out of their inventions would not be here to-day, battling this bill as this is contested. There is the cause; there is the difficulty. I say these people may well say they do not object to the extension of the original patent."

Thus it appears now that it is proposed to renew a patent which does at present interfere with some other patent. The Senator says I may well say that I am willing that the patent of 1836 may be renewed, because that does not conflict with any other patent right; but he says that if we grant a renewal, so as to include the improvements for which the extension is sought, it will conflict with the rights of others; and he wishes to take away the rights of others and hand them over to Moore & Hascall. Sir, when did the Senate assume the right of deciding questions as to the priority of invention? When were they converted into a court for such a purpose? There was a somewhat analogous case, known as the other case, brought before the Senate a few years ago. It was then proposed to make an appropriation for the use of the article by the United States to the individual who had a patent for that discovery, and who, so far as I know and believe, is the actual discoverer of anæsthesia. But so soon as a Senator [Mr. SMITH] rose in his place, and made it known that there was another claimant, the case immediately went out of the Senate, and was never passed upon in that form. The Senate would not for a moment take cognizance of the question of who was the original discoverer; and when the question came back again, the proposition was in the form of leaving it to a judicial tribunal to decide who was the original discoverer.

But the Senator says that is what is done here, that it is proposed to leave it to the Commissioner of Patents, or to the court to whom an appeal may be taken from his decision, to determine who was the original inventor. Sir, when the Commissioner is to decide, and when the appellate court is to decide, on such proof as we have seen must necessarily be the only proof that can be produced here, what security is there for the decision which they will give? What security is there to anybody—not only the makers of other reaping machines, but those who are the users of them? It appears to me that it is absurd to suppose that this would not interfere with other claims. And who would be the sufferers? Not only those whose claims are interfered with, but every person who is using one of these machines; for nobody would have a right to use them, unless he had obtained the right from Moore & Hascall, who are now to become the patentees.

The Senator, as I said before, makes sport of the idea of stopping reaping machines. He says there will never be such a procedure, and he vouches for Moore & Hascall that no such thing will be done. I am not aware of how he knows this, but certainly they have told a different story, as the sworn testimony shows; for it appears from that, that they were only waiting for this fortunate event to show what they would do. I will ask the Senator if he does not concede; and if he does not give me an answer, I will ask any lawyer in the Senate, that if this patent be renewed to Moore & Hascall, and the renewed patent is made to embrace the important parts of machines now in use, can they not institute proceedings against those using them, and such proceedings as will stop their use? If the Senator has ever commenced a suit for the infringement of a patent whilst the infringement was going on, I will venture to say he will admit that one of the first steps he took was to procure an injunction against the further use. In ordinary cases, after an injunction is obtained, if the stoppage of the business would involve great loss, a receiver is appointed; the business goes on; and the proceeds are paid over as the court may finally decree. Every patent lawyer knows that; and yet the Senator said to me the other day, and to the Senate, that no such procedure could be taken. If he knows what I believe he must have known, he was aware that it could.

I come now to some more specific denials of what I alleged the other day; and I wish the Senator to give it his attention, if he pleases. The next denial that he makes is of a most emphatic character. I asserted that this machine cost $1,600 to manufacture it, and that it requires a team of sixteen horses to draw it. What says the Senator upon that subject?

"Again, the Senator says it costs $1,600 to build one of these machines. So far from that being the case, it costs but $500. There is a mistake of $1,000, nearly two thirds of the calculation. I am speaking that which I know."

"This machine, so far from taking sixteen horses, takes but twelve; so far from costing $1,600, it costs but $500; and Mr. Moore is of opinion that improvements can be made in the manner of building it, so that he can build it at a cost of not over $400; very little more than a single threshing machine now costs."

There is an emphatic issue between the Senator and me on an assertion of mine. I will ask him if he places any confidence in what a late colleague of his in the House of Representatives [Mr. Buel] says. I presume he does. We were in the habit of believing Mr. Buel; and I never heard his veracity called in question by any one; and I will venture to say that the honorable Senator from Michigan will not do it. Let us see what Mr. Buel said when advocating this bill in the House of Representatives. He said:

"But this machine itself is very expensive, being worked by sixteen horses, and nearly $30,000 have been expended in its operation."

But that is not all. The same witnesses, his own neighbors, who were sworn in the State of Michigan, give us testimony upon this subject. I bring to the attention of the Senate the testimony of one who, much as the Senator from Michigan does know, knows more than he does about the matter. I bring the testimony of the man who swears that he operated the machine for five years, I believe. However, I will read the testimony, and see what it is. Let us hear what the very man employed by Moore & Hascall to operate the machine says:

"This deponent has been familiar with all the operations of Moore & Hascall's harvesting machines in Michigan, and only five of said machines have been used in said State. This deponent further states, that the estimate placed on said machine by said Hiram Moore, when offering to sell the same, was never less than $1,600. This deponent further states, that the machine aforesaid requires, in its operation, a team of sixteen horses."

Now, will the Senator from Michigan tell me again that I was mistaken? His denials brought forth the production of this testimony. I had heard that the facts could be proved, and I made the statement, though I did not refer to the testimony then; and the Senator was peculiarly unfortunate in taking an issue with me in the manner he did. Here is the proof of the very man who worked the machine:

"The machine operated for several years past by me, this deponent, is the most perfect in all its parts of all the harvesting machines that I have known constructed under Moore & Hascall's patent."

Before that he states:

"This deponent states that Hiram Moore, in the year 1836, cut for him, this deponent, three acres of wheat with the harvesting machine aforesaid, being the first acre that had ever been cut with said machine. This deponent has been familiar with said harvesting machine's operations. In the year 1843 I contracted with Hiram Moore to run, and did run, his harvesting machine through the harvest; and from that time to 1845 I run a harvesting machine or machines for said Hiram Moore; and in 1845 I built a harvesting machine for said Hiram Moore and myself, and have continued to run said machine every harvest up to the present time."

I will ask the Senator if he ever did as much as that? and yet he tells us that he knows all about it. He has seen it operate, and can tell us that it takes but twelve horses; and yet, at the same time, he tells us that it will take eight horses to operate a threshing machine. He tells us that it will cost but $600. From the testimony of his own colleague we see that it is very expensive; and by the sworn witness who manufactured one, we are told that Moore never pretended to estimate it at less than $1,600. The Senator then says:

"Talk about stopping reapers in the harvest fields of the country! That argument cannot be touched with logic, because there is no beginning and no end to it. These men expressly said in their original patent that they did not claim the invention of a threshing machine. Such machines have been used for years. Nobody holds a patent for them now. They do not claim it. They do not claim to be the inventors of a reaper. They do not claim to be the inventors of the cut-wheels by which this machinery is propelled. But they claim that they have combined these threshing powers and cleaning powers with certain cutting apparatus which they have invented, so as to secure a patentable machine. Why, sir, talk about stopping threshing machines, and stopping fanning mills, and stopping reapers! The thing is an absurdity."

The Senator, as a lawyer, knows that it could be done, if they could once arrogate to themselves these rights. He did not reflect when he said that it was an absurdity. If he ever brought a patent suit, I ask if he did not obtain an injunction to stop the machine? Every lawyer in the Senate, who has ever commenced a patent suit, knows that if he charges a machine with infringing a patent, he can stop its operation. Everybody knows that it is one of the simplest operations to obtain an injunction under the patent laws of the United States. Certainly he knows it. I repeat what I said then, that in the large fields of grain in the western country, no injury could be more calamitous than to the farmers in the midst of harvest. It would strike more terror and consternation into the mind of the public there than anything else could do. If such a thing could be enforced, it would do more real injury than anything else which could be done; but, sir, it could not be enforced; it would not be tolerated. I advise Moore & Has-call, their agents, and their counsellors, and their attorneys, if they undertake that game, to come with the most potent force; for I tell them that they will meet with a force there hardy and stern in opposition; and they never can inflict this irreparable injury upon the agriculturists of the West, until the men there become baser cowards than they have yet shown themselves to be. Then the Senator makes use of this language:

"There is no doubt about one thing, and I do not seek to disguise it here; and, as the Senator has given me notice that he is going very extensively into this argument, I will say to him, that if he chooses to touch that branch of the question?"

What branch? Why that branch which treats of the conflict between Moore & Hascall and Mr. McCormick.

"—I shall be delighted to meet him, not on account of any particular prowess that I claim for myself, but because 'truth is mighty, and will prevail'; and is nowhere more certain to prevail than in the Senate of the United States. It is not denied that other individuals do claim, in respect to the cutting apparatus, what Moore & Hascall claim. Hussey does not claim it. As I said before, there is no collision with Hussey's machine."

Here is a bait thrown out, I suppose, to the Senators from Maryland to keep them quiet. They are not to make any fuss. They are to let Moore & Hascall get their patent. There is no conflict with Hussey; and, therefore, the Senators from Maryland are to lie perfectly still. Let them do so, and let this patent be extended, and they will see what will become of Hussey's rights. I will say there is no more conflict between Hussey and McCormick than there is between McCormick and Hussey and these men.

"As I said before, there is no collision with Hussey's machine; but there are persons in the country who have sought to obtain glory, reputation, and éclat over the inventions of Moore & Hascall, and Hussey. I will ask my friend from Maryland, [Mr. PEARCE] if he has time to look into it and he will find that Hussey is an original, true, and meritorious inventor, entitled to the thanks of the whole agricultural community."

I do not deny it. McCormick does not deny it.

"He will find Moore & Hascall to be of the same class. But, sir, he will find that the man who went to England, and sought to carry off everything by éclat, has never invented a machine of this character at all."

He has not named this gentleman. He has been alluding to him, though, as the man who was trying to get éclat in England. Then he goes on further to say:

"He has invented nothing. I do not seek to involve myself in any controversy about other machines; but I dare meet the Senator on this point. I speak on this question to my fellow-Senators here with a little feeling, for this reason: Moore & Hascall have expended $30,000 in inventing the only machine that will operate. They are the sole inventors of the sickle applied as they apply it—in a manner that is worth anything. McCormick's machine will not work unless he can use Moore & Hascall's sickle."

There McCormick's name occurs for the first time.

Let me say to the Senator that I accept the challenge, and I will furnish him with the benefit of his patent. I have a correct copy of it, certified by the Patent Office. There [handing it to Mr. STUART] is a copy of the patent issued to Moore & Hascall in 1836. I ask the Senator to show me in that the sickle that is now claimed, and I will show it with more minute specifications in McCormick's patent, dated 1834, two years before. I will tell the Senator another thing. His man, Moore, in the Seymour & McCormick case, swore that he invented the sickle in 1835, and that it was included in his patent. When he swore that, the court forced him to produce the patent; and when it was produced, there was nothing of the kind in it. How do I prove that? I prove it by no less names than those of Samuel Stevens, of Albany, New York, by Charles M. Keller, by Samuel Blatchford, and others. They state, in a paper which I have in my hand, that Moore so swore; and that when his patent was demanded of him, it was apparent to the court that he had sworn to what was not contained in his patent. There it is. I submit it for the benefit of the Senator. But I have more evidence on the subject. A great deal has been furnished to me. I have here, besides, the models, on a small scale, of all the different cutting apparatus that have been used by any of these gentlemen, and not one of them is like that of McCormick's, and it cannot be shown that they are. And I will tell the Senator now, that he may claim the identical sickle, if he pleases, that they have, and he cannot cut a stalk of straw with it. He might just as well take a knife and go through the field and attempt to cut it down without holding one end of the straw, as to cut with Moore & Hascall's sickle without McCormick's combinations. Such a thing was never in Moore & Hascall's; and their patent, when produced, showed that nothing was contained in it of the kind.

But the Senator comes now to sum up the case, as it were. He says:

"Now, sir, what do I ask in this bill? I ask, and I appeal to my fellow-Senators if it is not fair to these constituents of mine, that they shall have leave to go to the Patent Office, and file a specification of what they claim to be the original inventors of; that the Commissioner of Patents shall then give notice to the whole world that these things are claimed, so that Hussey, and McCormick, and Atkinson, and anybody and everybody, may come in, and see whether Moore & Hascall are the original inventors of this machine or not. And now let me inquire, what does the argument of the Senator from Wisconsin go to show? Either that there will be an investigation which will be fair, and will secure to these men what belongs to them, or else that the Senate has to come to the conclusion that the Commissioner of Patents and the judge of the court to whom the appeal may be taken, are not entitled to the common confidence of the community."

Did I ever take any such position? Never. It is an unfair inference from my argument. I stated that such proof might be produced that the most honest and astute man in the world, whether as Commissioner of Patents or judge of the court of appeals, would have to be governed by it to an extent that would amount to a fraud upon the community and other inventors.

"What room is there for these sweeping declarations and denunciations, when the bill is guarded?"

Wonderfully guarded, sir? They are to have all that appears in the model made as far back, the Senator intimates, as 1832; all that appears in a model that was burnt eighteen years ago, and which, though it might have been supplied seventeen years ago, they never have supplied. They are to have what was contained in that model, which he does not produce, which he does not show to the Senate, which he does not show to anybody, but which, after they get the bill passed, they will bring forward; and, if they please, they can bring it forward containing everything that goes to constitute any reaping machine, whether patented by anybody else or not.

The Senator says:

"I repeat, Moore & Hascall must prove, according to it, that they are the original inventors of everything they claim, or they cannot have the extension. What is the effect of it? I mean to be fair, and I will state it. It is to save all question of abandonment to these men while they have been applying to Congress; that is all."

Bear that in mind. Here is an assertion that all that is asked by this bill is to relieve these gentlemen from an abandonment from the time they made application to Congress up to the present. We shall see presently whether that is all.

He says, further:

"They have been since 1850 urging Congress to pass this bill; and it is therefore so framed as not to allow this time to be pleaded against them, and thereby to make out an abandonment of their inventions. That is the whole thing, and it is all there is of it. Is there any reason against it?"

We have seen whether this is all. We have seen that not only for the purpose of improvement can they have everything they have invented, whether patented by others or not, from the time of the invention up to 1850, but they can go back to the first existence of the model, and prove that by oral testimony, what was contained in that by way of original patent, and then upon the top of that all improvements made since 1836. The Senator says the object is to save all question of abandonment to these men while they have been applying to Congress. He says "that is all." Is that all? We shall see. Let us see what else he says:

"The only point in dispute is as to that sickle. I say McCormick holds a patent for it running for fourteen years from 1845."

That was nine years ago:

"We claim that he has no right to it. We claim that it is an invention of these men, and that they are entitled to it, and ought to have the emoluments growing out of it. The bill proposes to put them in a condition where they can contest that question. They cannot contest it now. Suppose some man has a suit with McCormick, and proves that Moore & Hascall invented the sickle; he defeats McCormick, but does not help Moore & Hascall."

We see whether the relief from an abandonment during the time they have been applying to Congress is the whole object. We see that, so far from that being all they ask, they want to go back nine years, and snatch and grab from the patent of McCormick, of 1845, the sickle. Do not, then, let the Senator say that the going back to the time of their application to Congress is their whole object. He has admitted himself that it is to meet the abandonment of at least nine years in regard to that sickle. That we have from his own lips. There it is. It is in your speech, sir. It will be recorded in the Globe. It will go to the country that that is what you claim. The very least, in the time of the abandonment of that sickle for which you seek relief, is nine years. Yes, it is proposed to put them behind McCormick's nine years ago. Why, Mr. President and Senators, what has taken place in that time? How many hundreds and thousands have got these reapers within that time? That is the cutting machine of the country. Every man who finds a difficulty in procuring manual labor has one of these machines, or one of Hussey's; and while that is the case, it is proposed to let the modest Moore & Hascall, those men who are contrasted with others because they are honest, go behind a patent which was issued nine years ago; and yet the Senator who advocates the bill says it is only to meet an abandonment of the time during which they have been before Congress. This language is very emphatic. He says:

"The only point in dispute is as to that sickle. I say McCormick holds a patent running for fourteen years from 1845. We claim that he has no right to it."

Why did they not make that claim before the Patent Office, when McCormick was seeking to obtain a patent? Why did they not interfere with him then, and show that he had not the priority of invention. They were, forsooth, too modest. They were not blood-suckers. They were not such blood-suckers as to seek the protection of the law for their rights. They did not seek that; but they afterwards come into Congress for an extension to compete with men who had complied with the law. That is the argument. The Senator says, again:

"McCormick is making reapers under two patents, one of which he took out in 1845, and which, as I claim, is for the sickle that Moore & Hascall commenced using in 1836. But he took it out in 1845, and it has fourteen years from that time to run."

Will you bear that in mind, that he took out a patent in 1845 for a sickle which Moore & Hascall commenced using in 1836? From his own lips, then, here is an abandonment from which they are to be relieved, running through a period of eighteen years—a period not only of nine, but of twice nine. And is the Senate asked to pass such a bill—such a nefarious bill, as I say it is?

But there is an important matter, in conclusion, here, which is thrown out by way of argument; and, Mr. President, it would be a most admirable argument before a jury in the gorge of some mountain, by one who had never seen a law book, or heard a lawyer speak. The argument is this:

"They cannot contest it now. Suppose some man has a suit with McCormick, and proves that Moore & Hascall invented the sickle; he defeats McCormick, but does not help Moore & Hascall."

Why do they not help Moore & Hascall? Simply because Moore & Hascall do not manufacture the machines. If they invented the sickle, as far back as 1836, and had gone to work, as men of public spirit ought to have done, they would have manufactured the machine, and then let Mr. McCormick sue, as he would have done, I assure you; and then, I apprehend, if they had shown a priority over him of nine years, and if they had proved what the Senator said, that McCormick had no rights, they could go on and manufacture under their own rights. This argument, then, is fallacious. The simple reason why they cannot benefit themselves by a contest of this kind is, that they do not manufacture the machine themselves, but only step in as witnesses for others who are infringers and pirates. The Senator further says:

"Now, sir, after providing, as the bill does, for this renewal and extension, upon complete examination by witnesses before the Commissioner of Patents; after providing, as it does, for an appeal as in all other cases, suppose a patent be granted. The question is still left open, before the courts of the United States, whenever the parties choose to try it, between Moore & Hascall and McCormick, or anybody else, as to who is the original inventor. What injury, then, can be done by this?"

And I will say the question is open now. Let Moore & Hascall go to work, if they please, and manufacture this machine; and if they are sued, and can show priority, they will defeat the men who sue them. They can go on and manufacture the machine if they will establish their priority, which we all know is a sufficient defense upon a patent suit. Therefore, the argument in this particular fails. But they are not contented with the rights that they have. They must come here and ask Congress to set itself up as a judge, and decide who has priority, or at least relieve them from eighteen years abandonment, and give them a hearing before the Patent Office, to test the question with men who have had patents, undisputed upon the points named, for the last nine years.

I come now, sir, to where I wish to put a question to the Senator from Michigan. It is one somewhat personal to myself. I find this singular declaration in his speech:

"Now, sir, I ask—and I ask it with some sort of confidence, and not a little of feeling—if, when the Senate of the United States is presented with a bill which is simply to put these men on a footing with others, which is to give them a patent for what they shall actually prove, after notice and full hearing, that they originally invented, it can, with propriety, be characterized as an enormous proposition? Sir, I know something about this matter; I know a little about the agencies; I know a little about the propelling power; and, sir, I can say to you that I know on some subjects a little more than I wish to know."

Mr. President, the Senator told us a great deal about what he did know. He has at last come to something which he knows that he is sorry for. I wish to ask him this question: Does he intend, by that, that he knows anything in connection with myself and this matter that he imputes as dishonorable?

Mr. STUART. I will say to the Senator, as I said to him in the outset, that I do not propose to be catechised, and to answer his questions while he has the floor. When he gets through, if I think it necessary to reply, I will answer that among all his other questions.

Mr. WALKER. I have no right to presume that the Senator intended to make a personal insinuation. Cowards and knaves only do that. Men of courage and of honor speak out what they mean of a personal character. I class the Senator with the brave and magnanimous; and, consequently, have no right to infer against him that he meant a personal imputation; but this much I will say, as to every and any one beneath the canopy of God's heaven, such a charge cannot by implication or by express language be made without the perpetration of a most damnable falsehood; and by that, sir, I do not intend to refer to the Senator from Michigan specially; for I say I do not place him in the category of those who make such charges by insinuation. I have heard him on this floor often enough to know that, when he intends a personal insinuation, he will speak right out; and I far prefer it from him, or from anybody else, to a sly insinuation. I should not have put the question, but that I had heard some others wondering what Mr. STUART meant.

Now, in regard to these agencies, as I have already said, I have never seen an agent of Mr. McCormick. He has never sent one to me. If he had, he should never have spoken to me again himself; but having no agents, having no hirelings hanging about him, I have, from the commencement of this matter, given him a full opportunity to inform me in regard to his own rights, and to enlighten me in regard to my own and the rights of my fellow-citizens in Wisconsin. I have indulged him; and since the charges were made by the Senator the other day against him in so broad terms, denouncing me for trying to sustain him, and denouncing him for having obeyed the law, he has furnished me with the most ample proof to justify every opinion I had formed. I am proud to stand by his rights when assailed, as he has no position here to defend himself. I am prepared with testimony tenfold what I have brought forward to sustain that man, to sustain his action in favor of himself and in favor of his country; and if that be wrong, let the Senator herald it to the world. For my part, I say I am proud of it.

I now hand over to the Senator the testimony of the witnesses and the patent, which I say did not contain in 1836 as specific a claim for the sickle as is contained in McCormick's patent of 1834. I will furnish him with any other testimony which I have quoted. I will furnish him with a copy of his speech. I will furnish him with anything of the kind; and let him now reflect that, so far as I made any statements which he denied on a previous occasion; I have submitted the proof for them, and if it is not satisfactory to the Senate, I have some other.

Mr. STUART. I am very far from desiring to detain the Senate here with a discussion which might be very appropriate if the cause were on trial before a court, and with not a very intelligent jury to decide upon it, and I am perfectly willing that the question shall now be submitted to the Senate as to the engrossment of the bill, without saying one word. With all respect to the Senator from Wisconsin, I have heard nothing which makes it necessary to add to what I said before. I stated then what I state now, and I have the papers here to show that Moore & Hascall disclaimed in their patent, when they made their application, all right to an invention of a threshing machine, or for a fanning mill, or for anything of that sort. They simply claim to have invented a reel and sickle. I believe the Senate are disposed to take a vote at this time; I will, therefore, not detain them.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; and on the question of ordering it to be engrossed for a third reading, Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If the vote is to be taken now, I have only a few words to say on the question. I have no feeling upon it one way or the other. I do not know the parties. I only regret that harsh things have been said of a constituent of mine, whom I believe to be a very worthy man—Mr. McCormick. I do not think imputations upon his character can be justly made. In regard to the controversy about the renewal of these patents, I do not see my way clear to vote for any of them when the patent has expired. My ground of objection is this: I see no power under the Constitution to reinvest in an individual a right which has been vested in the public. Before a patent expires, and while it is still private property, it is very probable that Congress has the power to continue it as such, under the provision in the Constitution which authorizes the securing of the right for a limited time to inventors; but when that period of time has expired, and the right to use it is vested in the public, every man then has a right to invest his capital in it, and when the public has thus become possessed of it, and manufacturing establishments have grown up for the manufacture of machines, and large amounts of capital have been invested, I doubt whether there is any constitutional power in the Government to divest that right and to render that capital valueless. I see no power under the Constitution to renew a patent which has expired, or to invest a right in an individual which has previously vested in the public. For that reason, on this constitutional ground, I feel compelled to vote against renewing any patent in any case where the period for which it was issued has expired. There are grounds of expediency connected with this, but I rest my vote on this one ground, without going into the argument.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, on the engrossment of the bill, resulted—yeas 12, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Cass, Foot, Hamlin, Houston, James, Johnson, Mallory, Norris, Thompson of Kentucky, and Williams—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Brodhead, Clayton, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Geyer, Hunter, Rockwell, Seward, Stuart, Wade, and Walker—20.

So the bill was rejected.

Mr. STUART first voted "aye," but before the result was announced, said: Inasmuch as I shall move to reconsider the vote, I change my vote and vote "no." I hope I shall be able to get Senators to understand the question.

The result having been announced,

Mr. STUART said: I move to reconsider that vote. If the Senate desire it, I will go into the discussion of the question now, and I am entirely prepared to do so, if it is desired; but I was in hopes that the Senate would have been fuller, and that there would have been a full investigation of the case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. STUART. I say, if the Senate desire to reconsider that question I will proceed now, or I am willing to postpone its consideration.

Mr. HUNTER. Close it up now.

Mr. STUART. I suggest what I have already said, that I consider this case to be one of the plainest, if the facts can be presented to the Senate and Senators will take occasion to look at them, that ever was presented anywhere upon a question of justice. I should like, when I proceed with my remarks on the subject, that it should be done with a full Senate. The Senate is very thin today. It was difficult to obtain a quorum on the vote which has just been taken.

Mr. BADGER. I suggest to the Senator either to move to postpone the consideration of his motion until to-morrow, or withdraw it now, and he can make it to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I am aware that I can do that to-morrow, but I do not want to do anything that is not entirely fair and proper, and according to the wishes of the Senate. The subject is one in which I feel a great deal of interest, and which I conceive myself perfectly able to explain.

Mr. BADGER. I move that the motion lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. WALKER. That motion can be ordered to lie on the table and be called up again, I suppose. I presume the motion of the Senator from North Carolina is, that the motion to reconsider lie on the table.

Mr. BADGER. Certainly.

Mr. STUART. That motion is not debatable, and if I were to propose to take it up, I might not be able to explain anything about it, as the Senate might refuse to take it up.

Mr. BADGER. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of the motion to reconsider until to-morrow.

Mr. DIXON. I have no objection to the postponement. I was at a loss how to vote on the question of the engrossment of the bill, because I had not heard the discussion upon it. I really desire to vote understandingly; and I shall be very glad to hear what may be said further on the subject. I think the suggestion made by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] is one which should bear with a great deal of force upon the question. The principle suggested by him as to the power to divest the people of a right which is already vested in them is one which should enter into the question.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

GOLD COINAGE.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senate will proceed to consider the bill which was reported some time ago from the Committee on Finance, "to authorize the coinage of gold pieces of the value respectively of ten eagles and five eagles, and for other purposes." The objection of the Senator from New York [Mr. FISH] to it will be obviated by several amendments, which I am authorized by the committee to propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) It requires the unanimous consent to consider that bill to-day.

Mr. GWIN. I hope there will be no objection to it. The bill was laid aside the other day on the objection of a single Senator. The mail goes to California in a few days, and it is very important that our action upon the bill should be known there as soon as possible. It is desirable, for many reasons, that the bill should be acted upon at once.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, resumed the consideration of the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. GWIN. I am authorized by the Committee on Finance to move to amend the bill by striking out the fourth and fifth sections, as follows:

"SEC. 4. And he it further enacted, That the Director of the Mint, in the regulations he is authorized to make for the assay office in New York, shall place depositors of gold bullion in that office upon the same footing as depositors of gold in the Mint at Philadelphia and branches.

"SEC. 5. And he it further enacted, That it shall be at the option of persons depositing gold or silver in bullion or in foreign coins at the assay office in the city of New York, to receive the mint value of the same, either in refined bars or in bars made from the identical metal without refining, but in either case to bear a stamp of the weight, fineness, and mint value; and so much of any law heretofore passed as authorizes any other mode of payment or return for such deposits is hereby repealed."

Mr. HUNTER. I agree to the amendment, because I do not wish to embarrass that portion of the bill which meets with the general assent of the Senate, by connecting it with another subject; but, sir, this amendment relates to a subject which will have to be acted upon, and in regard to which I shall probably move before the close of the session. I propose to do so upon one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. FISH. I understand that the amendment is to strike out entirely the two sections to which I excepted before?

Mr. GWIN. Yes, sir.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GWIN. The next amendment of the committee is in the seventh section, to strike out the words:

"And the Director, under like rules and regulations, shall acquire and keep a collection of all medals that have been, or may be, struck by the United States, or any of the States or Territories of the United States, and also of all such as may be struck at the Mint under the provision hereof."

And to insert in lieu of these words, the following:

And the Director shall cause to be struck in bronze a duplicate copy of every medal struck at the Mint under the authority of this section, and shall transmit the same to the Library of Congress, to be there retained.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in the ninth section, after the words "the annual salary of clerks in the Mint of the United States to be eighteen hundred dollars each," the words "from and after the 1st of July, 1854."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was in section eleven, to insert the words "and the assay office in New York" so as to provide that the appointment of clerks and assistants in "the offices of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and in the offices of the Mint and branches thereof, and the assay office in New York, shall respectively be made with the approbation of the President."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I desire to offer an amendment to which I presume there will be no objection. It is to come in in the ninth section, which relates to the salaries of the clerks in the Mint. The increase provided for in that section, is to carry out the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, in which he said:

"The salaries allowed by law to clerks employed in the former," [the Mint at Philadelphia,] "have been found insufficient to retain the best, and recently two of the most skillful and experienced clerks left on that account."

It is entirely proper to increase the salaries of the clerks as proposed. I wish to have a further increase, by adding at the end of that section the following:

And from and after the first day of July, 1854, the salary of the director of the Mint at Philadelphia shall be $5,000, and the salary of the treasurer thereof shall be $3,000.

The treasurer now receives a salary of $2,000, and $1,000 for paying pensions, and two sums of $500 for other duties, making $4,000 in all. I propose, therefore, to raise his salary to $5,000. When the salary of the director of the Mint at Philadelphia was fixed at $3,500, which was done, I think, in 1837 or 1838, there were some three millions of dollars coined at Philadelphia annually. There are now nearly $70,000,000 coined there. Since that time there has been added to the care of the director, the branch Mint in California, perhaps the branch Mint at New Orleans, and certainly the assay office in New York. Twice as much labor is thrown upon him as was in 1837, when his salary was fixed at $3,500. The salary of the assistant treasurer at New York, who also has charge of the assay office there, is $6,000. I wish to have something like equality among those officers. Surely if there is a necessity for raising the clerks' salaries in the Mint at Philadelphia, there is equal necessity for raising the salary of the principal officer, which was fixed at the same time as the other salaries were. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be agreed to. Its effect will be to give to the director and treasurer each $5,000 a year.

Mr. GWIN. I have not the slightest objection to that, but I think it was the opinion of the Committee on Finance that it would be better to provide for this increase of salary in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, where the whole subject could regularly come up. I do not oppose the amendment, but I think that if there be objection to it, it would be better for the Senator to withdraw it at this time. I am in favor of bringing up the subject of increasing the compensation of these officers, not only in the Mint at Philadelphia, but elsewhere. Let it be done on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. I have no objection to the amendment, as I said before, but I hope the Senator will withdraw it now, if there is opposition to it, and not press it on this bill.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. President, I am not disposed to go further now than we have gone in this bill. It was necessary to make some provision for the salaries of the clerks of the Mint, because they were leaving Philadelphia and going to New York. The difference in compensation between the two places was such that it was impossible to keep some of the best clerks in the Mint at Philadelphia with the existing salaries. But I was not disposed to go further; certainly not in this bill. I am not prepared to say that I would vote $5,000 to the treasurer or Director of the Mint. I am not prepared to say that I would give those officers so high a grade of salary. The Senator from Pennsylvania refers to the assistant treasurer at the port of New York, who has custody of an immense amount of revenue. He is not a mere officer of the Mint, but one who is assistant treasurer at the port of New York, and who has the custody of the large amount of revenues collected there. Of course you have to give him large compensation, because he has to provide large bonds. His risk is great, and his responsibilities are large. I am not willing to vote this increase of salaries. When the general bill comes up I shall be willing to consider the subject. I do not, however, commit myself either way upon the subject of increased salaries here.

Mr. BRODHEAD. It is true the treasurer at New York has charge of a large sum of money; but has not the treasurer of the Mint at Philadelphia charge of quite as much, if not more? His bonds are $300,000. Surely there can be no real objection to this increase. It will not embarrass this bill. It will strengthen it, I will venture to inform the Senator from California. This is so just and fair a proposition that it seems to me it cannot be resisted. It ought to go into this bill because it relates to the Mint. The salaries of the clerks in the Mint are increased by this very bill. Then why not increase the salary of the principal in the same bill? The director of the Mint at Philadelphia has charge of all the branch Mints, and thus a larger amount of labor is thrown upon him, more than was required at his hands when his salary was fixed at the present rate. In all probability this amendment will not embarrass the bill at all. I hope it will be agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. The assistant treasurer at New York has now the custody of something like $29,000,000. It is certain that his responsibilities are greater than those of the treasurer of the Mint can be. As I understand the statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, the treasurer of the Mint now receives, in salary and allowances, something like $4,000 a year. I am not disposed to increase this to $5,000; nor am I disposed, from anything I have heard as yet, to give so large a salary to the director of the Mint. I think no reason has been shown why we should make this increase, unless we go on with the general subject of salaries, and increase them all. If we begin with this, I do not see why we shall not be forced to go among all the officers of the country, increase the salaries of the custom-house officers, and others, and make a general advance. Inasmuch as I am not prepared to vote for that, I am not willing to vote for this amendment on this bill.

Mr. DAWSON. I hope the amendment will be withdrawn; but if we are to go on the general subject of an increase of salaries, I desire to be heard. It is proposed to increase these salaries to a large amount; and it is urged that they should be increased because of the large bonds which the officers have to give. Now, we all know practically that a bond of $300,000 amounts to nothing. The amount of the bond never regulates the amount of salary.

I hope, sir, the question will be postponed until we take up the subject of salaries generally. Why should we give $5,000 to an officer of this kind? It is a salary almost equal to that of the head of one of our Departments, who is engaged here during the whole season. If we are to begin with this system, let us begin with the head, with the President, and come down and take in all the officers, and not have an increase in detail in this way in a bill of this kind.

Mr. BRODHEAD. The objections urged by the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from Georgia apply to the bill now under consideration. It proposes to increase salaries. It provides for an increase in the salaries of the clerks in the Mint. Then, while we have under consideration the subject of the salaries of the different officers connected with the Mint, why not consider them all? There is a particular reason why the director of the Mint should have an increase of salary. Additional duties have been thrown upon him. His labors have been trebled, and the responsibilities of his office have been trebled since 1837, when his present salary was fixed.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to suggest to my honorable friend from Pennsylvania a reason which, I hope, will be sufficient to induce him to withdraw his amendment. I am in favor of his proposition, and will support it when it properly comes up. But it is not exactly germane to this bill, and that is an objection which is very well taken against it by those who raise the objection here. To that he makes the answer that we do already, by this bill, increase the salaries of the clerks in the Mint. It is sufficient to reply to that, there is no objection, so far as that is concerned, and it does not hinder the passage of this bill. But the Senator will only embarrass the bill and endanger it, without effecting his object, by insisting on the amendment; whereas he will be sure of the support of all of us who agree with him in principle whenever the question can come up when it is germane and legitimate. I hope, therefore, he will withdraw the amendment, and allow the bill to pass.

Mr. DAWSON. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. DAWSON. I will not insist upon the motion if the amendment be withdrawn; but we were told, when the bill was taken up, that it would only occupy a few minutes.

Mr. BRODHEAD. If I had supposed there would be any objection to this amendment, I should not have consented to the consideration of the bill because I regard the passage of the bill, without the amendment, as a defeat of it entirely.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from Georgia will withdraw his motion. I think we can take a vote in a minute.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not desire to go into a discussion, but to gratify my friends, I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SLIDELL. I wish to state that if the amendment be pressed by the Senator from Pennsylvania, I shall be under the necessity of offering an amendment for an increase of the salaries of the officers of the Mint in New Orleans. It has always been my intention, at the proper time, to make such a proposition, but while I have no disposition to embarrass his amendment at all, I must say, the effect of its being pressed at this moment, will be to open the whole subject.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I can show that at New Orleans the officers have received more than those at Philadelphia, and yet the New Orleans Mint is a mere branch. But, sir, as it seems to be the general desire of the Senate that I should withdraw the amendment, I will do so.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendments were concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read a third time.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. WALKER. I wish to make no other opposition to the passage of the bill than to record my vote against it, if the Senate will grant me the yeas and nays. I ask for them.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Badger, Benjamin, Brown, Clay, Douglas, Evans, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Gillette, Gray, Hunter, James, Johnson, Mallory, Norris, Pearce, Rockwell, Rusk, Seward, Shields, Slidell, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, and Williams—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Atchison, Bright, Brodhead, Chase, Dawson, Dodge of Iowa, Fessenden, Hamlin, Houston, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, and Walker—13.

So the bill was passed.

The bill as passed proposes to enact that there may be coined and issued by the Mint of the United States, or by such of the branch Mints as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct, a gold coin of the weight of two thousand five hundred and eighty grains, of the value of one hundred dollars; and another of the weight of one thousand two hundred and ninety grains, of the value of fifty dollars, each of which coins shall be of the standard fineness now prescribed by law for the gold coins of the United States. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to cause the necessary dies and other apparatus to be prepared, by proper and skillful artists, under the superintendence of the Director of the Mint at Philadelphia, for coining the above coins, with such devices, mottoes, and figures as may be approved by the President of the United States, the expense of which shall be defrayed from the ordinary appropriations for the expenses of the Mint and branch Mints of the United States. The coins provided for are to be a legal tender, and to be received at their respective values as established by this bill, in payment of all dues to the United States.

The bill also proposes to repeal all laws heretofore passed authorizing any foreign gold or silver coins to pass current as money and be receivable in payment of debts; and makes it the duty of the Director of the Mint to append to his annual report of the operations of the Mint a statement showing the average weight, fineness, and Mint value of such foreign coins as are usually imported into the United States, upon assay in the Mint.

It further authorizes the Director, under such rules and regulations, and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe, to provide for striking medals for such States, Territories, associations, societies, and individuals, as the rules shall include; and he is to cause to be struck in bronze a duplicate copy of every medal so struck at the Mint, and to transmit the same to the Library of Congress, to be there retained. All expenses incurred on account of the striking of such medals shall be paid by the said States, Territories, associations, societies, and individuals respectively, for which or whom they may be struck. The President is authorized, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, to appoint an assistant Director of the Mint, at an annual salary of $2,500.

The seventh section of the act of January 18, 1837, is proposed to be so amended as to extend the limit for the annual salary of clerks in the Mint of the United States to $1,800 each, after July 1, 1854, at the discretion of the officers authorized by law to appoint, with the approbation of the President of the United States; and the second section of the act of July 3, 1852, is to be so amended as to allow the clerks authorized to be employed therein, $3,000 per annum each, from and after the 1st of July next. All appointments of clerks and assistants authorized to be employed in the offices of the assistant treasurers of the United States, and in the offices of the Mint and branches thereof, and in the New York assay-office, are to be made with the approbation of the President.

It is further provided that all laws now in force in relation to the coins of the United States, and the striking and coining the same, shall, so far as applicable, have full force and effect in relation to the coins now authorized, whether those laws are penal or otherwise; and whether they are for preventing counterfeiting or debasement, for protecting the currency, for regulating and guarding the process of striking and coining and the preparations therefor, or for the security of the coin, or for any other purpose. In adjusting the weights of the gold coins now authorized, the following deviations from the standard weight are not to be exceeded in any of the single pieces, namely: in the ten eagle piece and the five eagle piece, one half of a grain; and in weighing a large number of pieces together, when delivered from the chief coiner to the treasurer, and from the treasurer to the depositors, the deviation from the standard weight shall not exceed seven pennyweights in one thousand ten eagle pieces, or five pennyweights in one thousand five eagle pieces.

ABIGAIL STAFFORD.

On the motion of Mr. WALKER, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution explanatory of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Abigail Stafford."

It provides that in making payment under the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of Abigail Stafford," the Secretary of the Treasury allow interest upon the sum appropriated, according to the principles of equity and justice; that is, at the rate which would have been allowed had the amount been subscribed under the funding system.

Mr. WALKER. I wish to propose an amendment to the joint resolution to strike out the words "interest upon the sum appropriated by said act, according to the principles of equity and justice; that is, at the rate which would have been allowed had the amount been subscribed under the funding system," and to substitute in lieu of them these words: "interest at the rate of three per cent. from the 4th day of July, 1778, to the day of the passage of said act." That is about the rate at which interest would be allowed under the funding system, if it had been provided for in the bill making the original appropriation. In that bill the words employed were that the claim should be paid according to the principles of equity and justice. The intention of the committee was, at that time, that the amount should be paid according to the terms proposed by my amendment; but when the matter passed under the revision of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, he decided that he would not pay interest, according to the intention of the committee. This resolution is explanatory of the original act, and is to give the claimant the interest at about the rate which would have been paid under the funding system. If the resolution be perfected in this form, I shall ask that the original report may be read, so that the Senate may judge what it is.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to hear the report read.

Mr. WALKER. In the case of this explanatory resolution no report was made; but upon the original claim there was a report, which I ask may now be read.

The Secretary read the report referred to, from which it appears that Abigail Stafford was the daughter of Henry Smith, of Massachusetts, who enlisted on the 19th of April, 1775, and served in the ever memorable battle of Lexington, in which he was wounded. He afterwards served four years and eleven months during the war. On the 26th of December, 1775, at Dorchester, he received a certificate from the Secretary of State of Massachusetts as a soldier; and he was at the battle of White Plains, where he was stationed at an outpost.

Thomas Bacon, the uncle of the petitioner, served in the army, and was deprived of the use of his feet. The father of the petitioner died from wounds received in the service of the country, leaving her an orphan, her patrimony consisting of $1,800 of Continental money, which, from its depreciation, became wholly useless. On the 18th of April, 1777, her grandfather guided the troops to the battle of Lexington, and had five sons and five sons-in-law in that battle. The report also states that there is testimony to prove that she furnished supplies to the army by carding, spinning, knitting, and making clothes for the soldiers.

The committee recommended that the claimant should receive a pension; but thinking that a sum in gross would better meet her wants, they reported a bill for that purpose.

Mr. BRIGHT. I should like to inquire how much was appropriated by the original bill.

Mr. WALKER. I think the amount was something like $1,800.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then there is to be interest for seventy-five years, at three per cent., allowed on $1,800. I do not wish to be considered as opposing the claim, but I shall vote against it. At the time I had the honor of being the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, I examined and reported against it. I never could find facts to sustain the original allowance, to say nothing of interest.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have had no opportunity of looking into the facts, to see whether the original allowance was right or not; but if it was, I think this joint resolution is certainly right, though it is upon a principle which has not been very generally accepted on the part of some gentlemen here. It is precisely the principle of the Galphin claim—the allowance of interest on a demand originating in the Revolution for the particular or general defense. There was a great clamor in regard to that claim made by small politicians, and I believe it is continued still in some pretty respectable quarters; and it is contended that interest ought not to be allowed on that class of cases. I hold that it ought to be allowed in such a case. I hold that it was just in that case, and I hold that it is so in this. But I desire to state the principle on which that case rested.

It was a debt assumed by one of the States of this Union for the particular or general defense during the Revolution, and on that ground it was contended that it should bear interest. I believe Virginia got one or two millions on the same principle by an act passed in 1832. If the original debt in this case be right—and of that I know nothing but from the fact of its allowance—it seems to have been a debt created for the general or particular defense of the United States during the Revolution. That is the basis of it; and if it be such a case, interest ought to be allowed. A great deal of clamor was raised about the application of the principle in the case to which I have referred. I believe that many gentlemen even in the public councils joined in it. Inasmuch as I consider the principle to be a sound one, I shall support this joint resolution, but I do not wish anybody to vote for it with a misapprehension of the principle upon which it is based.

Mr. BAYARD. The original bill, as I understand the report of the committee, (I heard nothing of it before,) rested on a state of facts, which are rehearsed by the committee. They recommended the granting of a pension to the daughter of a revolutionary soldier, and then they recommended, in lieu of that pension, that a gross sum should be allowed. That bill passed, and the sum, of course, is payable, and I suppose has been paid. Now the attempt is to allow interest on that sum from 1778 down to the time of the passage of that bill. Since I have been in this body, I have known, repeatedly, cases where the allowance of interest was rejected on claims quite as meritorious as this in every respect. This is not the case of a debt. It is a case where a pension was recommended to be allowed to a party, and it is purely a gratuity. I cannot see how, in such a case, there is any principle which would justify the allowance of interest for seventy-five years. I shall, at all events, ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

Mr. EVANS. I desire to say merely that the interest on this claim, as proposed to be allowed by the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, will amount to $4,050. So far as I have had anything to do with these ancient claims since I have been here, I can say that interest has not been allowed.

Mr. WALKER. The Constitution of the United States provides that private property shall not be taken for public use except upon the payment of a just and adequate consideration. I cannot, for my life, see the distinction between depriving a citizen directly of a thousand dollars worth of property for the public use, and doing it indirectly, by using a sum which would, in interest, equal that amount through a given number of years. The report which has been read was made by a Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. JAMES,] under the direction of the committee, some two years ago. The committee, in examining the case, found in its details some very peculiar circumstances attending it. There seemed to be a disposition on the part of this family to make sacrifices that actually left them destitute, as it were, of the means of support, for the time being. I think that the detail of the case will show that there was as great an amount of patriotism and devotion shown as could be exhibited in the Revolution. The advance of provisions, the manning of boats, the taking of provisions, everything of the kind entered into the case. No part of the money was paid until the passage of the bill which this resolution proposes to explain. Then I cannot see why we may not, in justice in this case, under all the circumstances, allow this small sum of interest, which would have been allowed if the debt had been subscribed, as it might have been, under the funding system.

Mr. BAYARD. Whether interest should be allowed on this claim or not, the committee give no reasons for the allowance of it. Take their report: it presents a state of facts which justified the passage of the original bill, and no more; and that in the shape of a gratuity. The result of their judgment was that a pension ought to be allowed to the child of a revolutionary officer; but they substituted, in lieu of that, the recommendation of an allowance of a gross sum of money, and in that shape the bill passed. They give no reason why interest should be allowed. That question is not touched. In regard to the resolution before you, which claims the allowance of interest, I take it for granted that the reason ought to be given why no application was made to the Government before for a pension. You are now asked to allow interest for a period of nearly seventy-five years, without any evidence whatever on which to base it. Why did not the party apply before, during the whole of that period of time, for the payment of the money? The Government of the United States was amply capable of paying any sum, even if it were a gratuity. Surely there has always been ample disposition to extend to revolutionary soldiers and their descendants every relief which could be rightfully claimed for them. I have never seen any indisposition to do that. And if the neglect of the parties themselves prevented the application being made to the Government for the payment of the claim, either as a gratuity or a debt, on what principle can they come forward, and ask for seventy-five years' interest, while the money was lying in the Treasury, out of which they might have been paid, if it had not been for their own negligence? No reason is given on the face of the report why interest should be paid in this case.

The amendment was agreed to; the resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

On the question of ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed for a third reading, Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 13, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dodge of Wisconsin, Foot, Gillette, Houston, James, Rockwell, Rusk, Sebastian, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wade, and Walker—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Brown, Chase, Clay, Dawson, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson, Norris, Pearce, Seward, Sidel, Stuart, Toucey, and Williams—25.

So the joint resolution was rejected.

ADDITIONAL CIRCUIT.

Mr. GWIN, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill in addition to an act approved March 3, 1837, entitled "An act supplemental to an act entitled 'An act to amend the judicial system of the United States;'" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. GWIN. The bill is to establish another judicial circuit, composed of the State of California, and the Territories of Oregon and Washington. Inasmuch as the Committee on the Judiciary have acted on the subject, I move that the bill be printed, and it can go on the Calendar. I give notice that I shall, at an early day, call it up for consideration.

The motion to print was agreed to.

JOSHUA CHAMBERLAIN.

On motion by Mr. WADE, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill for the relief of the heirs of Captain Joshua Chamberlain, deceased.

It proposes to direct that there be paid to the heirs of Joshua Chamberlain, deceased, late a captain in the Army of the Revolution, an amount equal to the half pay of a captain from the end of the war to Chamberlain's death, on the first of January, 1812; and also to authorize the issue of a warrant to his heirs for such bounty land as they are entitled to in virtue of his services.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I trust not. I hope we may get through to-morrow with the discussion of the veto message, so as to go on with the homestead bill, and other matters of importance.

Mr. BAYARD. I make the motion, and ask for a vote upon it.

Mr. ADAMS called for the yeas and nays; which were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 22, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Benjamin, Brodhead, Clay, Dawson, Evans, Fish, Foor, Geyer, Hamlin, Johnson, Norris, Pearce, Rusk, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Tancey, and Wade—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Brown, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Gillette, Houston, Mallory, Rockwell, Seward, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Walker, and Williams—18.

So the motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN ROWE.

On motion by Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate resumed the consideration of the House bill for the relief of Benjamin Rowe.

This bill was at first reported on adversely by the Senate Committee on Pensions, for these reasons: Rowe, in his petition, alleged that he enlisted in the twenty-first regiment, United States infantry on the 10th March, 1812-'13, and continued in the service until he was honorably discharged at Fort Erie, on the 12th of October, 1814; that he was taken prisoner, with his company, by the British, while on the march to Sackett's Harbor, and transported to Quebec, a prisoner of war; that in consequence of his hardships while a prisoner his health was broken, and he was put ashore from the prison-ship by order of the British surgeon; that he is now totally disabled (by ill health, resulting from his treatment while a prisoner) from procuring a support, and he therefore prays a pension. This petition was first presented to Congress in 1842, and had been several times reported against for want of sufficient evidence. Among the papers accompanying the bill, the committee could not find any evidence of an official or record character to prove his enlistment, service, or discharge, as a soldier of the United States, neither was the absence of such proof accounted for, or any indication shown in the papers that the case had ever been referred to the proper office for investigation. In the opinion of the committee, the alleged facts of enlistment and discharge could, if true, be proved by the rolls of the war office; and if not, some reason could be shown why it was necessary to resort to the fugitive certificates (not one of them properly authenticated) which accompany the petition.

The bill was subsequently recommittees with additional papers, among which the committee found the proof before wanting amply supplied in a copy of the discharge of Rowe, properly certified by Hon. F. Burt, Third Auditor of the Treasury; in which the facts of his enlistment, captivity, &c., are fully and satisfactorily stated. With this addition to the evidence, they were satisfied to concur in the views of the committee of the House, and recommended the bill pass.

The bill proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Benjamin Rowe on the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence January 1, 1854, and to continue during his natural life.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

BRIG GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

Mr. SLIDELL. I ask the Senate now to proceed to the consideration of the bill for the relief of the claimants of the private armed brig General Armstrong.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being made, the bill is under consideration, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WALKER. When it was proposed to call up that bill before, some one said that it would lead to a lengthy discussion.

Mr. SLIDELL. If that be the case, it is a stronger reason for taking it up now.

Mr. WALKER. I merely made the suggestion because it is late in the day.

Mr. SLIDELL. Then I should prefer to have it first on the Calendar next Friday. I have no sort of objection, if that course should be preferred by the Senate, to have this bill continued until next Friday, if, by general consent, it be considered as first for discussion on that day.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator from Louisiana will allow me to suggest, that if I now move an adjournment the bill will come up as the unfinished business on next Friday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BADGER. We cannot get through with it to-day, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 16, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of a bill of the following title:

A bill further to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage in the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1851; and the act amendatory thereto, passed March 30, 1852.

The call for the previous question was seconded.

A motion was made that the bill and amendments be laid upon the table.

Mr. SKELTON, by unanimous consent, withdrew the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report from the Committee of Ways and Means "a bill reducing the duties on imports, and for other purposes," that it may be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, when reports were called for last Saturday I was absent, and I now ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to report a private bill from the Committee on the Judiciary, that it may be referred to a Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection, and

Mr. KERR, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, a bill of the following title; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

Senate bill (No. 146) for the relief of Samuel H. Hempstead.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, by unanimous consent, reported back Senate bill No. 300, being "An act for the relief of Thomas Rhodes," with a recommendation that it do pass; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

POSTAGE BILL.

The House then proceeded to consider the postage bill.

Mr. HAVEN. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OLDS] yield me the floor a moment?

Mr. OLDS. I will, if it does not come out of my time.

Mr. HAVEN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to submit an amendment to the bill, otherwise I cannot do so, as the previous question has been called and seconded on the bill and amendments. In whatever I may have said in reference to this matter, I have been governed by a sense of the propriety of this legislation. I desire to move to strike out the first four sections of the substitute—that part relating to the franking privilege. The residue, as I read it since my remarks made yesterday, will then be acceptable to me.

Mr. OLDS. I have no objection to the entertainment of the gentleman's proposition.

There was no objection, and the amendment was submitted to be acted on in its order.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would ask unanimous consent to move an amendment to those sections before the vote is taken on striking them out. I desire the first section carried out, and the franking privilege abolished.

Mr. OLDS. If this comes out of my time, I object.

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. OLDS. Then the gentleman must excuse me for not yielding further.

Mr. Speaker, I never felt in all my life the same necessity for being able to make a good argument as I do at this time, and on the bill under consideration; for I think it is an important measure, demanded alike by the necessities of the Post Office Department and the exigencies of the mail service of the country. I am aware that the bill may not be perfect in all its parts. It may not be such a bill as will meet the wishes of every gentleman upon the floor. It is a difficult matter for a committee to frame a bill so perfect that gentlemen shall raise no objection to it. I was a little surprised, however, on yesterday, and, I must confess, a little mortified, to hear the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHANDLER,] when the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] introduced the proposition to abolish the Post Office Department, say that he expected the tinkering of the postages by the Post Office Committee would lead to such a result.

What does the gentleman mean by tinkering with the postages of the country? The tinkering of the system commenced under Benjamin Franklin. It has continued to be tinkered with by just such men, from his day until the present time. It has been tinkered with, sometimes for good, and sometimes for evil, until it has become the commendation and the praise (as I shall show hereafter) of the most enlightened Government in the world. It has been tinkered with until it has become so perfect that it may be considered the boast and the pride of the nation. Still, I am free to admit that it has its defects, some of which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads seek to remedy by the bill under consideration.

Under the law of 1845, in which you fixed your rates of postage at five and ten cents, you had a good postage system. And you were enabled to give such mail facilities as the country demanded. During the six years continuance of those rates of postage, you accumulated a surplus of more than $2,000,000.

In 1851 the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] and myself, for I plead guilty to the charge, voted for a reduction of postages; that tinkering has made the Post Office Department insolvent at this day. It was the tinkering at that time that has led to all the tinkering which has taken place since; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] must plead guilty to the charge of having tinkered the Department into insolvency. Under the five and ten cent postage system you accumulated a surplus of more than $2,000,000. The moment you reduced your postages from five and ten cents to three and five cents, you brought your Post Office Department in debt. The estimated deficiency for this year was $1,800,000. The actual deficiency will be over $2,000,000. The estimated deficiency for the next fiscal year is over $2,400,000. It is reasonable to suppose, judging the future by the past, that the actual deficiency will be more than $2,500,000. This deficiency does not include, or only in part, the expenses of your ocean mail steamers. This does not include the sum of more than $800,000 that you pay the Liverpool steamers; nor does this sum include the amount of nearly $800,000 which you pay the San Francisco line of steamers. If you add the appropriations required for these two lines, it will make a deficiency in the revenues of the Post Office Department for the next fiscal year of more than $4,000,000. The deficiency in the revenues of the Post Office Department, at the present rates of postage, is increasing at the rate of more than $500,000 a year. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] rightly apprehends the condition of the Post Office Department, as the following extract, which I read from his speech, will show:

"The cause of the deficiency, sir, is patent. We have agreed to pay, and have paid, more money for conducting the Department and conveying the mails than we have received for doing the work for those who employ us. This is the ordinary cause for insolvency."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania acknowledges the fact that the Post Office Department is insolvent, and this House will acknowledge, when they are called upon to appropriate two and a half millions of dollars to relieve the Post Office Department for the next fiscal year, that it is badly insolvent. Insolvent, sir, not through the bad management of the Postmaster General, but by the legislation of Congress.

Now, then, Mr. Speaker, is it not the duty of Congress to repair its legislation, and save this Department from insolvency? Was it not the duty of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to endeavor to do something which might restore this Department of Government to a healthy and solvent condition? And yet, because the committee have undertaken to do this, the gentleman says that the proposition to abolish the Post Office Department is the result of this tinkering with the postage of the country.

Let me read again an extract from the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania:

"Mr. Chairman, the scheme of the Post Office Committee for repairing the income of the Post Office Department, is one that does not reflect that credit on their sagacity which we all admit is so generally deserved by their propositions."

The proposition, then, of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, or, in other words, the bill under consideration, in the judgment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is not sagacious. If the gentleman's sagacity can detect and point out our want of sagacity, he must be sagacious enough to point out a remedy for the insolvency of the Post Office Department. He has done so, and I will endeavor to run a comparison.

Now, what are the two plans that have been proposed to save the Post Office Department from insolvency; the one proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which the gentleman says is not sagacious, and the one proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the sagacity of which is yet to be examined and made manifest? The committee proposes, in the first place, to abolish the franking privilege. True, it is not a direct abolition of the franking privilege, but it is that the Government itself shall pay to the revenue of the Post Office Department that amount of money which will be equal to the service performed by the Post Office Department in carrying that matter which the Government itself orders to pass through the mails of the United States. This is the first thing proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads: It is, that everything passing through the mails of the United States shall pay the Department the cost of transportation and delivery, the same as letters, newspapers, and other mailable matter. The committee desire to make the revenues of the Post Office Department equal to what they would be if everything passing through the mails paid its proper tribute to that revenue. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, however, objects to this. He thinks the proposition wanting in sagacity. Let me read what he says on the subject:

"I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that since these remarks have been digested, the chairman of the Post Office Committee has presented another bill, which looks to the reduction of post office expenses, rather than an augmentation of its income; a retention of the three cent. postage, but an abolition of the franking privilege; it is all one scheme. The plan goes to deprive the people of certain advantages, in order that the Government may have an income from the Post Office Department. I will not speak of the franking privilege as a benefit to the Representative. You know, sir, every active member of Congress knows, it is only a burden cast upon him, in the labor and in the cost. It is not worth while to argue that point; you all know it, all feel it; but you also feel that the privilege is one secured to the people to enable you to correspond with your constituents, and to disseminate practical valuable information, and fill them with this broad of republican doctrine, to keep alive the spirit of national feeling and the uses of national knowledge; to circulate between his center and the vast extremities of the nation the vital fluid of truth; and thus enable the humblest to know and appreciate the action of Congress, and connect by the most effective ties the Representative with the present constituency, the future constituent here with the future Representative at home.

"I hoped to hear no more of this reform of franking privileges, or rather franking duties. We are Republicans, and in a representative democracy it is the right of the people to know promptly, and to know thoroughly, what it is their Representatives are doing; and this right of franking is the means, the true means, and the best means, by which that knowledge can be disseminated."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, then, may be set down as opposed to the abolition of the franking privilege. The movement does not meet with his approbation, and he "hopes to hear no more of it."

But, Mr. Speaker, there happens to be another very sagacious statesman who differs widely from the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I refer, sir, to the truth-telling, the order-loving, the mob-hating, the Constitution and law abiding, the patriotic and the Union-loving Horace Greeley. He, too, abuses me for tinkering with the postages. As he has set up for a reformer, and has long been associated in party ties with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I could really wish that they agreed in sentiment about this franking privilege; for

I should really like to have them both satisfied with all reforms in the Post Office Department. Then, sir, to say the least of it, this Capitol would be saved from the "torch of the incendiary," and we should not be called upon to surrender up our precious lives "beneath its crumbling ruins."

This great reformer has his peculiar notions of what should be done in order to save the Post Office Department from insolvency and ruin.

Let me read what Mr. Horace Greeley says upon the subject of the franking privilege. I read, sir, from the New York Tribune:

"Mr. O. told Congress that our present rates will not support the Department; that they must be increased, or $2,000,000 taken from the Treasury to pay for mail service; but he willfully suppressed the fact that this apparent deficit is caused by the immense amount of matter carried free in the mails, mainly under the frank of members of Congress."

I stop reading this extract for the purpose of saying that this is utterly false. Every member will recollect that, early in the session, I avowed myself in favor of abolishing the franking privilege. At that time, and subsequently, I informed the House that $1,500,000 in the deficiency was caused by use of the franking privilege. But I will continue my reading from the Tribune:

"The Post Office doesn't pay, simply because Congress diversifies its rightful sources of revenue to the aggrandizement of its own members; just as our business would not pay if we gave away one third of our issues to favorites. Make everything that enters the mails pay its own way, and there need be neither increased rates of postage, nor an annual deficit; but woe to that Congress which maintains the franking privilege, yet nearly doubles the charge for carrying letters to those who pay their way! Such partiality would not be tamely borne."

How in the world, Mr. Speaker, am I to please these two great reformers? The one says abolish the franking privilege, and the other says do not abolish it. I find myself in great difficulty in this matter. If I undertake to please both these gentlemen, I shall be in the predicament of the miller and his son; and if the House will pardon me, I will read from Æsop's Fables.

Several MEMBERS. Yes! Yes!

Mr. COBB. They are not orthodox.

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] introduced them upon the Nebraska bill the other day, and I do but use the same authority.

"A miller and his son were driving their ass to a neighboring fair to sell him. They had not gone far when they met with a troop of girls returning from the town, talking and laughing. 'Look there!' cried one of them, 'did you ever see such fools, to be trudging along the road on foot, when they might be riding?' The old man, hearing this, quietly bade his son get on the ass, and walked along merrily by the side of him. Presently they came up to a group of old men in earnest debate. 'There!' said one of them, 'it proves what I was saying. What respect is shown to old age in these days? Do you see that idle young rogue riding, while his old father has to walk?—Get down, you scapegrace! and let the old man rest his weary limbs.' Upon this the father made his son dismount, and got up himself. In this manner they had not proceeded far when they met a company of women and children. 'Why, you lazy old fellow!' cried several tongues at once, 'how can you ride upon the beast, while that poor little lad there can hardly keep pace by the side of you.' The good-natured miller stood corrected, and immediately took up his son behind him. 'They had now almost reached the town. 'Pray, honest friend,' said a townsman, 'is that ass your own?' 'Yes,' says the old man. 'Oh! one would not have thought so,' said the other. 'By the way you load him. Why, you two fellows are better able to carry the poor beast than he you!' 'Anything to please you,' said the old man; 'we can but try.' So, alighting with his son, they tied the ass's legs together, and by the help of a pole endeavored to carry him on their shoulders over a bridge that led to the town. This was so entertaining a sight that the people ran out in crowds to laugh at it; till the ass, not liking the noise nor his situation, kicked assunder the cords that bound him, and, tumbling off the pole, fell into the river. Upon this the old man, vexed and ashamed, made the best of his way home again—convinced that by endeavoring to please everybody, he had pleased nobody, and lost his ass into the bargain."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I fear already that in my efforts to please these gentlemen, to reconcile everybody with my postage bill, I have placed myself in the unfortunate condition of the miller; and that, in the end, I shall find that I have pleased nobody, and lost my bill in the bargain.

Well, sir, I have, it seems to me, in the spirit of compromise—for that is the spirit which appears to pervade the country—split the difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. Greeley.] I have not made a perfect abolition of the franking privilege, but have provided that the postages of members upon documents and letters received and sent shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

I agree most cordially with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CHANDLER,] that the franking privilege is a tax upon members of Congress; and I would much rather see it abolished; for it would relieve us from much labor imposed upon us under its use. We would not have one half of the letters to answer, if those writing us understood that all letters received and sent by us were charged with postage. I repeat, sir, the very fact that we now have the franking privilege, induces our correspondents to send more letters, by one half, perhaps, than they would if all our correspondence was charged with postage. And as we are, most of us, faithful correspondents, and answer all our letters, it does indeed amount to a most serious tax on our time and our labor.

I am confident that more than two-thirds of the public documents published by order of the Government are not worth to our constituents what they cost the Government for sending them free through the mail. The gentleman says these documents give the book-makers employment. That is true; but the gentleman must remember that all documents worth the reading would still be published by the book-makers—the book-makers of the people, instead of the book-makers of the Government. The book-makers would still have the employment.

This bill requires that any member sending a document, or a letter, shall indorse his name upon it, the same as now. He must indorse it as official, and then it passes through the mail free to him as now; but the postage is charged to him, and paid out of the contingent fund of the House. It does not make any difference in its cost upon the Treasury whether the money is paid the Department in the way of postage, or whether it is appropriated direct from the Treasury to save the Department from insolvency. But if the Department must sustain itself, and it performs labor for the Government, and is paid for that labor, it gives the Department no excuse for denying such mail facilities as it can afford, and as the necessities of the country demand.

If the Government will pay to the Post Office Department the amount which it costs to carry the matter sent through the mails by the order of the Government, it will enable that Department to furnish such facilities as the proper revenue of the Department will warrant. It will also have the effect of showing to the country how much mail matter is sent through the mail under the franking privilege; and, in my judgment, it will result, in the end, in the final abolition of the franking privilege altogether. When the people of the country come to understand that they are to pay $2,000,000 a year for the matter which passes free through the mail; when they come to understand that they are to be taxed indirectly, if not directly, for the payment of this amount, they will demand of their Representatives the abolition of this franking privilege.

The postmaster of this city has, at my request, furnished me with an estimate of the amount of mail matter which is sent out from this office under the franks of the members of Congress. The accounts are kept for one month, and upon these accounts an estimate is made for a year. It proves fully what I have repeatedly said about the amount of free matter passing through the mail.

CITY POST OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, D. C., May 27, 1854. }

Sir: In compliance with your request, I have the honor to inclose herewith a statement exhibiting the franked mail matter forwarded from this office during the month of January, 1854.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES G. BERRET, Postmaster.

To Hon. E. B. OLDS, Chairman Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, House of Representatives.

Statement exhibiting the quantity of mail matter sent from this office during the month of January, 1854, upon which no postage is collected, and showing the amount of revenue that would accrue if the same was chargeable with postage and prepaid:

Number of letters franked by members of Congress,	77,727.
Weight of letters franked by members of Congress, 3,440 pounds.
Amount of postage on the same if prepaid, $1,653 62.
Weight of public documents franked by members of Congress, 693,508 pounds.
Amount of postage on the same if prepaid, $110,961 20.
Weight of letters franked by the Executive officers, 7,053 pounds.
Amount of postage on the same if prepaid, $6,782 40.
Weight of newspapers, 111,002 pounds.

Total amount for one month, $122,407 22.

Total amount for twelve months, $1,468,886 64.

Total amount if unpaid twelve months, $2,931,049 20.

This exhibit shows that $1,468,886 for free matter leaving Washington under the franking privilege would be added to the revenue of the Post Office Department, if the change contemplated by the bill be made. It is not unreasonable to suppose, sir, that, taking the whole free matter passing through the mails of the United States—the exchange of newspapers, and the franks of members during the recess of Congress, and during their absence from Washington city—that the revenue derived from the abolition of that privilege, or the payment by the Government, would be $2,500,000.

The second proposition of the committee, Mr. Speaker, is to abolish so much of the act of 1853 as makes a deduction of fifty per cent. for the prepayment of postages upon newspapers and periodicals. The law ostensibly requires a newspaper passing through the mail to pay one cent postage; but, in fact, it pays only half a cent. Let me illustrate: Take the New York Tribune, which paper weighs two and a half ounces. Under the law of 1852 the postage on it going from New York to New Orleans, or San Francisco, is nominally one cent; but you have a proviso in the law that where prepayment shall be made at the office where mailed, or delivered quarterly or yearly, there shall be a reduction of fifty per cent. Under this proviso there is received as postage for carrying that paper from New York to New Orleans a half cent, and to San Francisco only a half cent. One half of this goes to the postmasters in the way of commission, and there is then left to the Government only a quarter cent for carrying the Tribune, weighing two and a half ounces, from New York to San Francisco. You pay for transportation across the Isthmus alone twenty-four cents per pound. Now, I ask, is this right? Is it right that you should only receive one quarter of a cent for carrying two and a half ounces, when you pay one and a half cents an ounce for transportation across the Isthmus alone. Now, if you do away with this reduction of fifty per cent. on newspapers and periodicals for prepayment, a revenue of $500,000 would be brought into the treasury of the Post Office Department.

In order that I might speak by the book, and exhibit facts and figures on this matter, I requested the Postmaster General to write to the postmaster at New York city to furnish him with the circulation through the mails of certain of the papers of that city. The following is the reply of the Postmaster General, giving the information I desired:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, May 8, 1854.

SIR: I herewith inclose the reply of the postmaster at New York, to the letter of inquiry of the 2d instant, requesting information as to the number of newspapers mailed at that office, accompanying which are statements furnished by the Times and Tribune offices.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JAMES W. CAMPBELL.
Hon. E. B. OLDS, Chairman, &c., &c., House of Representatives.

POST OFFICE, NEW YORK, May 6, 1854.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of the 2d instant, I directed Mr. Clark, of the newspaper department, to apply in person at the offices of the Tribune, Times, Herald, Express, and Courier and Enquirer, and to obtain, if possible, in a direct manner, the information desired by Mr. Olds, Chairman of the House Committee, &c. The proprietors of the Tribune and Times readily furnished such information as is inclosed, whilst the others gave no satisfaction in the premises, the "Herald" declining to give the information.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,
ISAAC V. FOWLER, Postmaster. per Wm. CALDWELL, Secretary.
HORATIO KING, Esq., First Assistant Postmaster General, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Greeley, of the Tribune, and the publishers of the Times, furnished the information in reference to their papers; but the Herald, Courier and Enquirer, and Express refused to do so. Here is Mr. Greeley's statement:

OFFICE OF THE TRIBUNE, NEW YORK, May 5, 1854.

SIR: According to your request, we inform you that we send through the mails 5,350 copies Daily Tribune, 11,900 copies Semi-Weekly Tribune, 103,900 copies Weekly Tribune. Aggregate circulation through the mails, 121,150.

Very respectfully,

GREELEY & McELRAIR,

per S. SINCLAIR.

The postage on the above, for one year, at the present rate, half a cent each, is $42,484.

THOMAS CLARK, Esq.

The circulation of the Tribune alone, through the mails, under the present postage system, according to Greeley's own calculation at the bottom of his letter, yields a revenue to the Department of $42,484. If the reduction of fifty per cent. be done away with, it would be increased to $84,968. Mr. Greeley objects, however, to this. It comes too near home for him. Abolish the franking privilege, says Mr. Greeley, but do not touch newspaper postage. He says leave newspaper postage as it is now, and make everything which passes through the mails pay its proper expense for their transportation.

Is a charge of three cents upon a letter weighing half an ounce, and half a cent upon a paper weighing two and a half ounces, paying equally the cost of their transportation? Oh! Mr. Greeley! oh! Mr. Greeley! A charge of three cents upon his paper would bring $500,000 revenue to the Department, provided the circulation should be the same as it is now.

A great deal has been said, Mr. Speaker, about the postages in England. Mr. Greeley constantly, when urging cheap postage, refers to it. We are constantly referred to the low postages existing in that country, and we are constantly asked to have the same rates established in this country. Do gentlemen understand that every newspaper passing through the mails of Great Britain pays the same postage that a letter pays? Yet this is so. Unless it is printed upon stamp paper, which pays a duty of a penny to the Government, it must pay a postage of a penny in passing through the mail. If you put Mr. Greeley's newspaper at the same rate of postage that they would charge upon his paper in England, the revenue derived from it would be $168,000, instead of $42,000. And yet Mr. Greeley himself says that everything passing through the mails should pay its proper proportion of the cost of transportation. Oh! Mr. Greeley! Mr. Greeley! In England a newspaper must not only pay a stamp duty of a penny, but even then it cannot pass through the mails within three miles of London unless it pays an additional postage stamp duty of a penny. Take one of the London papers printed upon stamp paper, and if it is mailed seven days after it is issued, it must pay an additional penny postage.

Now, I ask, why make this reduction of fifty per centum for the prepayment of postage upon newspapers and periodicals sent to actual subscribers, the free postage being below the actual cost of transportation and delivery? Is the Government so embarrassed that it must have this money three months or more in advance? Does the Government save anything in consequence of prepayment of postage by regular subscribers? Why is this reduction of fifty per centum made? Is it not a bonus given to these newspapers and periodicals which is not understood by the country? Was not the proviso sought to be repealed slipped into the postage law of 1853, almost unknown and clandestinely? Is a postage of one cent too much for a paper to be carried from New Orleans to New York? If it is not, do away with this reduction of fifty per centum, and you will thereby bring $500,000 into the revenues of the Post Office Department.

The third proposition of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] says is not sagacious, is, that all letters be prepaid. I think that it is sagacious, and recommends itself to the consideration of the House; because it establishes the most perfect system of checks and balances between the Post Office Department here and the deputy postmasters in the country that you can possibly devise. You have no system of checks and balances now. If all your postages were prepaid by stamps, then you would have a most perfect system—one that would at once detect the slightest fraud upon the revenues of the Department. The proposition possesses some sagacity also, from the fact that it will be a great saving of labor in the distributing offices, and, in fact, to all the deputy postmasters of the country. By this system you can do away with post-bills. This alone will be a saving of nearly one half of the labor of the deputy postmasters of the country. There is some sagacity in the measure from another fact, that you have now returned to the dead-letter office each quarter nine hundred bushels of dead letters, the greater proportion, fifty-two and a half per cent., of which are unpaid. It is a sagacious proposition from another fact, that you get prepayment upon these dead letters, the unpaid postage upon which amounts to about $100,000 annually. Is there no sagacity in that?

But, Mr. Speaker, there is another good effect to be derived from this prepayment of our postages. It is this: The moment you do away with the system of sending letters on which the postage is not prepaid, you can dispense with the duty of advertising dead letters, the cost of doing which is an enormous expense to the Post Office Department. There are very few dead letters taken out of the various post offices in consequence of being advertised.

A MEMBER. You mean uncalled for, not dead letters.

Mr. OLDS. Yes; there are few, I say, of those undelivered letters, which are advertised, ever called for. Letters are not technically dead until they are returned to the dead-letter office.

The law requires that at the beginning of every month every letter remaining in the post office is to be advertised. Suppose, as an illustration, that a letter reaches a post office on the 31st of March; it will be advertised as an uncalled-for letter on the next day, the 1st of April, at the expense of one cent to Government, equal to one third of its whole postage. I would be in favor of abolishing this advertisement of these letters which are not prepaid, from this fact, that those men who take and read newspapers, and who see the advertisements of uncalled-for letters, are the men who call regularly at the post office to get their mails; and those men who do not call regularly at the post office for their letters are the men who do not take the newspapers, and cannot see the advertisement.

Now, Mr. Speaker, these are the three improvements—or what we consider improvements—which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads desire to make to the postal laws of the country. These, sir, are the propositions which the gentleman from Pennsylvania thinks are not very sagacious.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the honorable gentleman from Ohio allow me to make one remark? It is this: that so far as regards the prepayment of letters, I entirely concur with the committee, and am ready to vote for that part of the bill.

Mr. OLDS. I am very much obliged to the gentleman for restoring the committee thirty-three per centum of its sagacity.

Mr. CHANDLER. Oh, that is a very small quantity. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLDS. Measured, of course, in the gentleman's bushel. Now, what does the gentleman from Pennsylvania propose as a remedy for this insolvency of the Post Office Department? Let us contrast his sagacity with the sagacity of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The comparison, I trust, will not be injurious to the committee.

Fortunately for the committee and the country, the sagacious gentleman from Pennsylvania, in the plenitude of his wisdom, has discovered the sine qua non. It is to make the Department a charge upon the Treasury. That I may not misrepresent his sagacity, I will again read from his recent speech. He says:

"Are we then to visit the Post Office Department with censure and restrictions, because it has exceeded its special income, while we confess that public good has resulted from the extraordinary efforts of its officers, and the enlarged cost of their service? Or are we to say that since these measures of public good in the Post Office Department exceed in cost their direct returns, therefore we will tax the community directly for their support, while we refer the deficiency of the other Departments to the ingenuity of the Secretary of the Treasury? Shall we say, while the head of every other Department leans upon the ways and means of the Treasury, that Mr. Campbell and Mr. Guthrie shall have no intercourse?"

"Sir, the whole argument in favor of increasing the rates of postage is founded on the assumption that the Post Office Department must sustain itself. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, and the patience of the House, I purpose looking at that assumption, and I do it now because all the Postmasters General, as well as the Post Office Committees, seem to have taken it for granted that such should be the case. Why should the Post Office Department be called on to sustain itself more than any other Department of this Government? Why should Mr. Campbell be compelled to keep his official hands out of the Treasury more than Mr. Dolbin? And why should Judge Campbell's name and his Department be excluded from the benefits of the deficiency bill, while that of the Department under General Davis is amply and carefully provided for therein? That is the question."

The gentleman's sagacious proposition to relieve the Post Office Department from insolvency is to fasten it on the Treasury of the United States. It is truly a wonderful discovery; one for which the gentleman is surely entitled to receive letters patent. I am now ready to acknowledge the corn, and say the gentleman is wondrous sagacious. But an undutiful son who, perhaps, expends five hundred dollars a year more than his father would allow him, might have the same sagacity, and still draw upon his father's funds to pay the deficiency, and save himself from insolvency. The gentleman's patent, I think, will meet with ready sale.

But, sir, the moment you fasten the Post Office Department upon the Treasury of the United States, what will be the result? The deficiency will increase just as they have in the Army and Navy Departments of the Government, until you run up the expenses of the Post Office Department, as you have those others, to more than $10,000,000 a year.

But, sir, how is this deficiency to be met? We must have increased mail facilities for the country. We are a growing people. This very Congress has already added two Territories to the United States. And you must extend the mail facilities to them. In 1850 you had to extend them to California, and Utah, and New Mexico. We are a mighty and a growing people, and our mail facilities must increase as the population and commerce of the country increases. How is it to be done? The gentleman from Pennsylvania says fasten it upon the Treasury of the United States. But how is the deficiency to be met there? By a tariff, I suppose, will be the answer. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] talked feelingly and affectingly the other day about the correspondence of the servant girls and servant men, and I might add, too, the laboring men of the country. Ay, it would not do, he said, to tax them. But fasten this system upon the Treasury, and the servant girl, when she goes to the store to buy a dress, must, under the tariff operation, pay indirectly a tax to supply the deficiency in the Post Office revenue? You fasten it upon the Treasury of the United States, and you fasten the taxes upon those who do not use the mails of the country. You fasten it, in spite of all your protestations, upon those articles of dress which the servant girls and servant men must use and have.

Mr. HAVEN, (interrupting.) I will say to the gentleman that if he had only allowed the Committee of Ways and Means to report the tariff bill this morning, he would have seen that we propose to raise our revenue upon iron, silks, and such articles, of which servant girls and servant men do not use much.

Mr. OLDS. Who write the letters of the country? Not the servant girls; who only, perhaps, now and then write a letter to make known their affections to parents in the old country. The same is true as to servant men. I repeat, sir, who write the letters, and carry on the large correspondence?

Again, sir, hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] upon that subject. He says:

"A gentleman of extensive correspondence says, in reply to a note from me: 'As for letter postage, I pay to the Department now certainly $300 per annum more than I did when the postage was five and ten cents.'"

By this precious morceau we see that it is not the serving girls and serving men who use most extensively the mails of the country, but quite a different class of society.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has a correspondent who pays $200 more postage under the three cent rate, than he did under the five cent rate. What must be the amount of his correspondence, when compared with that of the servant girls and servant men of the country? And yet under his proposition, that very correspondent might not pay any more revenue, under the operation of the tariff, than that of the servant girl or servant man; perhaps not as much.

To illustrate it again, a little further. It is a notorious fact, that one of the messengers about this Hall has been asking the members of the House, for their document books, that he may obtain the list of names of those to whom we send documents. For what purpose is this? A gentleman in Baltimore pays him thirty cents a hundred for copying those names, with their post office address. It is, sir, that he may know to whom and where to send his business circulars—perhaps a lottery scheme in the city of Baltimore. Thirty cents a hundred, sir, to get the names and the address of our constituents. Compare his correspondence with that of the servant man or girl; and yet he may not pay more revenue, under the tariff, than do these latter upon the goods they are compelled to purchase.

I must refer again to the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. In speaking of the bill, and the arguments urged in its support, he says:

"But, Mr. Chairman, if the plan is wrong—if the bill is unworthy the acceptance of Congress—still more is the leading portion of the argument of its able advocate unworthy his fame and his position."

"The honorable gentleman who is at the head of the Post Office Committee demands that the postage be raised from three to five cents prepaid, and this, among other reasons, upon the ground that the West, the agricultural regions, must otherwise be made to suffer by the cupidity of the commercial portions of the country, and be compelled to pay for the conveyance of the mail along the seaboard. Such an argument, or an argument thus founded, sounds strangely from the mouth of a statesman; and, conceding that character to the chairman of the committee, I profess myself astonished at the error into which his feelings have betrayed him."

Why, sir, it seems to me, if I understand myself, that the gentleman from Pennsylvania has entirely misunderstood my remarks. I do not suppose that the interests of the people of commercial New York, in respect to correspondence, are different from those of the agricultural portions of the West. I suppose the merchant in New York has just as much interest in having communication with the farmer in Ohio as the farmer in Ohio has in holding communication with the merchant in New York. They are equally interested in having mail facilities kept up between them, and you cannot, in this respect, separate the interest of one from that of the other.

My remarks were based upon the supposition that low postages must result in denying increased mail facilities; and that in the Atlantic States their mail arrangements were perfected; they needed no increase of mail facilities, but that in the West and South, in short in almost all the rural districts, we needed largely increased mail facilities; that consequently low postages operated against the interest of the South and West.

Again, the gentleman talks about the express carrying letters from Boston to Baltimore for a penny each, and that, upon every letter passing between these cities upon which three cents are paid, two cents are paid, for the establishment and maintenance of mail facilities for the West. Now, sir, I repeat, that the commercial men in New York, or Philadelphia, or Boston, or Baltimore, are as much interested in having mail facilities at the West as are the people of the West themselves; and therefore this two cents of which the gentleman speaks goes to maintain the mail facilities in which the man who pays them directly is interested.

Sir, the postal system of the United States is a system in which all are alike interested. New York is as much interested in having such mail facilities as will enable letters to pass from New York to Minnesota or Nebraska, as are the people of these Territories. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] read from the report of the Postmaster General, to show that after paying for their own mail facilities, his State paid a large amount towards defraying the expenses of the Post Office Department in the sparsely settled regions of the country. Now, sir, I hold in my hand an exhibit, furnished me by the Auditor of the Post Office Department, showing the cost of transporting the mail, and the revenues of the Department collected in different States of the Union. The results differ most materially from those furnished by the gentleman from New York. They are of such importance that I will read them:

Now, sir, if the gentleman would charge New York upon the same rule that he has charged the other States, he must charge her for the transportation of the mail from New York to Liverpool, which would make $800,000 in one lift. Again: the transportation of the mail from New York to San Francisco should be charged to New York, which will give another lift to that State of $800,000. When you come to place these charges to the account of that State, the gentleman will find that the balance is over the left—it is greatly against that State.

Sir, it is impossible to make any calculation by which the proper amount of debt and credit can be fixed for any one State. If a letter is to be sent from New York to New Orleans, the postage is paid in New York; but the expense of transportation through the State of New Jersey is charged to that State; the transportation through a portion of Pennsylvania must be charged to Pennsylvania, and in like manner through the States of Maryland, Delaware, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, and Alabama, before it reaches New Orleans. These facts must all be taken into consideration in estimating the expenses and receipts of the Department in any one State. I say, therefore, that it is utterly impossible to arrive at anything like a correct conclusion in this respect. Neither is the solution of the question of the least practical importance. Our postal system is not a local, a State institution, but it is, in every sense of the word—in usefulness, in importance, and in interest—a national institution.

The exhibit of the Auditor shows some States and Territories in which but a tithe of the expense of the mail facilities is collected in such State or Territory. This, sir, illustrates the utter futility of abandoning the postal system to private enterprise, as proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH.]

The carrying the mail must, from necessity, be a monopoly. Shall it be a Government monopoly, or shall it be individual monopoly? For one, sir, I prefer a Government monopoly. Government carries the mails where they do not pay, as shown by the letter of the Auditor of the Post Office Department. Private enterprise would not care for such regions of country. The Government does. That is the difference between a Government monopoly and private enterprise. When gentlemen talk about the destruction of our postal system, they talk about destroying that which is the admiration of the Old World. Let me read an extract from the London Morning News of May 17th, to which I call the attention of gentlemen:

"AMERICAN POSTAL STATISTICS.—Some time since a paragraph appeared in the Daily News on the American post office system, containing some interesting statistics, derived from documents presented to Congress. Since that other documents from the same source have been published, containing more particulars and charges against the British Government of illiberality and unfairness. Nothing contributes to throw more light on the social progress of a nation than postal statistics, and in the United States these statistics are given with much greater fullness and clearness than they are in Europe. The reports of the American Post Office Department are, in fact, valuable State papers, not unworthy the attention of English statesmen, as they may see therein the sources by which national unity may be kept alive.

"Some idea of the rapid progress and increased extent of the great modern Republic may be formed from the fact that in 1853 nearly two thousand new post offices were established in the United States; that during that year the length of the mail routes had increased four thousand miles, and the annual transportation of mails to three millions of miles. We boast in England of the post-office accommodation we get, and of the gigantic machinery of our Post Office Department. On the first of December, 1853, there were twenty-two thousand six hundred and eighty-eight post offices in the United States, three times as many as there are in the United Kingdom. The number of miles the mails travel over railways in the United States is twelve times the number they travel over in this country, and in steam packets seven times the number. The United States Post Office Department has engagements with nearly six thousand contractors for conveying mails by coaches, steamboats, and railways; and the annual transportation of mails in that country is sixty-one millions eight hundred and ninety-two thousand five hundred and forty-two miles, two thirds the distance of the earth from the sun.

"The postal report says: 'The failure of the revenue from letter postage to recover, during a period of almost unexampled prosperity and commercial activity, with the same rapidity under the act of 1851, as it did under the act of 1845, may be accounted for upon the supposition that the latter act had already stimulated the correspondence of the country nearly to the highest point of which it was capable, and that therefore the act of 1851 afforded but little further inducement to use the mails.'

"Fifty thousand persons emigrate to the United States from the German dominions yearly. The best portion of the industrial population of the latter country has been escaping from the leaden and stupid despotisms there to get elbow room and breathe the air of liberty in the colossal western Republic. The vast tide of emigration emerges from Europe at Bremer-Haven, and the American Government have reduced the postage between the United States and Bremen, in consequence, to 5d. All the States of the German Austrian Postal Union have the advantage of this reduction, when their postage to and from Bremen for letters to and from the United States is 2d. a letter, or less. Austria, Prussia, and Saxony have made the requisite reduction to get the benefit of the five-penny rate, and the whole of the German States will, it is expected, soon come into the arrangement.

"The following paragraph, copied from the United States Postmaster General's report, deserves to be written in letters of gold for the sanction it gives to ocean postal reform, and for its consideration of the feelings and interests of emigrants:

"The reduction of the letter postage by the Bremen line to one half the former rate, offers greatly improved facilities for the correspondence to and from the continent of Europe. The propriety of this reduction will be apparent in view of the fact that the sea postage on all correspondence between this country and Europe has generally, and, in my opinion, most justly, been considered as quite too high. It is, moreover, as well our interest as our duty to extend to the large and increasing German population of the United States, and to their friends at home, the most liberal means of communication practicable."

"The complaints of the American Post Office against the British Government are, that the British packets are unduly favored with the carriage of the closed mails for Canada, &c., and that the British Government charge higher proportionate transit dues for the passage of American mails through England than the United States Government does for the passage of English mails through the United States territory. Moreover, the British Government has refused all the overtures from the American Post Office, to reduce the exorbitant rates on pamphlets and magazines. A final attempt to obtain liberality and fairness was to be made by submitting the whole matter again to Lord Clarendon.

"To the credit of the American Government, it manifests the utmost kindness and consideration for the Post Office officials, of whom there are upwards of thirty thousand. A large portion of these are in humble capacities, and cannot be afforded lucrative emoluments, but they can and do receive great attention and kindness as rewards for the exercise of intelligence and trustworthiness. The Post Office authorities in America seem to be fully aware that to carry out such a department of their own with advantage to the public, requires a cordial cooperation of the whole staff of officials, and that such cooperation cannot coexist with chronic discontent.

"The American Post Office documents reveal the rapid growth and amazing extent of the great modern Republic, and manifest great industry and administrative capacity of its subordinate Government officials. No matter how wide the territory or scattered the population of the United States, the Government of that country, taking the initiative promptly, bind all together by social advantages calculated to promote internal trade, general education, and affectionate intercourse. While looking abroad on Europe, and witnessing the misery arising from present and previous kingly ambition and dynastic quarrels, one cannot but envy the freedom from overburdening debt and trouble enjoyed by the United States Government."

While gentlemen are constantly referring us to the postal system of Great Britain, let me remind them that on the other side of the water our system is held up as a model system, worthy of admiration, and as worthy the model Republic. In this country we have three times the number of post offices, and twelve times the amount of railway, and seven times the amount of steamboat transportation. Annually in the United States the mail is carried two thirds the distance of the earth from the sun. Truly, sir, our postal system may be called gigantic. Truly, it may challenge the admiration of the world. Notwithstanding all our tinkering, the management of our postal system calls forth the laudation of the mother country.

Adopt the recommendations of the committee—for they are also the recommendations of the Postmaster General—and our postal system, as a self-sustaining department of the Government, will continue to challenge the admiration of the world. Pass the bill introduced by the committee, and what do you do? You derive from the free matter passing through the mails more than $2,000,000 of revenue to the Post Office Department. Pass this bill, and you derive from the postages upon periodicals $500,000, making $2,500,000 that can be appropriated to increase the mail facilities of the country. If you bring the railroad companies down to a reasonable compensation for the transportation of the mails of the country, you save $600,000 more, making an increase in the revenues of the Post Office Department of $3,000,000, without any increase of postage whatever.

These are some of the measures sought to be attained by the Post Office Committee, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania calls tinkering with the postages of the country. I feel that the committee has discharged its duty, and I feel that I have discharged mine. I have given much attention to this matter, and with what poor ability I possess I have presented my reasons to the House. My argument may not appear as perfect as it would, had I not endeavored to avoid any thing like a repetition of what I said at the time I introduced the bill in April last. I have convinced myself, at least, that the amended bill is one of vital importance to the country. I trust that the substitute may be adopted in the place of the original bill, and that it may speedily become the law of the land. But if, in my desire to please everybody, I shall be compelled to see my bill, like the ass of the miller, tumbled into the river, I shall console myself with the thought that I have discharged my duty, and that those who, after me, are placed at the head of the Post Office Committee, will be able to devise such plans as will be worthy the reputation bestowed by an admiring world upon the Post Office Department of the United States.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The SPEAKER. The question is first upon the following amendment, proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] to come in at the end of the bill:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force two years, and that at the expiration of that time the Post Office Department shall be abolished, and individuals and associations shall thereafter be as free to carry letters as to carry anything else.

The question was put; and the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment proposed by Mr. HAVEN to the substitute for the bill.

Strike out the four first sections of the substitute, as follows:

That from and after the commencement of the next fiscal quarter after the passage of this act, the franking privilege be, and the same is hereby, wholly and entirely abolished; and the third section of the act of Congress, entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department,' passed March 1, 1847," and all other acts, and parts of acts, granting and conferring upon any person whomsoever the right or privilege to receive and transmit through the mail, free of postage, letters, packets, public documents, newspapers, periodicals, or other matter, be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all letters, packets, public documents, newspapers, periodicals, or other matter, sent or received through the mails, free of postage, under existing laws, by the several heads of Departments, bureaus, and offices, shall be charged with postage according to the rates now existing, or which may hereafter be established by law; and the postage so charged shall be paid quarterly, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, upon the requisitions of the Postmaster General made upon accounts audited and certified by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all letters, packets, public documents, newspapers, periodicals, or other matter sent or received through the mails, free of postage, under existing laws, by members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, shall be charged with postage according to the rates now existing, or which may hereafter be established by law, and paid out of the contingent funds of the two Houses of Congress, upon accounts audited and certified by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post Office Department.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, to entitle any letter, packet, public document, newspaper, periodical, or other matter to be charged upon the Treasury of the United States, or upon the contingent fund of either House of Congress, as hereinbefore provided, it must be addressed to or indorsed by the proper person or officer in the same manner as is now required by law to entitle the same to pass through the mails free of postage.

Mr. HAVEN. The first four sections of the bill relate, I believe, entirely to the question of franking, charging the expense of the transportation of franked matter to the Treasury. The other sections of the bill relate to the legitimate business of the Post Office Department, and should be, in my opinion, retained.

Mr. BENSON. Would it be in order to amend the amendment, which has been just reported, at this stage of the question?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order to amend only by the unanimous consent of the House. The previous question having been ordered, cuts off any new amendment. As the proposition of the gentleman from Maine would be in the nature of an amendment, it is not in order, unless by unanimous consent.

Mr. BENSON. Then I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to move to amend the amendment, by striking out all that portion of the bill, or substitute, which does not relate to the abolition of the franking privilege simply, without charging it over to the Government. If I understand the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] it is—

The SPEAKER, (interrupting.) It is proposed to amend the amendment, and this can only be done by the unanimous consent of the House. The gentleman from Maine will see that the House must determine whether or not his proposition will be entertained.

Mr. BENSON. I have asked the unanimous consent of the House to enable me to move to amend the amendment by striking out all of it except the first section, if I understand it right.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] proposes to amend the substitute by striking out the first four sections of it. It is now proposed to amend that amendment so as to strike out the second, third, and fourth sections of the bill, leaving only the first. That amendment can only be entertained by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. KEITT. I object.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. PECKHAM. I demand the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SAGE called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CORWIN and BOYCCK were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported thirty-nine in the affirmative, (not a sufficient number.)

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question then recurred upon the motion of Mr. HAVEN to strike out the first four sections of the substitute.

Mr. BENSON. Is not that question divisible, so as to meet the object I desire to attain?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because to divide is to amend; and the previous question, which has been seconded, cuts off all amendments.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays upon the amendment?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know if the morning hour has expired?

The SPEAKER. It has; but the House has determined that the main question shall be now put; and it must be done, because it is the order of the House. It sets aside all others.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Appleton, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Benson, Benton, Bocock, Boyce, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caskie, Chandler, Cobb, Corwin, Crocker, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dick, Dickinson, Disney, Eddy,

So the first four sections of the substitute were stricken out.

The question then recurring upon the substitute, as amended,

Mr. HAVEN demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, and JONES of Louisiana, were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes not counted.

So the substitute, as amended, was rejected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move that the bill do lie upon the table.

Mr. BENSON. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The question was taken upon Mr. WASHBURN's motion; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 51; as follows:

Smyth, Hester L. Stevens, David Stuart, and Daniel B. Wright—51.

So the bill was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I move that the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider do lie upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOOKS FOR NEW MEMBERS.

Mr. CHANDLER. Some timesince there was referred to the Library Committee of this House a resolution which had passed both Houses of Congress, supplying books for new members, with a view of determining the proper construction of that resolution, as regards the understanding of the House. I am instructed by that committee to report back that resolution, with a recommendation that it be adopted by the House. As I presume the Committee of Ways and Means will desire to provide the ways and means for executing the original order in the civil and diplomatic bill now before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I ask the consent of the House to make the report now.

The resolution was read by the Clerk, as follows:

Resolved, That, in adopting the joint resolution from the Senate, authorizing the distribution of books among the new members of the two Houses of Congress, the House of Representatives intended that when the publisher of any such books is unable to supply them, the Clerk of the House shall be at liberty to purchase them of any other person; and that when such works as have been distributed to members are not to be readily obtained, other books of a similar character may be supplied to them: Provided, That no more shall be paid therefor than has been paid for the books for which those shall be substituted: Provided also, That the new edition of the Opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States, contained in four volumes, and having an index, be substituted for the imperfect edition heretofore distributed, provided the cost thereof shall not exceed fifteen dollars per copy: And provided also, That no more than one copy of any one work shall be furnished for any member.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Is it competent for me to object to the reception of that report?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object; and move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, with a view of taking up such cases upon the Private Calendar as are not objected to.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask if this is objection day?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CHANDLER. There must be some mistake in reference to this matter. This resolution does not propose to deprive members of their books. It proposes so to construe the law that no member shall receive more than one copy of the same book. The Senate have so construed it as to give members one hundred and sixty copies apiece of some of those documents. Nothing more is required than that the Clerk of the House may be allowed to take other books, if he cannot get the very ones the others had, and provided the expense is not greater than what it has been.

Mr. HAMILTON. That is all objected to. Before the question is taken on the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, I would move the usual resolution to close debate on the Meade case, which is now in the way in Committee of the Whole House of the consideration of all other private business.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let my resolution be reconsidered first. This, in my opinion, is no ordinary report. The matter was referred to us for investigation. Unless the resolution be adopted, the Clerk cannot go on with the business.

The SPEAKER. The resolution being objected to, the report is not in order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move a suspension of the rules.

The SPEAKER. That cannot be done to-day.

Mr. DISNEY. I hope that the motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar will be withdrawn for the reasons which I now proceed to give. Territorial bills providing for the survey of the public lands in Utah and New Mexico, the creation of surveyor general, &c., have passed through the committee.

The appropriations to execute these objects ought to be in the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill. That they may be, it is necessary that these territorial bills should be passed in advance of the appropriation bill. It was my desire to embrace in these bills provisions to extend the surveys to Kansas and Nebraska, so as to open up these Territories at once to emigration; but in the present position of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, it is desirable and advisable that we should content ourselves with the present bills, and resort to the Senate for amendments, so as to extend the surveys to Kansas and Nebraska. Thus will be at once settled all questions connected with these Territories.

Now, what I desire is this: Let the gentleman withdraw his motion that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House, so that I may be enabled to ask the House to take up those territorial bills, and put them on their passage. Then I can offer an amendment to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill making the necessary appropriation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Private bills have not been considered by the House for months, and I think that it is due that we should consider them to-day; therefore, I insist on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The motion to close debate has precedence. In what time does the gentleman propose to close the debate on the Meade case?

Mr. HAMILTON. In five minutes after its consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. CHANDLER. That will be doing great injustice to the case.

The question was taken on Mr. HAMILTON's resolution, and it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I demand tellers on going into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. ELLIOTT, of Kentucky, and CAMPBELL, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 61.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, (Mr. SKELTON in the chair,) and proceeded to consider the bills thereon.

RICHARD W. MEADE.

The CHAIRMAN. The first bill in order is House bill (No. 58) "for settling the claims of the legal representatives of Richard W. Meade, deceased."

Mr. HAMILTON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the motion made to the House was, that debate upon this bill should close in five minutes after the Committee of the Whole should have proceeded to the consideration of it. As no gentleman seems to be disposed to occupy the floor for these five minutes I believe that I am placed in the predicament of making a motion that the committee do now rise, or else that it pass this bill over informally, and let other business come up, as I am unfortunately here without the papers on the subject. My design was, after the debate which, the Chair will recollect, occurred some months ago, to hear such objections as gentlemen might have to the claim, and then to be prepared, in my closing remarks, to respond to those objections as well as I could. I am now, by the motion that has been carried, placed in the awkward position of being here without the papers relative to this case.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] will yield to me his five minutes, and if five or ten minutes more be accorded me, I wish to make a few remarks in explanation of what I said on a former occasion; or rather in correction of some errors into which a gentleman who replied to me had fallen in his remarks.

Mr. CHANDLER. The gentleman from Tennessee will see at once what an awkward position I would be placed in. If the committee agree to pass this bill over informally, and let other business be taken up which can be acted on, I have no objection to complying with the gentleman's request.

Mr. JONES. There can be no objection to passing over the bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I move that bill No. 58 be passed over informally, and that the committee proceed to other business.

Mr. COBB. Why not have this bill considered now? We have had it all the session, and it is time we were disposed of.

Mr. BRIDGES. I think it is time that this question were passed on. We are as well prepared to vote on it now as we ever shall be. I hope, therefore, the committee will not pass it over informally. I think it ought to be voted on at once.

The question was put on Mr. CHANDLER's motion; and it was agreed to.

SAMUEL COLT.

The CHAIRMAN. The next bill on the Calendar is House bill (No. 59) "for the relief of Samuel Colt."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I understand that there is some difficulty about this case of Meade. Members do not seem to understand what has been done with it. I would be glad to know what has been the action of the committee upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been passed over informally.

Mr. SMITH. Well, what does that mean? There has been no vote upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been a vote taken upon it, and it has been passed over informally.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. The meaning of that action is, that the bill will retain its place on the Calendar.

Mr. HOUSTON. There has been objection made, and I think the committee cannot pass it over informally, because the House had just made an order about it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Certainly; I was not aware that any vote had been had upon the question of passing it over.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has been passed over, and bill (No. 59) "for the relief of Samuel Colt" is now under consideration.

The bill, which was read, provides that the Commissioner of Patents be authorized and directed to grant to Samuel Colt, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, from the 25th of February, 1857, for the term of seven years thereafter, the full and exclusive right and privilege of making, constructing, using, and vending to others to be used, his improvement in fire-arms, a description and specification whereof are contained in the schedule annexed to letters patent issued to said Samuel Colt, on the 25th of February, 1836, and extended to the 25th of February, 1857, by the Commissioner of Patents: Provided, That the Government of the United States shall have at all times full right to make and manufacture the said fire-arms, according to said patent, in all of their own armories, for military and naval purposes.

Mr. PECK. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That is a debatable question, and a vote cannot be taken upon it, as long as any gentleman wishes to speak, until the House has ordered debate upon the bill to be closed.

Mr. THURSTON. I call for the reading of the report which accompanies the bill.

From the report, which was read, it appears that Samuel Colt made his invention before the year 1832; but from difficulties experienced in reducing it to successful practice, and from poverty, he was unable to procure a patent until 1836; that he, in the same year, assigned his patent to the "Patent Arms Manufacturing Company," of which he became the manager; that Mr. Colt devoted five years after the date of his patent to the object of establishing his repeating-arms, but that the company and he both failed, losing about $200,000, and many years of time and labor. At this time the invention had fallen into such disuse that none of the arms were made in the country, and the whole thing was considered a failure. The Mexican war created a demand for the arms, and at once established them as the most valuable improvement in fire-arms which up to that time had ever been made. The patent, however, had been assigned to the Patent Arms Company, and Mr. Colt was very largely in debt, resulting from his former efforts to bring his invention into use. Under these circumstances, Mr. Colt applied to the court of chancery to settle the affairs of the Patent Arms Company, and the result was, that in 1850 his patent was assigned to him by a receiver in chancery. At the same time, the Commissioner of Patents extended the patent, so that Mr. Colt, in February, 1850, began to enjoy the privilege which the general act intended meritorious inventors to have, but which, for fourteen years, he had been deprived of by no fault of his own.

Mr. Colt, before the expiration of his patent, commenced himself to manufacture his arms. Their great success depends as much upon the manner in which they are constructed as upon the peculiarity of their organization. So complicated a machine can only be made valuable by great accuracy and perfection in its manufacture; and that can only be done by perfect and expensive machinery. To procure that perfection has been Mr. Colt's constant effort; and as rapidly as profits arose from the sale, he reinvested them to increase and perfect his machinery. By this means he has brought his arm to great perfection, and at great cost. Mr. Colt is confident that an extension of seven years will enable him so to increase and perfect his manufactory, and so to subdivide and cheapen his processes, that at the end of that time he will be able to furnish the consumers the most perfect arm, which is capable of being made at so small a cost, that manufacturers of spurious imitations will not find the profit sufficient to encourage the business.

In order to protect himself from the destructive effects which would follow the introduction of these spurious arms into use in England, where he has no patent, and in Europe generally, Mr. Colt has established an armory in London, to which he has carried American machinery, and which is operated entirely by American mechanics, and where he is now engaged in the attempt to demonstrate the superiority of his arms over all imperfect imitations of them, in the hope that the European consumers will discourage the manufacture of any except such as are perfect. In that undertaking, however, it is evident that he can make no money, but must control the market for the present by supplying the demand at the same price that inferior arms can be sold for, even at a loss. Already the English armory has exhausted all the surplus which had been accumulated in this country, and is, even now, a constant drain on the resources and energies of the inventor.

The great object to be attained in the manufacture of fire-arms is perfect certainty under all circumstances; compared with that, the price is of no consequence. The public would not be benefited if such arms as these, manufactured in an imperfect and inaccurate manner, could be furnished gratuitously to every applicant; but the public will be greatly benefited by the supply of reliable, perfect, and effective weapons, at any cost. The experience of the past has demonstrated that Mr. Colt, above all others, has supplied the great desideratum; and the constantly diminishing price at which the arms are produced and sold proves that his anticipations are reasonable, and that he will be able to manufacture them at such rates as to exclude all arms constructed on the same principle, of an inferior quality, from the market, to the great advantage of the public.

The money which was lost during the first term of this patent, if applied to any ordinary business of manufacturing, would have given to Mr. Colt more than has ever been realized out of the entire proceeds of manufacture; and as all that has been realized has been invested in the manufacture itself, and must share its fate, the whole of the proceeds of the manufacture have been thus far invested, in this country and in Europe, in the machinery, tools, and property fitted exclusively to the production of fire-arms; and the perfection and expense of this machinery are exhibited by the fact that the separate parts which compose the arms are thrown promiscuously into heaps, and are so perfect, that, when assembled into a pistol, they exactly fit each other, and any other part to which they may be properly applied; so that in using these arms, new ones may be at once constructed out of the broken ones left on the field of battle without altering the shape or size of the parts.

He has made his plans for the purpose of constructing an armory at Hartford of such proportions and capacity as to enable him to manufacture these arms in their greatest perfection; but he hesitates to involve himself in so heavy an expenditure, unless he can be protected from the competition of inferior and worthless arms; and he would scarcely be able to finish his armory before the expiration of his patent. For these reasons, it is important to him, and to the whole country, that he should now receive the assurance of safety which the extension of this patent will afford him.

But in addition to this, the great service which Mr. Colt has rendered this Government, and which the people have derived from the use of these arms, as is evidenced by the common approbation of all the officers in the Army and Navy, and among all classes of our citizens who have used them, or seen them used; the truly American spirit and enterprise which Mr. Colt has exhibited in carrying this branch of manufactures into the heart of the great armory of the world; the high marks of consideration which the military governments and scientific bodies in Europe have shown him, entitle him, in the opinion of the committee, to this evidence of the approval of the Government.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, obtained the floor. Mr. THURSTON. Not expecting that this case would come up to-day, I am not prepared to go on with it. I hope it will be passed over informally.

Mr. JONES. I do not propose to make an argument on this case; but I desire, in order to have it fully and fairly before the committee, that the Clerk shall read the decision of the Commissioner of Patents on the last application of this patentee for extension. It will be found, in my judgment, satisfactory and conclusive to the House that this patent, at least, ought not to be extended by special act of Congress. Mr. Colt, I believe, has had two patents for fourteen years; first, for his revolving pistol, and then for improvement in some part of it. In addition, he has had an extension of one of these patents for seven years.

Mr. THURSTON. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not interpose objection to the postponement of the bill, as we are not ready for its consideration at this time. The decision of the Commissioner of Patents to which he refers, it seems to me, would be better understood if its reading were delayed until discussion began on the whole matter.

Mr. JONES. The report of the committee has been read. Now let the decision of the Commissioner of Patents be read, and go out with our proceedings, and I shall have no objection to passing over the case for the present.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman from Rhode Island, who has reported the bill, desires the postponement of its consideration to another day. I hope that his request may be complied with.

Mr. JONES. I have no objection to the postponement after the decision of the Commissioner of Patents has been read.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would rather hear the decision read when we are called on to vote. Then it would receive more attention.

Mr. JONES. I prefer its reading now.

The Clerk then read the decision, which is as follows:

Application of Samuel Colt for an extension of Patent.

In 1836 the applicant obtained a patent for rotary chamber for fire-arms. In 1839 a second patent was granted for improvement thereon, the most important of which was the loading lever. In 1850 the former of these patents was extended for seven years; and he now asks a like extension for the latter.

The statute requires the applicant in such cases to furnish a statement of his receipts and expenditures, "sufficiently in detail to exhibit a true and faithful account of loss and profit in any manner accruing to him from and by reason of said invention." This requirement has not been duly complied with in the present case; but as the decision will turn upon another point, this defect will be no further considered.

The applicant avers "that he never has in any way, directly or indirectly, derived any reward for his said invention patented in 1839." This statement certainly grows out of a mistaken basis of computation.

The testimony shows that the applicant has manufactured upwards of one hundred thousand pistols, of various sizes. Taking into account the prices at which they have been sold, the cost of manufacture, and the commissions allowed for selling, the net profit on these pistols will not fall far short of $1,000,000.

This testimony stands wholly uncontradicted. No opposing evidence was offered. Even the witnesses by whom these facts were proved, were not cross examined by the counsel for the applicant, although he was present at their examination. The fact, then, may be taken as conceded and indisputable.

Now, the expenses of the applicant, together with his losses, and the value of his time and services, are estimated by him at $60,000, which certainly leaves a very handsome balance in his favor. But he takes the ground that all these profits are due to his first patent, and none to the second.

Therein consists the mistake. All the pistols testified to as above stated, were constructed with the improvements embraced in the second patent. Are these improvements of no value? If so, there is no ground for an extension. But if they are valuable, they certainly augmented the value of the pistols to which they were attached.

But it will be said that the price of these pistols was not increased in consequence of the addition of these improvements. This may be true, but it does not follow that they have been productive of no benefit. The vendor of a commodity often finds it advantageous to diminish its price in order to augment the amount of his sales. Adding to the worth of the commodity while the price remains unchanged produces the like effect.

At all events, the pistol, with all its improvements, was manufactured and sold as a whole. Large profits have been thereby realized. The applicant cannot be permitted to say these profits have all accrued from the manufacture and sale of the rotary chamber. They result from the whole pistol, as improved, with all its parts. The improvements embraced in the patent now sought to be extended gave an enhanced value to the arm. This caused its general introduction, and enabled the patentee to dispose of the vast number, which has changed his early losses into such abundant profits. A reasonable share of these should be credited to his last invention.

Such a course will appear the more just, when it is recollected that the applicant charges the invention we are now considering, with the early losses to which he was subjected in the endeavor to bring his pistol into general use. He even goes back, in this reckoning, to a time anterior to the date of the present invention, and makes up an account, in the total of $60,000, to cover his expenses, and losses of time and money. This debt accrued in the endeavor to introduce the whole pistol, including the subjects of both patents. But it would seem, further, as though the applicant intended the whole of this debt against the subject of the second patent. At all events, there is no doubt but he intended a full proportion of that charge to stand against the patent now sought to be extended. Why, then, should not the subject of this patent be credited with its share of the profits?

But the applicant avers, under oath, that the patent now sought to be extended has thus far been of no service, "and that for the purpose of his manufacture, and the profits thereon, he would have been as well off if the improvements described in the patent of 1839 had been public property. If this is correct, it furnishes a strong argument against the extension now sought.

The reasons given by the applicant for the conclusion above stated, are, that the patent of 1836 has till this time protected the improvements patented in 1839, and that therefore the whole benefit of those improvements could have been monopolized thus far without a patent.

Now, the patent of 1836 has been extended to 1857. If the first patent has protected the subject of the second up to this date, it will do the same thing—for aught that appears—for four years longer. The profits already received have all accrued within the last six years. From the increased extent of the manufacture and use of these pistols, the profits, in the four years to come, will probably equal those for the six years past; so that the aggregate amount of profits resulting from the inventions embraced in his two patents—even without an extension of the patent of 1839—will probably amount to near $2,000,000.

The view evidently taken of this subject by the applicant is, that he is entitled to an extension of his patent unless he has derived from the patent already granted a sufficient compensation for his invention. Such is not the law. To justify an extension of this patent, the Commissioner must be satisfied that the applicant, without neglect or fault on his part, has failed to obtain "from the use and sale of his invention" reasonable remuneration for the time, ingenuity, and expense bestowed upon the same. [Act of 1836, Section 18.]

It matters not, then, whether the applicant has realized one dollar in consequence of the patent of 1839, provided the invention has given him a fair remuneration. If the patent of 1836, which has been extended to 1857, has protected the subject of the patent of 1839, and thereby enabled the inventor to reap the full benefit of this latter invention, he is no more entitled to an extension than though the whole advantage had grown out of the patent of 1839.

The burden of proof to show that a proper case for an extension exists is thrown upon the applicant. In this respect he has wholly failed. Neither his sworn statement, nor the testimony of the witnesses who were sworn in the case, shows that he has not received from his invention a sufficiently liberal compensation; but, on the contrary, a degree of success and prosperity is shown, which I can only wish were more generally realized by the authors of all other useful inventions.

The extension is therefore denied.

CHARLES MASON, Commissioner.
UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE, August 29, 1853.

MR. STANTON, of Kentucky. I have here a reply to that document, being the correspondence between the chairman of the Committee on Patents and the Commissioner of Patents, which I desire to have read.

The Clerk read the correspondence, as follows:

WASHINGTON, January 7, 1854.

SIR: An application has been made to Congress, by Samuel Colt, for an extension of his patent, dated February, 1836, and a statement of the profits resulting from his manufacture has been laid before the Committee on Patents in the House, showing the fact that all of the profits which Colonel Colt has realized have been invested in machinery and tools for the manufacture itself. Since the committee reported to Congress, my attention has been called to a decision made by you, on the application of Colonel Colt, for the extension of another patent for some improvements to his original invention, last summer, in which you state, in substance, that Mr. Colt had realized a million of dollars out of his invention; and that this fact had been proved by witnesses in the presence of Mr. Colt's counsel, who virtually conceded the point.

As this statement differs entirely from that which Colonel Colt has now laid before Congress, and shows a profit of more than twice as much as now appears, and as the decision of the Commissioner of Patents carries with it the weight of judicial sanction, I have called upon the counsel of Mr. Colt for an explanation. He assures me that you have been deceived, by some means, into making the statements that the testimony was taken in the presence of counsel, and that the profits had been a million of dollars. He assures me that all the testimony which was taken on the question of profits was taken during his absence from New York, and entirely ex parte, and that he never knew of it till too late to correct it; and, further, that the evidence was given by workmen who had been employed in making cheap imitations of Colt's patent for a company which had been enjoined by him, and that their estimates were formed on the basis of their own spurious imitations, without any knowledge of the facts or cost of production. If this be so, as I have no doubt it is, justice requires that the error should be corrected. The facts are simple, and there should be no confusion about them. Mr. Colt's counsel informs me that Mr. George Gifford, of New York, who is the counsel for Young and Leavitt, the opponents of Colt's extension, is now in the city, and knows the truth of the matter; and that Mr. Gifford's character is such that he would not hesitate to do justice to his opponent in any matter where wrong has been done. The most effectual way in which this matter could be set right would be to write to Mr. Gifford and request an answer to two questions: First, whether the testimony in the extension case relative to the profits of Colonel Colt was not taken ex parte entirely? and second, whether the estimates on which the decision was made were not given by workmen who had been employed in imitations of Colt's patent, and who estimated by the cost of producing imitation arms? And I respectfully suggest that an inquiry of this sort coming from you, whose decision is cited to prove what is thus solemnly denied, would be the proper way to arrive at the truth.

Respectfully yours,

B. B. THURSTON, Chairman.

HON. C. MASON, Commissioner of Patents.

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE, January 9, 1854.

SIR: Yours of the 7th was received this morning. I immediately inclosed it to Mr. Gifford, with a request that he would reply to the interrogatories therein suggested, and I herewith forward you his reply.

The statement made in my decision of the application for an extension of Colonel Colt's patent, was fully warranted by the testimony before me—the magistrate having certified that the applicant's counsel was present at the examination of the witnesses, and declined asking any cross interrogatories.

I will state further, that the counsel of Colonel Colt seemed to rest his case on the points of law alluded to in my decision. If these had been decided in his favor, it will readily be seen that the testimony would have been immaterial. He took no testimony on the point of profits, and apparently paid no regard to that subject.

I remain yours, very truly,

CHARLES MASON.

HON. B. B. THURSTON.

NATIONAL HOTEL,
WASHINGTON, January, 1854.

SIR: In reply to your letter of the 7th instant, I have to say that it will give me great pleasure to make any statement of facts which will prevent injustice to any one, and especially in regard to any proceeding in which I have been engaged as counsel. In relation to the matter on which you desire information, the facts are—that the testimony which was taken in that case, to prove the profits of Mr. Colt, was taken in the absence of Mr. Dickerson, Mr. Colt's counsel, and, therefore, without cross-examination. The proper and legal notice had been given to Mr. Dickerson to attend, but he was engaged in the argument of a cause out of town, and the time for taking testimony had so nearly expired as to not admit of postponement. A clerk from Mr. Dickerson's office attended the examination, and stated the fact of Mr. Dickerson's absence, and declined to cross-examine, as he said he knew nothing of the subject, and had no authority to do so.

In regard to the second question propounded, I have only to say, that I was informed that the witnesses which were examined on the cost of manufacture had been engaged in the manufacture of arms, which were adjudged by the courts to be an infringement of Mr. Colt's patent, and in consequence of which I considered them the better qualified to speak of the cost of production. Whether the arms which were made by them were as good or as expensive as those made by Mr. Colt, I do not know. My questions to these witnesses were based upon the assumption that they had all the proper machinery with which to operate, and on that assumption I inquired what, in their judgment, it would cost to make the arms.

Very respectfully yours,

GEORGE GIFFORD.

HON. CHARLES MASON, Commissioner of Patents.

MR. PECK. I understand that the chairman of the committee who reported this bill is not prepared to speak on the subject now; and he makes the request that I shall withdraw my motion. As an act of courtesy to him I do so.

MR. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move that the committee pass over the bill informally for the present.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES LEE JONES.

The next bill on the Calendar which came up for consideration was House bill (No. 63) "for the relief of Charles Lee Jones."

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of War to cause the claims presented to that Department by C. Lee Jones, for expenses incurred and services rendered in raising, subsisting, and transporting three companies of volunteers mustered into the service of the United States, during the war against Mexico, to be settled according to the principles of equity, not to exceed $2,000, and to be in full for said claims.

The report accompanying the bill was then read.

MR. MACE. I discover that Mr. FAULKNER, the gentleman who reported this bill, is absent. I therefore move that it be informally laid aside.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY LEWIS.

The next bill in order upon the Calendar was House bill (No. 98) "for the relief of Henry Lewis, of Clinton county, Indiana."

The bill provides that Henry Lewis, of Clinton county, Indiana, be authorized to enter, free of cost, except the fees to the land officers, forty acres of land, out of any lands subject to private entry, at any land office in the United States, or the territories thereof, in full of his claim for money paid Charles Tyler, register of the land office at Crawfordsville, Indiana, on the 18th of January, 1837, being fifty dollars.

From the report which was read it appears that the petitioner, on the 18th January, 1837, went to the Crawfordsville land office for the purpose of purchasing the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter of section five, in township twenty-three, north of range one west; that at that time the office of receiver of public moneys was temporarily vacant; but the register of the land office, Charles Tyler, told petitioner to leave the money with him, and he would see that the land was duly entered so soon as the office of receiver was filled. The petitioner being not well versed in such things, and supposing one land officer as responsible as another, left his money with said Tyler, to wit, fifty dollars, and took from him a receipt, as follows:

CRAWFORDSVILLE, 18th January, 1837.

Received of Henry Lewis, fifty dollars, to be applied to the purchases of the northeast quarter of southwest quarter section five, twenty-three, one west, when the receiver is in commission.

CHARLES TYLER.

That said Tyler marked said land as entered on the plats in his office. The petitioner, believing that he had in fact purchased said land, took possession of it, and remained in possession, making valuable improvements, for ten years, when he was informed that his land had been purchased by one Rufus A. Lockwood. He then had a full investigation of all the facts, and found that said Tyler had pocketed his money, and that he had no title whatever for said land; but that the title was fully invested in said Lockwood, to whom he surrendered possession.

MR. MACE. If the committee will give me their attention for one moment, I will explain fully the nature of this case. A gentleman by the name of Lewis, a poor man, had accumulated the sum of fifty dollars, and went to the Crawfordsville land office for the purpose of entering forty acres of land. A vacancy had occurred in the office of receiver, in consequence of the death of that officer. The register of the land office, Mr. Tyler, told him to leave his money with him, and that the moment a receiver was appointed he would see that the forty acres should be entered according to his application. Lewis being an ignorant man, left his money with Mr. Tyler, supposing, as a matter of course, that his purchase would be made complete, and the title of the lands placed in his hands. Well, sir, he located upon the lands, and made improvements to the amount of $700 or $800. It was ascertained that his lands were still vacant, and, as is the practice, a resale took place. All the vacant lands in that district were resold, those purchased by Lewis included. He then came here and asked Congress to refund him the money paid by him to Tyler; and also to pay him for the improvements he had made. His petition was laid before the Committee of Claims during the last Congress, and again during the present session. We thought it would hardly do to pay him for the improvements; but inasmuch as a Government officer had defrauded him out of his money, we thought it would be proper to allow him to locate forty acres of land free of cost, upon any lands in the United States subject to entry, and we have reported a bill to that effect.

I move that the bill be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass; and upon that motion I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HENDRICKS and MILLSON were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 7; no quorum voting.

MR. BRIDGES. I move that the committee do now rise.

THE CHAIRMAN. The motion is not now in order. No quorum having voted, the roll must be called.

The roll was then called, the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had the Private Calendar generally under consideration, and finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the names of the absentees to the House.

The following is the list of the absentees:

Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barksdale, Bell, Bennett, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bugg, Campbell, Caruthers, Chandler, Chase, Chrisman, Clingman, Cook, Cox, Craige, Culom, Cumming, Cutting, Dean, Dent, De Witt, Disney, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, John M. Wright, Yates, and Zollicoffer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee.) The Chair reports only one hundred and fifteen members present—no quorum.

Mr. HAVEN. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. FLAGLER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HOUSTON. The motion is not in order. There was no quorum on the last vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is not in order. Less than a quorum cannot adjourn over.

The question was taken on Mr. FLAGLER's motion; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 32, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Bridges, Carpenter, Corwin, Curtis, Thomas Davis, Dawson, Dick, Flagler, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Haven, Hill, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Knox, Murray, Norton, Peck, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Riddle, Sabin, Skelton, William Smith, Richard H. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, and Daniel B. Wright—90.

So the House refused to adjourn.

A quorum being now present, the Committee of the Whole House resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion pending is to lay aside bill No. 98, that it may be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. MACE. I hope that by unanimous consent the motion will be agreed to without tellers. [Cries of "Agreed!"]

No objection being made,

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it pass.

CAPTAIN GEORGE SIMPTON.

The next bill in order on the Calendar was a bill (No. 99) "for the relief of Captain George Simpton, of Galveston."

The bill proposes to pay the petitioner in this case the sum of $1,600 in full payment of his claim for indemnification for the loss of the schooner Alert, while he was engaged in the public service in the war with Mexico.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MACE. I hope that some explanation will be given of this case by the gentleman who reported the bill.

Mr. MILLER, of Missouri. I do not know that I can make a more clear and succinct statement than is contained in the report accompanying the bill; but I will state as briefly as I can the facts of the case believing myself most sincerely that the bill ought to pass. The claimant in this case, being the owner of the schooner Alert, was employed by the Government during the war with Mexico to transport supplies from Sacrificios to Camp Bagara, for the division of the Army under the command of General Twiggs. While he was thus employed, the French bark, Jeune Nelly, was captured as a prize by the United States steamer Hunter, commanded by Captain McLaughlin, while attempting to violate the blockade of Vera Cruz. After the capture, Captain Simpton, of the schooner Alert, who was a skillful and experienced pilot, and who was acquainted with the currents, was employed by Captain McLaughlin to take the Hunter with her prize into port. After he had been thus employed, and after the French bark had been taken in tow by the schooner together with the steamer, a severe "norther," common to the gulf, sprung up, and all three of the vessels were driven upon a reef by the violence of the storm, and entirely destroyed, the officers and men escaping with great difficulty. Captain Simpton, who was the owner of the schooner, asks that he may be compensated for his loss. From the proof before the committee, the vessel was estimated by witnesses to be worth $3,000, but the committee thought the valuation too high, and agreed upon the sum of $1,600 as an indemnity for the loss sustained by the claimant. I believe myself that the owner of the vessel ought to be allowed more than was reported by the committee.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I would inquire of the gentleman from Missouri whether this vessel was in the voluntary service of the Government, or whether it was pressed into the service?

Mr. MILLER. The claimant in this case was employed by the Government for the purpose of transporting supplies to our Army under the command of General Twiggs; and he was ordered to perform the service in which his schooner was destroyed by the officer in command of the steamer Hunter, that captured the French bark.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WENTWORTH, of Massachusetts. I call for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. ORR. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar had had under consideration bills Nos. 58, 59, and 63, which the committee had passed over informally, and bill No. 98, which the committee had ordered to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that they had passed a bill and resolutions of the following titles:

Resolution (No. 17) giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance by Lieutenant M. F. Maury, of the Navy, of a gold medal from his Majesty the King of Sweden;

Resolution (No. 19) for the relief of Rebecca Birdsall;

Resolution (No. 20) relating to the raft of Red river; and

An act (No. 401) for the relief of William Duer.

Mr. KEITT. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. On that question I ask for a division.

The House was divided, but before the announcement of the vote

Mr. KEITT withdrew his motion, and moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House thereupon (at twenty-five minutes past three o'clock, p. m.) adjourned to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 17, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BUSINESS BEFORE THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is on ordering the following bill to be engrossed and read a third time: House bill (No. 98) "for the relief of Henry Lewis, of Clinton county, Indiana." It is the bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House yesterday.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I desire to make a motion that the House proceed to the regular order of business.

Mr. FULLER. Will the gentleman from Oregon yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. LANE. Certainly.

THE NICARAGUA LINE OF STEAMERS.

Mr. FULLER. Before proceeding to the regular order of business, I desire to report to the House, from the Committee on Commerce, a bill passed by the Senate, authorizing a new issue of registers to the steamers plying between New York and San Francisco. It is a matter of private business, and I hope there will be no objection to the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the following bill was reported back:

S. No. 180. An act to authorize the issue of registers to vessels owned by the Accessory Transit Company.

Mr. FULLER. I ask to have the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, which accompanies the bill, read by the Clerk. It is a short letter, and is explanatory of the object of the bill.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 25, 1854.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the petition which accompanied your letter of the 18th instant, and inclose a draft of a bill authorizing the issue of registers to steamboats and vessels owned by the Accessory Transit Company, with such conditions and restrictions as seem to me advisable for the protection of the interests of the United States.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES GUTHRIE,

Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. H. HAMLIN, Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, was read a third time, and passed.

TERRITORIAL BUSINESS.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I now move that the House proceed to the regular order of business, which is the consideration of bills on the Speaker's table, and that we take up such territorial bills as have been considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, the regular order of business is the consideration of private bills.

Mr. LANE. Then I withdraw that motion, and move to take up such territorial bills as were considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union some weeks ago, and as are now on the Speaker's table. I hope the House will indulge me in this motion.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I dislike very much to object to anything which the gentleman from Oregon asks; but this day is set apart by the rules of the House for the consideration of private bills. We have not acted upon them for some months, and it is but right that we should now insist on their receiving consideration.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Indiana will withdraw his objection. There are but few territorial bills, and it will take but a few moments to pass them. I hope that, by general consent, they will be taken up and passed. They have all been agreed to by the Committee of the Whole.

The objection was not withdrawn.

Mr. LANE. Then I will ask the House now to set apart a day when they will consider territorial business.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair may be allowed a single suggestion, perhaps it may lead to an accommodation of all parties. If it be true that these territorial bills will give rise to no debate, it will take but a few moments to pass them. If it be the pleasure of the House, by general consent, to take up and pass such territorial bills as will not give rise to debate, the Chair will have those bills reported.

Mr. HENDRICKS. To that extent I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. And there is another reason which, perhaps, has not suggested itself to gentlemen. There are some two or three of those bills which apply to the extension of the surveys of the public lands in those Territories.

The SPEAKER. If not objected to, the Chair will first direct that the bill reported from the committee yesterday be taken up, and will then proceed to such territorial bills as have been reported from the Committee of the Whole, and which will not give rise to debate.

Mr. HAMILTON. I desire to have it understood that the proposition is confined to such bills only as have been reported from the Committee of the Whole, and shall not be extended to any other.

HENRY LEWIS.

The following bill, reported from the committee yesterday, was then taken up:

A bill for the relief of Henry Lewis, of Clinton county, Indiana.

The question being, "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?"

Mr. COBB called for tellers upon the question; which were ordered; and Messrs. WALKER and VAIL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 50.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

SALARIES OF OFFICERS IN TERRITORIES.

House bill (No. 162) "to increase the salaries of the Executive and judicial officers in Oregon and New Mexico," coming up next in order, was read in extenso.

It provides for increasing the salaries of the chief and associate judges of Oregon and New Mexico to $2,500 per annum; for increasing the salary of the Governor of New Mexico to $3,000 per annum; and for increasing the salaries of the Secretaries of Oregon and New Mexico to $2,000 per annum.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union proposed to amend by including the judges of Utah and New Mexico at the same salary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee further proposed to amend by making the salaries of said judges $3,000, instead of $2,500.

Mr. HENN. I demand tellers upon that amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WALKER and VAIL were appointed.

The question was taken on the second amendment; and it was rejected, forty-four only voting in the affirmative.

The third amendment was read, and agreed to, as follows:

After the word "Oregon" insert the words "Washington and Utah," so that the paragraph will read: "And that of the secretaries of Oregon, Washington, Utah, and New Mexico, (be increased,) to the sum of $2,000 per annum."

The fourth amendment was read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the annual salaries of the chief justice and associate judges of the Territory of Minnesota be increased to $2,500.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. PHELPS. I move to strike out "$2,500," and in lieu thereof to insert "$2,000," so as to make the salaries of the judges in Minnesota the same as those provided for the judges of Kansas and Nebraska, in the bill which we have recently passed.

The question was put on the amendment to the amendment; and, on a division, there were—ayes seventy-two.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There are some gentlemen, perhaps, who are laboring under the impression that the salary is now $2,500 a year; as I understand it, the House have rejected the $2,500 amendment proposed by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and if we reject the amendment moved by the gentleman from Missouri, the salaries of those judges will remain as at present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is in error in his understanding of the condition of the question. The House have not rejected the report of the committee, who recommend $2,500 as the salary. A vote has not been taken upon that proposition. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHELPS] proposes to amend that amendment by striking out $500 of the proposed salary.

Mr. JONES. I would ask the Chair if he did not put the affirmative of the question, and report the number rising in favor of the salary of $2,500 to be twenty-one. Tellers were called for, and the Chair reported only thirteen rising in the affirmative, and then it was that the gentleman from Missouri moved his amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had not announced the result, otherwise the amendment would not be in order.

Mr. JONES. There were twenty-one gentlemen voting in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The indication was very clear as to the result, but the vote was not announced.

Mr. BRIDGES. I would inquire what the salaries of the judges are now?

Mr. PHELPS. The salary of these judges is now $1,800. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended that the salary of the judges of the Territory of Minnesota should be increased to $2,500. I propose that their salaries shall be $2,000, making them equal to the salaries of the judges of Kansas and Nebraska. It is an increase of $200 merely to each of the judges in Minnesota over what they now have.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and DAVIS were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 90, noes 27.

The Speaker voting in the affirmative, to make a quorum, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question being on the adoption of the amendment, as amended, the House was divided, and the Speaker announced seventy-six members voting in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The negative vote was then counted; and the question was decided in the affirmative.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COBB. I move to lay the whole matter on the table.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I know well that the motion to lay the bill on the table is not debatable; but I would ask the House to do justice to the portion of the country which I represent in this case.

Mr. COBB. I object to the gentleman's discussing the question, unless I be allowed an opportunity to answer him.

Mr. LANE. I am not discussing it, but I ask the House to pass the bill.

Mr. JONES, of New York. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the motion to lay the bill on the table was not agreed to.

The question recurred on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to say one word in relation to this bill.

The SPEAKER. If debate arises, the Chair decides that the bill must go over.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to make one statement.

The SPEAKER. By the unanimous consent of the House, the Chair will allow it.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not want to debate it. I only desire to make a single statement.

The SPEAKER. That is debate; but the Chair hopes the House will indulge the gentleman.

No objection being made,

Mr. HAVEN said: I only desire to say that the salaries of all the Governors of the Territories are left at $2,500 per annum, except that of the Governor of New Mexico, which is $3,000. That ought to be changed to $2,500, and I ask that the bill may be so amended, by unanimous consent; that is, so as to make the salaries of all the Governors the same. I propose to put them all upon the same level.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. The gentleman is mistaken in the facts.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the reading of the bill, as amended.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I move the previous question.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to debate the bill. Mr. PHELPS. I will say to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] that the salary of the Governor for New Mexico is fixed at $2,500 in the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. I think that cannot be so, as I just came from the Clerk's desk, and there read the provision myself, and the Clerk also read it to me. But I shall vote against the bill any way, and against the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS. I was mistaken in my statement. I turned to the wrong section of the bill, and was misled thereby.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire some information before I vote. I desire to know—

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. Perhaps the gentleman from Virginia rises to a question of order. The Chair will hear what he has to say.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to know if all the Governors of the Territories get $2,500 per annum, except the Governor of New Mexico?

Mr. COBB. I ask for the reading of the bill. The bill was accordingly again read.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is demanded.

Mr. ORR. If I understand the state of the matter, I rise to a privileged question. It is to move to reconsider the vote by which the House rejected the amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole. In that way we can accomplish the object which the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] and the rest of us, have in view.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I understand that there is no objection to the amendment suggested by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Oregon if the salary proposed to be given to the Governor of New Mexico by this bill is not the same as that received by the Governor of Oregon?

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I take pleasure in stating, in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, that the salaries of the Governors of Oregon and Washington Territories are fixed at $3,000 each per annum.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I now desire to ask the gentleman another question. Is not the Governor of New Mexico also made the superintendent of Indian affairs for that Territory?

Mr. LANE. He is. In addition to the duties imposed upon him as Governor, he also discharges those of superintendent of Indian affairs for the Territory of New Mexico.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. And the Governor of Oregon does not discharge the duties of superintendent of Indian affairs?

Mr. LANE. He does not.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Then I object to the reduction of the salary of the Governor of New Mexico to $2,500.

Mr. ORR. The motion to reconsider is debatable, is it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides that if the bill, or any proposition connected with it, be debated, the bill itself must go over. But aside from that consideration, the previous question has been demanded, which, of course, makes the proposition not debatable.

Mr. HAVEN. I now ask that the clause of the bill providing for the salary of the Governor of New Mexico may be read, and that the section of the bill in which it occurs may also be read, in order that the House may see the distinction between the salaries of these different officers.

The clause and section referred to were read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must inform the gentleman from New York, that the salary of no Governor is provided for in this bill except that of the Governor of New Mexico.

Mr. HAVEN. Then I was laboring under a mistake, and withdraw my objection to it.

Mr. ORR. I withdraw my motion to reconsider.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read a third time.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. McMULLIN. I propose to debate the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman. As a matter of duty, he has allowed the conduct of the bill to be placed in the hands of its friends.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

Mr. McMULLIN. I demand the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and decided in the affirmative—yeas 91, nays 49; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Banks, Barry, Belcher, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Campbell, Caskie, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Clingan, Colquitt, Corwin, Crocker, Culom, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, Dick, Disney, Dowdell, Dunbar, Dunham, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Everhart, Fuller, Goode, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Hendricks, Henn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Lamb, Latham, Lilly, Lindley, McDougall, Macy, Maxwell, Smith Miller, Milson, Mordecai Oliver, Packer, Parker, Pennington, Phelps, Pratt, Ready, Reese, Riddle, David Ritchie, Rogers, Russell, Seward, Shower, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Sinyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Walker, Walley, Ellihu B. Washburne, and Daniel B. Wright—91.

NAYS—Messrs. David J. Bailey, Boyce, Carpenter, Cobb, Dickinson, Ellison, English, Fenton, Flagler, Giddings, Hamilton, Hastings, Hill, Iliyer, Houston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kidwell, Knox, Kurtz, Lindsley, McCulloch, McMullin, Mace, Middlewarth, Morgan, Murray, Nichols, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peck, Peckham, John Perkins, Powell, Pringle, Thomas Ritchey, Ruffin, Sage, Shaw, Skelton, John J. Taylor, Tracy, Trout, Wade, Israel Washburn, and Witte—49.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. LANE, of Oregon, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend the title of the bill by adding the words "Washington, Utah, Minnesota," so as to make it read:

A bill to increase the salaries of the Executive and judicial officers of Oregon, New Mexico, Utah, Washington, and Minnesota.

The amendment was agreed to; and the title, as amended, passed.

EXPENSES OF THE CAYUSE WAR.

House bill (No. 232) "to settle and adjust the expenses of the people of Oregon from attacks and hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, approved August 21, 1852," coming up next in its order, was read by its title.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend to strike out all after the enacting clause, and to insert a substitute, which provides for authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and adjust the expenses incurred by the provisional government of Oregon, in consequence of hostilities of the Cayuse Indians, in the years 1847 and 1848, provided that the amount shall not exceed $75,000; to make such allowances for adjusting claims from that amount, at a rate not exceeding five dollars per day; to pay so much as may be necessary of said amount for settling the claims awarded by the committees appointed for that purpose by the Governor of Oregon; and that no such claims shall be allowed which are not presented within the next fiscal year.

The second section provides "that all of said claims and accounts not heretofore adjusted shall be settled and adjusted at such place, and in such manner as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; and the Secretary of the Treasury is empowered to reexamine any award that has been, or may be made of said claims, and to reduce the amount if, in his judgment, founded on proof, it should be too much."

The substitute was adopted.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

Mr. HAVEN. I move to amend the title by substituting for the present one the following:

An act making appropriations in reference to the Cayuse war in Oregon.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF NEW MEXICO.

The Clerk read the title of the next bill, as follows:

H. R. No. 315. A bill to establish the office of surveyor general of New Mexico, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes.

The first amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is as follows:

Strike out all after the word "Mexico," in the first section, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Whose annual salary shall be $3,000, and whose power, authority, and duty shall be the same as those provided by law for the surveyor general of Oregon. And he shall have proper allowances for clerk hire, office rent, and fuel, not exceeding what now is, or hereafter may be, allowed to the said surveyor general of Oregon. And he shall locate his office, from time to time, at such places as may be directed by the President of the United States, —so that the section will read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a surveyor general for New Mexico, whose annual salary shall be $3,000, &c.

The amendment was concurred in.

The second amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was as follows:

Strike from the second section the following words:

"That, to every white male American citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become such, over the age of twenty-one years," and in lieu thereof, to insert so that the section will read as follows:

"That to every white male citizen of the United States, or every white male above the age of twenty-one years, who has declared his intention to become a citizen, and who removed to, and was residing in, said Territory prior to the 1st day of January, 1853, there shall be, and hereby is, donated one half section, or three hundred and twenty acres of land, if single; but if married, one section, or six hundred and forty acres, &c., &c."

Mr. GREENWOOD. I demand tellers on that amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ELIOT, of Massachusetts, and HOWE, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 54, noes not counted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHELPS. I am satisfied that if the House understood the amendment upon which the vote is being taken, there would not be any objection to it. The bill, as originally reported from the committee, provided for the donation of three hundred and twenty acres of land to each head of a family who had settled in the Territory within the time prescribed. The amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole reduced the quantity of land to be given to settlers from half a section to a quarter of a section, giving them one hundred and sixty instead of three hundred and twenty acres of land.

Mr. HAMILTON. Let us have a recount.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. There being no objection, a recount will be had, and the tellers will again resume their places.

The tellers resumed their places, and the House having been again divided, the tellers reported—ayes eighty-seven, noes not counted.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The third amendment was reported, as follows:

In the fourth line of the second section strike out the words "removed to and."

The section, as amended, will read:

That to every male American citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become such, over the age of twenty-one years, who was residing in said Territory, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The fourth amendment was reported, as follows:

In the second section, after the word "three," in the sixth line, insert the following words: "and who may be still residing there."

The section, as amended, will read as follows:

That to every white male American citizen of the United States, or who has declared his intention to become such, over the age of twenty-one years, who was residing in said Territory prior to the 1st day of January, 1853, and who may be still residing there, there shall be, and hereby is, donated, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The fifth amendment was reported, as follows:

In the sixth line of the same section strike out the word "half," and insert the word "quarter;" and in the seventh line strike out the word "three," and insert "one;" and strike out the word "twenty," and insert "sixty;" in the seventh and eighth lines strike out the words "if single;" but, if married, one section, or six hundred and forty acres."

The section, as amended, will read as follows: There shall be, and hereby is, donated one quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres of land.

The amendment was agreed to.

The fifth amendment was reported, as follows:

In the ninth line of the same section strike out the word "each" and insert the word "every;" after the word "male" strike out the word "American;" after the word "citizen" insert the words "of the United States, or every white male above the age of twenty-one years, who has declared his intention to become a citizen, and."

The section, as amended, will read as follows:

And to every white male citizen of the United States, or every white male above the age of twenty-one years who has declared his intention to become a citizen, and who shall have removed, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The seventh amendment was reported, as follows:

In the fourteenth and fifteenth lines of the same section strike out the words "if a single man; or, if married, one half section, or three hundred and twenty acres."

The section, as amended, will read as follows:

There shall, in like manner, be donated one quarter section, or one hundred and sixty acres, on condition of actual settlement, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The eighth amendment was read, as follows:

In the first line of the third section, after the word "of," insert the word "the," and in the second line strike out the word "as."

The section, as amended, will read as follows:

That on proof of the settlement and cultivation required by this act, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The ninth amendment was read, as follows:

In the sixth section, line seven and eight, strike out the following words: "And to be disposed of as said Legislature shall direct."

The section, as amended, will read as follows:

That, when the lands in said Territory shall be surveyed as aforesaid, a quantity of land equal to two townships shall be, and the same is hereby, reserved for the establishment of a university in said Territory, and in the State hereafter to be created out of the same, to be selected, under the direction of the Legislature, in legal subdivisions of not less than one half section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. There being no further amendments to be disposed of, the question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. HENN. At the request of the Committee on Public Lands, I propose to offer an amendment to this bill, providing for the making of surveys through the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska. I will send the amendment to the table to be read.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a surveyor general for the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, who shall locate his office at such place as the President of the United States shall, from time to time, direct, and whose duties, powers, obligations, responsibilities, and compensation shall be the same as those of the surveyor general of Wisconsin and Iowa, and who shall be allowed the same amount for office rent, fuel, incidental expenses, and clerk hire, as is allowed to said surveyor general of Wisconsin and Iowa.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That said surveyor general shall cause the necessary surveys to be made in said Territories, of standard meridian, base, and parallel lines, and of township and subdivision lines, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That all the lands to which the Indian title has been, or shall be extinguished, within said Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, shall be subject to the operation of the preemption acts of 4th September, 1841, and under the conditions, reservations, and stipulations therein mentioned: Provided, however, That where unsurveyed lands are claimed by preemption, notice of the specific facts claimed shall be filed within three months after the survey has been made in the field; and on failure to file such notice, or to pay for the tracts claimed before the day fixed for the public sale of the lands by the proclamation of the President of the United States, the parties claiming such lands shall forfeit all right thereto: Provided, Said notice may be filed with the surveyor general, and to be noted by him on the township plats, until other arrangements shall have been made by law for that purpose.

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That the public lands in the Territory of Nebraska, to which the Indian title shall have been extinguished, shall constitute a new land district, to be called the Omaha district; and the public lands in the Territory of Kansas, to which the Indian title shall have been extinguished, shall constitute a new land district, to be called the Pawnee district: the offices for each of which districts shall be established at such points as the President may deem expedient; and he is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a register and a receiver of public moneys for each of said districts, who shall be required to reside at the site of their respective offices; and they shall have the same powers, perform the same duties, and be entitled to the same compensation, as are or may be prescribed by law in relation to other land officers of the United States; and the President is hereby authorized to cause the surveyed lands to be exposed for sale from time to time, in the same manner, and upon the same terms and conditions, as the other public lands of the United States.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That, sir, is a new bill of itself. It creates several offices, and provides for the survey of lands in a very extensive region of country. It has never been printed; and this is the first time that it has been presented to the House. In order that we may have an opportunity to examine it, and to propose amendments, if any should be desirable, I move to recommit the bill, with the proposed amendment, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. DISNEY. I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw the motion he has just made. To carry out this system of survey, it will require an expenditure of money; and in order to make that appropriation, a clause must be inserted in the civil and diplomatic bill. Consequently, this bill ought to pass in advance of that bill, as I stated yesterday.

Pass this bill now, and the Committee on Public Lands will then be prepared, when the civil and diplomatic bill comes up, to offer an amendment to appropriate the sum necessary to carry out the provisions of this bill in regard to extending these surveys.

The gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] and the House generally, well understand that the Territories of Kansas and Nebraska must remain a sealed book, practically, to the people of the United States; and all this commotion about the organization of those Territories will exist, in point of fact, upon paper only, unless you pass this provision, which is now before the House. These provisions are necessary, in order to open up the country to emigration.

The SPEAKER. The Chair feels compelled to remind the gentleman that, if debate arises, the bill goes over.

Mr. DISNEY. I am aware of that, and I do not desire to debate the proposition, but only to make the remarks I have, to call the attention of the House to the fact of the importance of passing this bill before the civil and diplomatic bill is disposed of.

In regard to the amendments to which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] referred, I say that there is not a provision in those amendments except such as are already existing upon the statute-book in relation to the survey of the public lands—not a word.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is one, at least.

Mr. HENN. I desire to make a single statement in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee. This bill was reported in lieu of two bills which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands. It was framed after consultation with the Commissioner of the General Land Office. They have adopted this plan in order to have it disposed of before the passage of the civil and diplomatic bill, that the proper appropriation may be inserted in that bill.

Mr. JONES. I do not doubt the correctness of the gentleman's statement; but I wish to have the amendment printed, in order that we may examine it, and ascertain what its provisions are. I do not believe that it is wise for us, in all cases, to vote for laws similar to those now upon the statute-book. There is one provision which struck my ear whilst the bill was being read, which I should be very much pleased to have altered, notwithstanding there are similar provisions upon our statute-books in reference to the other Territories.

I should be pleased to see that portion of our general laws in reference to the public lands, which requires them to be put up at public sale, to the highest bidder, stricken out. I should be glad to see a provision adopted by which the public lands, when surveyed, and brought into market, should be subject to entry by actual settlers in limited parcels, by actual cultivators, and no other persons.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must again announce to the gentleman from Tennessee, that if discussion arises, the bill must go over.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to make a single statement in regard to the provisions of this amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot debate the bill.

Mr. DISNEY. I will not debate the bill. I wish to state a solitary fact, and will not say one word by way of argument. I wish to say that this amendment contains nothing but these provisions:

First, that the lands in the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas shall be surveyed;

Second, that the office of surveyor general in those Territories shall be created, and the officers appointed;

Third, that the arrangements for the disposal of the public lands in the said Territories shall conform to existing laws; and Fourth, that a land office shall be created.

These provisions are all the amendment contains.

The question now being upon the motion to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, it was put; and the motion was disagreed to.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. ORR. I ask for tellers upon seconding the demand.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CORWIN and VAIL appointed.

The House was divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 37.

So the previous question received a second.

The main question was then ordered to be now put.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. HENN. I move to amend the title by adding the words "Kansas and Nebraska."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. It was the unanimous understanding of the House, and, therefore, tantamount to a suspension of the rules, that the territorial business reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union that did not give rise to debate should be disposed of.

Mr. McMULLIN. I withdraw my motion.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF OREGON.

The bill next in order was House bill (No. 316) "to amend the act approved September 27, 1852, to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon, &c., and also the act amendatory to the act amendatory thereof, approved February 19, 1853," reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with two amendments.

The first amendment was as follows:
At the end of the third section add the following proviso:

Provided, That no sale shall be deemed valid, unless the vendor shall have resided four years upon the land.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was as follows:

In section four strike out the word "granted," and insert in lieu thereof the word "reserved;" and strike out the words "and applied to," and insert in lieu thereof the word "for;"

So as to make it read:

That in lieu of two townships of land reserved to the Territory of Oregon by the tenth section of the act of 1850 for universities, there shall be granted to each of the Territories of Washington and Oregon two townships of land, of thirty six sections each, to be selected in legal subdivisions for university purposes, under the direction of the Legislatures of the said Territories respectively.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF UTAH.

The following bill was reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a recommendation that it do not pass:

A bill to establish the office of surveyor general in Utah, and to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to make a statement of facts in regard to this matter.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] be allowed to make a statement to the House. Objection was made.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire, on behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, to offer some amendments to this bill, which are precisely the same as those which have been adopted to the bill that has just passed the House. The House will see the importance of passing on so much of this bill as provides for the survey of lands in the Territory.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Ohio send up his amendments, that they may be read?

Mr. DISNEY. They are in the precise terms of those adopted to the bill which has just passed the House.

Mr. WALLEY. I object to the bill, and propose to debate it.

The SPEAKER. Then, according to the order of the House, the bill must go over.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire simply to submit to the House the reasons which induce the committee to endeavor to have these amendments adopted by the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALLEY] objects to the consideration of the bill, and proposes to debate it. That being the case, it is the duty of the Chair, under the order of the House, to pass the bill over.

Mr. WALLEY. There is one provision in the bill to which I object; and if the gentleman from Ohio will consent to have that provision stricken out, and if the House consent to it, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. DISNEY. What provision does the gentleman from Massachusetts refer to?

Mr. WALLEY. To the provision with regard to polygamy.

Mr. DISNEY. I would state to the House the necessity that there is for the House to pass this bill in advance of the civil and diplomatic bill, in order that an appropriation may be made in that bill for paying the expenses of the survey of this Territory; and hence the postponement of the bill at this time is equivalent to its defeat. Well, now, the House has got into this condition with regard to this matter, that if they will not permit me to make an argument or explanation on the subject, but pass over the bill, that action involves the destruction of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be compelled to pass the bill over, being objected to, unless under the operation of the previous question, if the House should choose to vote that way.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to withdraw his objection to the bill, simply for the reason that there is actually no difference between it and other similar territorial bills. We ought not certainly to abandon the public lands which have been entrusted to our charge; and the great object sought by the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands is to provide for the appointment of a surveyor general of Utah.

Mr. WALLEY. I will withdraw my objection if the provision as to polygamy be stricken out of the bill.

Mr. DISNEY. I find that there is a wrong impression on the minds of members in reference to this matter; the question of polygamy has no connection whatever with this bill. I have already stated to the House that the Committee on Public Lands have cautiously avoided all participation in, or connection with, this question. Nor does the bill, in my judgment, at all affect, in one way or other, this institution of Mormonism. If gentlemen object to granting donations of land to settlers in the Territory of Utah, let them make a proposition to strike out that part of the bill, and I shall not oppose it. But I appeal to the House to pass so much of the bill, at all events, as provides for the survey of the lands of the Territory of Utah.

Mr. WALLEY. If the gentleman from Ohio agree to strike out the proposition about polygamy, I will make no objection to the consideration of the bill at this time.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me, I think I will be able to show how we may get on with the bill. The bill, as reported from the Committee on Public Lands, makes an exception to this Mormon institution of polygamy; that is, it excepts those who are husbands of more than one wife from a participation in the benefits of the public lands. If we desire to pass the bill with this exception in it, all that we have got to do is to disagree to the report of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union rejecting the bill, and then, when the bill comes up for consideration, we can vote for its adoption, if we are so inclined.

A MEMBER. What is the exception in the bill?

Mr. COBB. The exception is that a man having more than one wife shall not be entitled to a grant of land as donated in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What is the question now before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is upon a bill, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a recommendation that it do not pass. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DISNEY] submits a series of amendments which have not been read. He states, however, that they are precisely such as were attached to, and passed with the bill, in reference to New Mexico, this morning.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then the first question is upon agreeing.

The SPEAKER. If it is insisted upon, the first vote must be upon the recommendation of the committee, that the bill do not pass.

Mr. STEPHENS. I submit that whether the bill be passed or not, we ought to act upon it before the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill; and I ask the House to take the question without debate.

Mr. COBB. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Both upon the right and left gentlemen object to the consideration of the bill, and the Chair must pass it over.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I would inquire of the Chair if it is not the duty of the House to pass upon the recommendation of the committee, whether objection is made or not?

The SPEAKER. Objection is made upon the right and left, and—

Mr. TAYLOR. But, notwithstanding, is it not the right of the House to pass upon the recommendation of the committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has, for half an hour, endeavored to bring the House to action without debate; but he has indulged gentlemen in their disposition to debate, beyond the limits prescribed by the understanding this morning.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call the previous question.

Mr. COBB. I propose to debate the bill; but still, if the House will take it in the shape in which it came from the committee, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question arises whether the gentleman has the floor for that purpose.

Mr. COBB. I raised my objection some time ago, and before the previous question was called.

The SPEAKER. If, then, the gentleman proposes to debate the proposition, the bill must go over.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to suggest to the House, that they should vote down the recommendation of the committee.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] rises in his place, and says he has objections to the bill, and proposes to debate it, if acted upon at all.

Mr. DISNEY. I was about to make this suggestion, that—

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I submit that the gentleman from Ohio is out of order.

Mr. DISNEY. I am not aware that I am out of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is debating the proposition.

Mr. DISNEY. I do not offer any argument.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Cobb] proposes to debate the bill, and the bill must go over; and the Chair further decides that the bill has gone over. [Laughter.]

PRE-EMPTION LAWS IN MINNESOTA.

The bill next in order was House bill (No. 335,) "to extend the right of preemption over the unsurveyed lands in Minnesota, and for other purposes.

Mr. RICE. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be now put.

The bill was read in extenso by the Clerk.

It was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LANDS OF THE SIOUX INDIANS.

A bill (H. R. No. 338) to authorize the President to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota belonging to the half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes, coming up next in order, was read in extenso by the Clerk.

Mr. RICE. I move the previous question upon the engrossment of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be now put.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ROAD—ROGUE RIVER WAR.

Bills of the following titles, reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, without amendment, were next read, severally ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, were read the third time, and passed:

H. R. No. 119. A bill to provide for the continuation of a military road from Myrtle Creek to Scottsburg, in Oregon; and

H. R. No. 339. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to settle and adjust the expense of the Rogue river war.

MILITARY ROAD IN UTAH.

The bill next in order was House bill (No. 340) "to provide for the construction of a military road in the Territory of Utah."

The bill was read through.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We do not know what kind of a road this is to be—whether a turnpike or railroad.

Mr. BERNHISEL. It is to be a military road.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir, a "military road." I move that the bill be laid upon the table.

Mr. BERNHISEL. I hope that motion may not prevail. The road is very much needed.

The question was taken, and the House refused to lay the bill upon the table; there being, on a division—ayes 24, noes not counted.

Mr. McMULLIN (unanimous consent being given) said: I would like very well to have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia has the floor by unanimous consent.

Mr. McMULLIN. I understand from the Delegate from Utah that it is a wagon road. I am not disposed to make opposition; but it seems to me that we ought not to pass a bill in this way, without any kind of explanation.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was read the third time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 55; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, David J. Baily, Ball, Banks, Belcher, Bell, Benson, Benton, Breckinridge, Bug, Campbell, Chamberlain, Chastain, Clark, Clinman, Corwin, Crocker, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Disney, Dunbar, Eddy, Edmunds, Thomas D. Elliot, Etheridge, Ewerhart, Ewing, Florence, Goodrich, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hill, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, McDougall, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, Middlesworth, John G.

Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Preston, Ready, Reese, David Ritchie, Robbins, Sabin, Shower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Upham, Vail, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Westbrook—83.

NAYS—Messrs. Bocoock, Boyce, Bridges, Carpenter, Caskie, Christian, Churchwell, Cobb, Dick, Dowdell, Dunham, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Ellison, Flagler, Goode, Greenwood, Hamilton, Hastings, Hillyear, Houston, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kidwell, Knox, Kurtz, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, Mace, Milson, Morgan, Murray, Orr, Peck, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Thomas Ritchey, Rogers, Ruffin, Russell, Sage, Seward, Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, John J. Taylor, Tracy, Trout, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright—55.

So the bill was passed.

INDIAN HOSTILITIES IN UTAH.

The next bill that came up for consideration was "A bill to refund to the Territory of Utah the expenses incurred by said Territory in suppressing Indian hostilities."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

SURVEYOR GENERAL IN NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER. The business next in order is Senate bill No. 220, being "An act to establish the office of surveyor general in New Mexico, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes."

Mr. HENN. I presume it is unnecessary to take any action upon this bill, as we have already passed a bill of a similar character. I move that it be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL OFFICERS—MILITARY GOVERNMENT OF NEW MEXICO.

The bill next in order was House bill (No. 294) "for the payment of the civil officers employed in the Territory of New Mexico while under military government;" which was reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with amendments.

The first amendment was then read, as follows: At the end of the first section, add the following proviso:

Provided, That under the provisions of this act no compensation shall be made to any officers of the Army of the United States, for discharging the duties of any civil office in the Territory of New Mexico.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second amendment was to strike out the following section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to such agent as may be appointed to receive the same on behalf of the Territory of New Mexico, the sum of $12,098 64, the amount advanced from the treasury of said Territory in part payment of the salaries of the civil officers aforesaid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time, and passed.

UTAH BILL AGAIN.

Mr. COBB. I dislike the one-man power. I have been always opposed to it. And as I have had the power, perhaps, to impede or stop the progress of legislation on a certain bill here—I mean the bill which proposes to grant land and establish the office of surveyor general for the Territory of Utah—I desire now to correct what I have done in that regard. By my objection to the consideration of that bill, I have, perhaps, defeated it; and I propose now to withdraw my objection, provided I can do so. The bill, I believe, as amended, provides that the benefits of the act shall not extend to any person who shall now, or at any time hereafter, be the husband of more than one wife. Now, as I am desirous that the majority shall always govern, I am willing to withdraw my objection, provided the House will take a vote on concurring in the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which is adverse to the bill. That being done, then let some gentleman make a motion to strike out that provision. If it be the desire of the majority of the House to strike out the objectionable provision, why, then we ought to yield to the majority. That is my opinion.

The SPEAKER. Then, if there be no objection, the vote will be first taken on the report of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; which is, that the bill referred to be rejected.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a point of order; and I premise by saying, that it is not as to this particular case I raise the point; but it is a question which frequently comes up, and ought to be definitely settled. When a bill is presented to the House, and objection is made to its consideration, and when the House passes from the consideration of such bill because of the objection, it is not competent, I contend, at a subsequent period, for the gentleman making the objection to withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair at once comprehends the force of the gentleman's point of order. The gentleman is certainly correct with regard to the rule. A bill so objected to, and passed over, cannot be considered, except by the unanimous consent of the House. Hence, the Chair, in putting the question, used the words "if there be no objection;" by which he meant that it required the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. MILLSON. That is, so far as the bill is concerned. But my point goes a little further. What I contend for is this: There may be twenty gentlemen in the House intending to object to a bill, and when one of them objects, the rest may leave the House, assured that the question cannot come up again, and may be absent at the time the first objector withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that fact does not affect the principle; for it is competent for the House to set aside its rules by unanimous consent. Hence, in this case, the Chair decides that if it is the unanimous pleasure of the House, the bill may be taken up; and in that case the first vote will be upon the report of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. DISNEY. My desire is to avoid all difficulty. I anticipated the objection, and I concur in the view presented by my colleague upon the Committee on Public Lands, [Mr. Cobb.] But there is a difficulty yet in the way which I desire to get rid of. If this bill should be taken up, under the arrangement made by the House this morning, and debate should arise, it must go over. The bill is upon the Speaker's table, and there are but a few bills ahead of it. In order to accomplish the object I have in view, and the common object of all, I move that the House proceed to the business upon the Speaker's table. That will bring up the matter.

The SPEAKER. In reply to the remarks of the gentleman, the Chair states that it is the duty of the Chair, no motion being made, to go to the Speaker's table, and dispose of the private bills upon it, this being private bill day. It is the regular order of business.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Are there not some other territorial bills to be acted upon?

The SPEAKER. There are not.

Mr. WASHBURN. I understand that at the last time the House had under consideration territorial business, there was a bill reported making a grant of land to aid in the construction of a railroad in one of the Territories.

The SPEAKER. It was not reported from the Committee of the Whole at all.

Mr. WASHBURN. There certainly was such a bill before the House.

The SPEAKER. There is such a bill upon the Speaker's table; but it belongs to the morning hour. It is not a private bill, however, and would not come up during the morning hour to-day, this being private bill day.

Mr. DISNEY. I make the motion that the House proceed to the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. It is not necessary to make the motion, as that is the business before the body.

SENATE BILLS.

The following Senate bills were then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by their respective titles, and referred as indicated below:

S. B. No. 400. An act for the relief of William Duer. Referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

S. R. No. 19. An act for the relief of Rebecca J. Birdsall. Referred to the Committee on Post Office and Post Roads.

S. R. No. 17. A resolution giving the consent of Congress to the reception, by Lieutenant M.

F. Maury, of the Navy, of a gold medal from his Majesty the King of Sweden.

Mr. ORR. I ask that the last reported resolution may be put upon its passage.

The resolution was read.

Mr. SKELTON. I desire to inquire of those better acquainted with the proceedings of Congress than I am, whether this resolution is not in contravention of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. ORR. It is to remedy that very difficulty that the resolution is introduced. He cannot accept the medal without the consent of Congress.

Mr. SKELTON. Can the majority of this House, or of Congress, authorize an act in violation of the Constitution of the United States?

The SPEAKER. The language of the Constitution is, if the Chair may be permitted to state it, "without the consent of Congress." It is therefore competent for Congress to give their consent. There can be no doubt of that fact.

Mr. HAVEN. I hope the resolution will be passed without further objection.

The resolution was then read a third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering bills upon the Private Calendar.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. LILLY. I ask the consent of the House to withdraw from its files the papers in the case of Mary R. Adrian.

Several MEMBERS. For what purpose?

Mr. LILLY. If the House will permit me, I will state the reason. The papers were presented here for the purpose of perfecting the proof in the case. The application for relief, however, has been rejected by the committee to which it was referred. The applicants do not, so far as I am aware, intend to renew the claim; but these papers are valuable family relics, and it is for that reason that they wish to have them withdrawn.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think copies had better be left with the House.

Mr. LILLY. Certainly; that will be done.

There being no objection, leave was granted for the withdrawal of the papers.

Mr. HAVEN. I would like to inquire what is the next bill in order upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It is the Senate amendment to the resolution for an adjournment.

Mr. HAVEN. I hope that resolution will be taken up and disposed of.

The SPEAKER. A motion is pending to go into a Committee of the Whole House, which must be first disposed of.

The question was then taken on Mr. HENDRICKS's motion; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think this House has done as much business as can be profitably performed to-day, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, from the fact that the morning hour has not commenced.

Mr. JONES. Then I insist that the morning hour shall now commence.

WEEKLY MAILS TO THE PACIFIC COAST.

The SPEAKER. The consideration of a bill of the following title is the first business in order during the morning hour, which has now commenced:

H. R. No. 333. A bill to provide a weekly mail service between the Atlantic States and San Francisco.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Is it in order to move that the House now proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It is not, and it will not be in order until the morning hour has expired.

The bill was then read through.

Mr. McDOUGALL. It will be remembered by the House, that some six weeks ago the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] brought forward a proposition for weekly mail service to California. At that time it seemed to be the almost unanimous wish of members to secure that weekly mail service to the Pacific coast, which so much needed it. No objection was made, except to the terms of the gentleman's bill. After discussion on the measure, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads took the subject under consideration. They prepared a bill—the one now before us—to meet the express views of the body, which they unanimously directed me to report.

I will state that the Postmaster General, in his annual report, said that this service was required. It is known, and it is unnecessary to debate the question, that the present mail service to California is inadequate to the necessities of the country. Between the Atlantic cities we have a daily mail service; between the Pacific and those cities there is only a tri-monthly mail. It is true that a large amount is about being expended for the purpose of carrying a semi-monthly mail to California. The call for this weekly mail service is not only made by the people of the Pacific, but it is also made by the people of the Atlantic States. It is essential for proper intercourse between the two sections of the Union. I shall not discuss the question. My only object is to have the measure understood.

The bill now presented simply proposes that the Postmaster General shall advertise for proposals, and that he shall give the contract to the lowest bidder. I will not consume the time of the House by discussing the bill further at this time.

Mr. FULLER. I wish to ask the gentleman from California what proportion of the expense now incurred by the Government is reimbursed by the vessels already organized for the mail service?

Mr. McDOUGALL. I cannot state exactly. I will say that the amount of letter carriage is nearly double by the Panama route that carried by the Collins line to Liverpool.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I wish to ask the gentleman from California, whether the bill which he proposes, and which is now under consideration, will interfere with the present mail contracts between the eastern cities and California?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Not at all.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have no objection to the bill then, and hope it will pass.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope the gentleman from California will withdraw the demand for the previous question so that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I understand the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I would like to oblige him very much, but I cannot withdraw the demand for the previous question. His proposition has already been considered and voted down.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope my friend from California will allow the amendment to be read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The previous question having been demanded cuts off all amendments; but if no objection is made the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee will be read for information.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope the amendment will be entertained by unanimous consent. I desire it to come in at the end of the sixteenth section.

The amendment was then read, as follows:

Provided, That the contract shall be according to time, and not to exceed fourteen days from port to port.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object. The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be now put.

The question then being on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time,

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio, demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. CHURCHWELL and VAIL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 53.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and having been engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time.

The question being on the passage of the bill, Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. As the previous question has not been moved on the passage of the bill, it is in order, I presume, to make some remarks upon it.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has not been moved, and the gentleman from Kentucky has a right to address the House.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I desire to ask the gentleman from California, [Mr. McDougall], if he is able to answer me, for my own recollection is not very accurate on the subject—what is the amount which we now pay for the transportation of the mails between the Atlantic coast and California?

Mr. McDUGALL. We pay about $384,000 on this side of Panama, and $342,680 on the other side.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. What is the whole amount?

Mr. McDUGALL. About $716,000.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I am a friend to this bill, and will give a single reason for my being so. We are paying now about $716,000 annually for the transportation of the mails between the Atlantic coast and California, and that is for a semi-monthly mail. This bill proposes to double the service, making it a weekly mail, which I think is little enough between the Atlantic and Pacific coast, and to pay therefor $250,000 per year. We would thus get double as much mail service for $250,000 as we now get for $716,000, which shows the advantage of putting out these contracts to the lowest bidder; for I presume that the gentlemen from California, [Messrs. McDougall and Latham,] who are chiefly interested in this arrangement, are confident that the service can be performed at that price.

Now, I believe that we ought to have a weekly mail service between the Atlantic and Pacific coast, and I am willing to vote for this bill per se. But I call the attention of the House to the fact, that consequent on the passage of this bill, we ought to break up the existing arrangements for the bi-monthly transportation of these mails, and put that service up to the lowest bidder, so that we may get the service which now costs us something about $716,000 annually, performed for $250,000. By this means, we will get the weekly service at a good deal less than that which we now pay for the bi-monthly service under the old arrangement.

Mr. LATHAM. I wish to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. Breckinridge.] There is a bill now pending before this body contemplating the rescinding of the present mail contract via the Panama route. This bill was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, [Mr. Olds,] and will no doubt be acted upon this session. I am in favor of such rescinding, provided it can be done with justice to the contractors, and in accordance with the dignity of our Government. I would not be in favor of the Government doing anything which she would not be compelled to do by strict legal and equitable principles. But if it can be done honorably to all parties, then this contract ought to be annulled. The mail can be carried, in my opinion, weekly, for half a million per annum. That would give us a weekly mail service for $300,000 less than is now paid for a semi-monthly service. I believe, at this time, the present company which has the large contract, if the bids were to be received again, would carry the mail weekly for $500,000 per annum. And I further believe that there would be competition among the different companies. While here, let me say that, when this subject was up a few days since, in considering the bill of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. Churchwell,] I said that the Nicaragua line was far more expeditious than the Panama line, and that the latter was invariably behindhand from three to five days. I am satisfied I did the Panama line injustice; and I have a table here which shows correctly, as I am informed, the time made by these two routes since September, 1853:

New York, May 31, 1854.

This table was given to me by a gentleman connected with the Panama route, who vouched for its correctness; and I feel bound in honor to correct my previous error.

I feel deep anxiety in this bill, Mr. Chairman, as do my colleagues and our constituents. There has been no bill before Congress of so much importance to the present commercial prosperity and wants of the Pacific coast as the one now under consideration. Sir, if there had been a weekly mail between the Atlantic and Pacific coast, much of the ruin and commercial prostration which has occurred from the trade between the same would have been obviated. The supply and demand in trade between the Atlantic cities and San Francisco has been almost always disproportionate, and great loss has necessarily ensued. Every member within the sound of my voice has constituents who are interested in this matter in a greater or less degree, and I do trust they will cooperate in carrying out this measure.

This bill stands on its own merits, and should not be made to rest on the merits or demerits of a contract made in 1849, when it was difficult to get any one to accept a contract to carry the mail between New York and San Francisco. It was difficult to find the capital, and still more difficult to find men willing to hazard it in an enterprise at that time fraught with danger and vicissitudes. These things should be considered. And it also should be considered that the present people of California, and the commerce of that country, had nothing to do in making the present contract, and ought not to suffer from bad legislation, over which they had no control. I sincerely trust the bill will pass, and an act of simple justice be done to California. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. Barry.]

Mr. BARRY. I entirely agree with the gentleman as to the importance of a frequent mail communication between the two oceans. But we have a contract already on hand, by which we pay $750,000 for a semi-monthly mail. It is proposed to let that stand, and add $250,000 for another semi-monthly mail.

Mr. OLDS, (interrupting.) We pay $738,000, besides the Isthmus transportation, which amounts to over $100,000, which makes it $838,000.

Mr. BARRY. Then it will all amount to over $800,000. Now, sir, I am not anxious to reduce the mail facilities between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts one particle. On the contrary, I would vote to give them every dollar they now have, if we could not get the mails transported without it. But we can provide California with a semi-monthly mail for $250,000, by rescinding this contract. Therefore we ought, before we vote one dollar more to increase the burden of the Post Office Department, to rescind the contract already in existence. It would be unjust in the last degree to pass this bill in the present state of the finances of that Department of the Government, without the certainty of the rescission of the other contract. If you can rescind that contract, you can get, for the $850,000, a communication between the two oceans, not only by a semi-monthly, but, perhaps, by a semi-weekly mail.

We all know that contracts never go backwards. The Collins line, while making a fortune by its contract with the Government, obtaining interest beyond what could be obtained by any other investment in the country, came here and asked an increase of that compensation, and Congress nearly doubled it. These railroad and steamship companies cannot be restrained by this House, except by keeping them where they now are, and getting from them all we are entitled to, before listening to their demands. They have an influence upon this House which will overwhelm it, unless resisted; and as you have them not in your power, you cannot induce them to yield one dollar of the money which they have extorted from you, either by fraud, persuasion, or in any other manner. Unless you have them in your power, it is an absolute absurdity to expect it.

If there is a way by which we can abrogate this $750,000 contract, then I think we had better delay the passage of this bill until we can act upon that proposition. Let us dissolve this contract at once, and the question will arise as to how much we shall pay a new contractor. If that be done, I repeat, that I do not see any necessity for diminishing the amount paid for this service. I am willing that this amount should be paid for securing proper mail facilities with California, and I think by adopting this course the gentleman from California will be able to secure a better bargain than he will get by this bill. I am willing and anxious to see the expenses of the Post Office Department reduced in many particulars, but not in this. I do not think the public interest requires that any reduction should be made in this instance. I would like to have it ascertained what power we have over this company. If, therefore, this bill be laid aside informally for the present, I will vote for abrogating the present contract, if it is in our power to do it. Let us dispose of that matter first, and then I will vote for appropriating the same amount of money to secure a proper mail service to that State. I would be willing to accede to such a proposition, and I believe a majority of the House would so vote.

Mr. MACE. I will say to my friend from California, inasmuch as this bill has been connected with the other mail service to California, which the committee, of which I am a member, have under consideration, that I am decidedly in favor of it. It will be recollected that near the commencement of the present session, the House raised a special committee to inquire into the expenses and frauds growing out of our mail steamer service. In consequence of the business in which the House has been engaged, we have been unable to bring our report before them for their consideration; but, sir, I will state to the House that investigations have been prosecuted by that committee sufficiently to enable them to understand the true condition of that service. We shall be enabled to present to the House in a few days—especially if the House should grant us a clerk for the committee—some astounding facts in reference to the frauds and swindles which have grown out of this whole service from its inception down to the present time. After that shall have been done—and I pledge myself that it shall be done most effectually—the very proposition which that committee will present to the House will be the means of enabling the gentleman from California to pass this bill perhaps without a dissenting voice.

And I will say to the gentleman from California, further, that if the Collins steamer system shall be continued, so far as the service between New York and California is concerned, I undertake to say that this House will not appropriate $250,000 in addition, as is contemplated in this bill, for this service. As a friend of the bill, therefore, I would suggest that it be passed over informally for the present, and let the House investigate this subject, which they have referred to our committee, to the bottom. Let them ferret out all the frauds which have been perpetrated from the inception of this mail service down to the present time. It will be shown that these companies have constantly been receiving money from the Government outside that which they properly receive under the contract, for which they have never accounted to the Government.

Mr. ORR. I would ask the gentleman from Indiana, who is the chairman of the committee to which he refers, whether that committee has considered how the Government is to be relieved from the existing contract with this company for carrying the mail between New York and California? As I understand the law, the original contract was made for ten years, and the price stipulated to be paid was to be continued for that time, unless the Government took the vessels belonging to the company at a valuation. There were certain prerequisites which it was necessary should be complied with by the company. The company were to build a certain number of steamers of a particular description. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Indiana, whether his committee have investigated the question as to how far the contractors have complied, on their part, with the contract? I take it, that if they have not complied with it, we may at once rescind the contract. If they have complied with the contract, then the only way in which we can get clear of it is by taking the steamers at a valuation.

Mr. MACE. I take great pleasure in informing the gentleman, that with no requirement of the contract has the company complied, neither as to the tonnage of the steamers, the time of service, nor anything else. In no particular has the law been complied with, from its enactment down to the present time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question at that point. Has not the Government accepted all the vessels, and thus waived any rights it may have had in consequence of a non-fulfillment of the requirements of the contract?

Mr. MACE. In answer to the gentleman from Alabama, I will remark, that so far as the action of Congress is concerned, I find nothing of acceptance. I find a commodore, lieutenant, or captain, has made acceptance, but I do not think that acceptance binds the Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not understand that the contracts are required to be submitted to Congress. It is submitted to the Navy Department. If the steamers are built in conformity to the law and the contract, the Secretary of the Navy reports as to that fact, and then the Postmaster General does or does not make acceptance.

Mr. MACE. In regard to that point I will inform the House that propositions were made to the Government of the United States to construct steamers of certain dimensions, for the performance of certain mail service. The first contracts expressly specified that the requirements one and all, should be fulfilled by the contractors. Some modifications were made afterwards, and the Collins Steamer Company was relieved from a certain portion of their original contract. As I have already remarked, if I had time, I could most conclusively show that in almost every essential, as to size of the vessels, tonnage, value, commencement of mail service, number of trips, &c., these companies have all violated the law every six months, since the making of the contracts down to the present time. I can demonstrate, I think, beyond all controversy, and to the satisfaction of the House, that Congress has the indisputable right to annul all these contracts, and at any time.

Mr. BARRY. I would ask permission of the gentleman to submit an amendment. When he concludes I may not be able to get the floor.

Mr. MACE. I yield to the gentleman for the purpose indicated.

The SPEAKER. The bill having been ordered to be engrossed, amendment is not now in order. The amendment will be read, by unanimous consent, for information.

There was no objection, and it was read, as follows:

Add the following proviso:
Provided, That this act shall not take effect until the present contract for carrying the mail between New York and California is rescinded.

Mr. BARRY. If there be no objection, I presume the amendment can be received.

The SPEAKER. It can be received by unanimous consent only.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I object.

Mr. MACE. I would again remark that it would be an advantage to the Pacific mail service not to press the consideration of this bill at the present time. I do know that there are facts connected with this service which should be laid before the House and country. When we are in possession of those facts, and ascertain the ground upon which we stand, there will be no difficulty in affording California much better facilities than she now has. I feel as deep an interest in affording increased mail facilities to that region of country as any gentleman possibly can; but I think it entirely premature to appropriate $250,000 for that service at this time. I think that such an appropriation, under the circumstances of the case, would be wrong; and I do not believe that the bill ought to pass at present.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to reply to the gentlemen who have made objections to this bill, and to give the reasons why I have thought it prudent and wise to bring the measure forward now, without waiting for the action of Congress upon the measure abrogating the present contract. I took pains to ascertain whether, if those contracts were abrogated, we could then contract for a weekly service to California; and I find that no one of the companies organized and now running steamers to Aspinwall or San Juan, can do more than make bi-monthly trips, and there can be no competition. A weekly service would require four trips a month both ways, and therefore it would be necessary, if this contract were abrogated, to provide for two bi-monthly contracts. If we are to have weekly service, it will in no respect interfere with existing contracts, or the making of new ones. No contract can be made for weekly service with any company except the Pacific Mail Steamship Company; they have both ships, capital, and power to perform such service. We propose now a bi-monthly service; and, on the abrogation of the present contract, a new contract providing also for bi-monthly service; thus providing weekly service.

Now, I want to say to the House, that the existing contract was made some years since. California was not then a State of this Union, and had no Representatives upon this floor. If that contract is not a wise and provident one, the Pacific coast is not responsible for it. We are entitled to this service. We ask it as a matter of right. It was the duty of this Government to furnish us with proper mail facilities. You have not done it. This weekly mail service is demanded alike by the entire commercial interests of the Atlantic coast as of the Pacific coast. We are in no sense responsible for the mal-legislation of Congress years ago, and before we had any voice in this Capitol. But, because an improvident contract was made by a previous Congress, we are told by gentlemen, Representatives here, that our rights are to be withheld from us—our necessities overlooked. I think that it would be an injustice to us. The decision is unjust, and the reasoning unsound.

Mr. Speaker, we of California are not principally interested in this question. The great commercial interests of the Atlantic seaboard are more deeply interested in it than ourselves. That we should have intercommunication between the Atlantic and Pacific is of the first importance to these commercial interests. Now, gentlemen say to us, we must wait till the existing mail arrangements are canceled. But, I ask, why wait till the law passes abrogating the present contract? Who is there on this floor that has the right to say that that contract can or will be abrogated? There is, first, the tribunal of this House for the question to pass, and there is then the tribunal at the other end of the Capitol, and then there is the President, and after all there is an appeal by this company to the courts of law. Sir, I have examined this contract, and I am not very clear, from the present state of facts, that it can be abrogated in one year, or in two years. And are we still to have only this bi-monthly mail service to California up to the year 1859? For the reasons that are alleged now against this bill will hold as good all that time as they do to-day.

Gentlemen say that individually they are in favor of this abrogation of the existing contract. They wish to see it abrogated if it can be justly done, but for my part I am not certain that we have the power to abrogate it; and moreover I do not believe that any law abrogating that contract will pass Congress. If it pass this body I believe it will not pass the body at the other end of the Capitol. No one will deny that it would be an injustice, where the necessities of commerce call for these increased mail facilities, to compel us, because we cannot pass a law abrogating these contracts, to wait till its expiration. Now, I wish the House to understand that this bill in no way interferes with the existence of this contract or with its abrogation. The bill provides that the contracts for the weekly mail service are to be let to the lowest bidder for cash. The contracts for the bi-monthly service have not been made in this manner. At any rate, if the present contracts are not fulfilled new ones have to be made. There is no difficulty about passing this law whether you sustain or abrogate the present contract.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I made some remarks just now in a spirit friendly to this bill, but at the same time looking to the abrogation of the existing contract. The House is indebted to the gentleman from California [Mr. McDOUGALL] for the candor with which he expressed his opinion with regard to the existing contract. And I now make a suggestion to him and the House, still in a spirit of friendship to this measure, and to the proposition for additional mail facilities between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I tell my friend from California that I believe it is hopeless for him to expect the House to vote this $250,000 a year for additional mail facilities between the two coasts unless there is a pretty distinct and clear understanding that the existing contract will be abrogated. Because while we now pay some $740,000 annually for semi-monthly mail service, the House will not be willing to add an amount which would make it about $1,000,000, especially after having made the discovery that the same sort of service can be got weekly, at $250,000 per annum, less than one third of what is now paid for semi-monthly service.

I believe that the existing contract can be abrogated. The slight examination that I have given the subject, leads me to that belief. And I make this suggestion to the gentleman from California and the House, as well for the benefit of the country as for that of the gentleman's constituency. I suggest to him that he move to postpone this question to a day certain, and that he make arrangements, in the mean time, to connect with this bill a proposition for abrogating the existing contracts, and to put the mail service on a permanent footing by which we will be able to get weekly service for $500,000 per annum, instead of getting it, as under this bill, and the other contracts, for upwards of a million of dollars; which would thus cut down the expenditure of the mail service between the Atlantic and the Pacific, more than half a million of dollars, and give them exactly the same service which they expect to get under this new contract. I believe, if the gentleman does that, he will succeed in getting the facilities which he desires. If my friend declines to do it, I take the liberty of saying, I do not think this bill will pass.

Mr. OLDS. I believe we ought to have a weekly mail service between the Atlantic and Pacific coast; and the only question at this time is this: whether the proposition of the committee shall be postponed until you abrogate the existing contract, or whether you will give these additional mail facilities without reference to the existing contract.

The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads reported a bill some months since, not only abrogating the existing contract for the transportation of the mail between New York and San Francisco, but also the contract for the transportation of the mail between New York and Liverpool. They are connected in one bill.

Now, I believe we have the power, under the contracts, and by their terms, to abrogate them. It is true, sir, that the steamships put upon the line between New York and Panama, and also between Panama and San Francisco, have been accepted by the Secretary of the Navy. But notwithstanding they have been accepted, the very terms of the contract, it appears to me, permit us to abrogate them by taking the ships at an appraisement, one appraiser to be selected by the company, one by the Secretary of the Navy; and if those two cannot agree, they are to select a third.

Perhaps it will be recollected by the members of this House, that some two months ago the president of the Aspinwall and Pacific Coast Mail Steamship Company—I am not sure that such is the title, but it makes no difference—placed upon the tables of the members of this House, a memorial in which he claims that we have no power to abrogate this contract. We have the power, he says, to take the ships, if demanded for the service of the United States; but he claims that the power to take those ships does not give the power to abrogate the mail contract. He says they have other ships, and that if we take the ships now in service, they will still perform their contract for carrying the mail. He also claims that there is no power given in the contract itself to abrogate it. He predicates that upon a modification of the contract, in which he says Congress reserved to itself the power to abrogate it by a certain time. It seems to me that he wholly misapplies the terms of the second contract, in that it does not have reference to the abrogation by Congress of the contract itself, but an abrogation within a certain time or a certain portion of the services.

A bill has been reported by the committee, and

I believe we have the power to take those vessels. We are paying over a quarter of a million of dollars more annually for a semi-monthly mail service than we should be required to pay, if this contract were abrogated, for a weekly service. We could get a weekly service for half a million of dollars, while we are paying more than half a million for a semi-monthly service. Although the United States might lose by taking these ships at an appraisalment, yet I think the Government had better take them, even if they had to sink them in the ocean, and bring the contract to an end.

I know the feeling seems to be that it would be better first to act upon the proposition to abolish the existing contract. But, sir, independent of that proposition, I think we should have a weekly mail service between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I am in favor of establishing that service, whether the original contract is abrogated or not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have but one word to say. Some gentlemen, in the course of this discussion, have told us that we had better abrogate the existing contract before we act upon this bill to establish a new one. Now, sir, to my mind there is a very clear reason why we should act upon this measure before we take any steps toward the abrogation of that contract. If we take the latter step without first entering into a new one, we shall find ourselves without any provision for the transmission of the mail to California, and the result may be that we shall be compelled to pay a much higher price for doing the same service, to either the same company or a new one, than we now pay. Let us commence, therefore, with a semi-monthly mail, and then abrogate the old contract, and we shall be as well off as we were before.

Mr. McDUGALL. I wish to ask the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] who wishes us to make the passage of this bill dependent upon the abrogation of the old contract, whether the mail service for California does not require the establishment of a weekly mail?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I will answer the question with pleasure. I think the increased communication between California and the eastern States is such, that a weekly mail ought to be established; but I did not say at any additional expense.

Mr. McDUGALL. Now another question. If the wants of the service require the establishment of a weekly mail, is the fact that there has been previous mal-legislation any good reason for denying that weekly service?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I repeat that I think we ought to have a weekly mail between California and the Atlantic coast, and a daily mail between the important cities of the United States; but I am not prepared to say that it should be established at any cost. That is an element that should be taken into consideration. I am willing that a liberal compensation should be allowed; I would not be willing to pay five or ten millions a year for that service. Suppose we were paying $10,000,000 for a semi-monthly mail, and the gentleman from California should come forward and ask for $300,000 or $400,000 to establish a weekly mail, would not the amount we were already paying be a good reason for not appropriating more? The admission that the service is needed, is not an admission that we should pay whatever may be demanded for it.

Mr. McDUGALL. The gentleman has not replied to my last query. Suppose that, in procuring the establishment of a mail to California, we had sunk in the sea $5,000,000 five years ago, would that be any good reason why we should not now have a proper mail service for California? And if, for the last five years, by improvident legislation, you have drawn heavily on the Treasury, that is no reason why we should not have proper mail facilities.

I would say, further, to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that I think his suggestion is a very pertinent one. If we commence by abrogating this contract, we shall then be thrown without service, and a larger amount may be exacted than that now paid. You say that this Congress has the power to abrogate these contracts. Very well. Then, as a matter of course, whenever Congress sees fit to abrogate them, the Government will be absolved from all obligations in respect to them.

But I protest against this legislation being made dependent on that abrogation. It is not, in my judgment, just or right to do so. I wish as well as others to see these contracts abrogated. I desire to see the present burden removed; but there is no justice or right in making the proper mail service required by the country dependent on the abrogation of bad legislation of past times.

As it seems to be the disposition of the House, I move that this bill be postponed till next Tuesday week, when it can be better considered. Then I shall insist that it shall not be dependent on anything but its merits. The persons who have control of these other matters may, if they choose, bring them forward in the mean time. If they do so, very well.

The question was taken; and Mr. McDUGALL's motion was agreed to.

So the further consideration of the bill was postponed to next Tuesday week.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that we now proceed to the consideration of the business upon the Speaker's table, so that action may be had on the resolution fixing the time of the final adjournment of this session.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has the morning hour expired? If it has not the gentleman's motion is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has not yet expired. There are still two or three minutes left of it.

Mr. ORR. I move that the House do now adjourn.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up this morning the bill reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs "to improve the naval service." It is a brief bill, and I think we can readily get through with it before the morning hour is finished; and unless it be taken up in this way I doubt very much whether we shall be able to get it before the Senate.

There being no objection, the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill originally reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs, prescribed the number and pay of the officers in each grade, provided for a retired and furloughed naval list, for an increase of the Marine Corps, for the establishment of a Bureau of Equipment, Orders, and Detail, and for the appointment of a judge-advocate for the naval service. It also made provision for the details necessary to carry out these objects.

Mr. MALLORY, on the 31st of May, by direction of the committee, submitted an amendment to strike out all of the original bill after the enacting clause, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the grade of flag officer is hereby established, and that there shall be twenty flag officers, sixty-eight captains, and seventy commanders in the naval service, and the pay of flag officers shall be as follows: On sea service the same as now allowed to the senior captain. All other pay allowed them shall be the same as that of other captains.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no appointment of masters not in the line of promotion shall hereafter be made; and the grade of passed midshipman shall be abolished. One hundred and seventy-five of the masters now in the line of promotion, and of the passed midshipmen, shall be commissioned as masters. Midshipmen and acting midshipmen, including those at the academy, shall not exceed three hundred and thirteen, of whom one shall be appointed from each congressional district and Territory of the United States, upon the recommendation of the Representatives and Delegates thereof respectively; two from each State upon the recommendation of the Senators thereof respectively, and ten shall be appointed by the President at large.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That before any change of the grades aforesaid shall take effect, the Secretary of the Navy shall cause each captain, commander, lieutenant, medical officer, and purser, to report, under such regulations as he may prescribe, the officers of their respective grades who are qualified to perform efficiently all their duties ashore and afloat; and from his scrutiny of such reports as may be filed in the Department within six months after notice issued to said officers, the Secretary, with the approval of the President, shall retire, or permanently furlough, or drop from the service, all officers who, in his judgment, are not so qualified. And of the officers so furloughed or retired, those on the retired list only shall be entitled to wear the naval uniform. Retired and permanently furloughed officers shall, from the date of their retirement and furlough, be out of the Navy, and their places shall be supplied by regular promotion by seniority of rank. The Secretary of the Navy may, upon the application of any officer of the Navy, place him upon the retired or permanent furlough list, if, in his judgment, he deem it consistent with the interests of the service.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of every officer in command of any vessel of the Navy of the United States, upon the termination of his cruise, to make a special report to the Secretary of the Navy upon the general conduct of the petty officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, under his command on said cruise, and to designate by name those who are entitled, from their good conduct, to special notice; and, upon such reports, the Secretary of the Navy may annually select ten of said boys who may appear to him most deserving, and send them to the Naval Academy for education as midshipmen. And to each petty officer, seaman, ordinary seaman, landsman, and boy, so reported for good conduct, (provided that the number so reported from each ship shall not exceed one tenth of the crew thereof,) the Secretary shall cause to be issued a certificate of conduct and character, in such form as he may prescribe, which certificate shall entitle every petty officer to three months' extra pay, and an appropriate medal, to be devised by the Secretary, and every seaman, ordinary seaman, landsman, and boy, to three months' extra pay, provided he shall reënter within three months.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That an increase of ten hundred men shall be made to the Marine Corps.

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That, in addition to the bureaus now attached to the Navy Department, there shall be a bureau to be called the Bureau of Orders and Equipment, to which shall be assigned the duties of equipping the vessels, and of supervising, registering, and detailing the officers and men of the naval service, and such other duties pertaining to the service as the Secretary of the Navy may direct; and the orders of such bureau shall be considered as emanating from the Secretary of the Navy, and shall have full force and effect as such, and all the duties of said bureau shall be performed under his authority and supervision.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint a judge-advocate for the naval service, who shall not be a naval officer, who shall be learned in the law, and who shall be attached to the Bureau of Equipment, Orders, and Detail, and who shall receive for his services three thousand dollars per annum and his traveling expenses; it shall be his duty to prepare, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, all charges and specifications of charges to be preferred before naval courts-martial and courts of inquiry, and to keep accurate records thereof; to prepare specific instructions in each case to the acting judge-advocate to be designated by him, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy; to codify and arrange all the laws of Congress, and the rulings and decisions of the district, circuit, and Supreme Courts of the United States, touching courts-martial and courts of inquiry; and to compile and submit to the Secretary of the Navy general instructions, forms, and principles applicable to them, and the manner of conducting them, and to preserve perfect records of all such courts, and of the cases heard or tried before them: Provided, That nothing herein shall preclude commanders of squadrons on foreign stations from ordering such courts, when, in their opinion, the exigencies of the public service may demand them, under such rules and regulations as said judge-advocate general, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, may prescribe.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the chief of the bureau established by this act, be allowed the same franking privilege as that conferred by law on the chiefs of the other bureaus; and the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, may hereafter appoint as chief of any bureau attached to the Navy Department, excepting the Bureaus of Provisions and Clothing, and Construction, and of Medicine and Surgery, any officer at his discretion.

Mr. MALLORY. The substitute was prepared by the committee, under the eye of the Secretary of the Navy. I am directed by the committee to offer some amendments to it. The first is to strike out the second section of the substitute, and insert, in lieu of it, the following:

And be it further enacted, That no appointment of masters not in the line of promotion, shall hereafter be made; and the recognition of passed midshipmen as a distinct class or grade is hereby abolished, and so much of all acts or parts of acts as recognizes such distinction, or allows to passed midshipmen any different pay than that of midshipmen is hereby repealed, from and after the time when the provisions of the next section hereof shall be carried into effect. The masters now in the line of promotion, and the passed midshipmen who shall remain in the service and not be promoted to the rank of lieutenant after the retirement provided by the next section, shall be commissioned as masters according to their present rank; and if there thus remain more than seventy-four such officers, no new master shall be commissioned until the number shall be reduced below seventy-four, which number shall thereafter constitute the said grade of master. The duties of the said grade shall be such as the President of the United States shall prescribe. The number of midshipmen and acting midshipmen, including those at the Naval Academy, shall be determined as follows, to wit: one shall be appointed from each congressional district of the United States on the recommendation of the Representative thereof, two from each State on the recommendation of the Senators thereof respectively, ten to be appointed by the President at large, and those authorized by this act to be selected from the boys of the Navy.

The next amendment was to insert in the third section of the substitute, after the provision that the officers on the retired list shall be entitled to wear the naval uniform, the words "and shall have their names borne on the Navy register, but as out of the line of promotion and of command, and shall not be counted as the number limited by law of their respective grade."

The next amendment was so to alter the following provision, "retired and permanently furloughed officers shall, from the date of their retirement and furlough, be out of the Navy, and their place shall be supplied by regular promotion by seniority of rank," as to make it read, "permanently furloughed officers shall, from the date of their furlough, be out of the Navy, and the place of retired and permanently furloughed flag officers, and other officers, shall be supplied by regular promotion by seniority of rank."

The next amendment was to add at the end of the third section the words:

The Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, shall also retire or drop from the service the masters, passed midshipmen, and midshipmen who, in his judgment, are not qualified to perform efficiently all their duties.

The next was to insert, as a new section, after section three, the following:

And he it further enacted, That officers on the retired list shall receive three fifths, and those on the permanent furlough list shall receive two fifths of the sea-service pay to which they were entitled when retired or furloughed, and that the pay of the masters authorized to be commissioned by the provisions of this act shall be the pay of sailing masters as established by the "act to regulate the pay of the Navy of the United States," approved March 3, 1835.

The next amendment was in the fifth section in the provision authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to select ten boys from the vessels of the Navy as midshipmen, to strike out "ten" and insert "not exceeding five;" and, also, to insert after the word "boys" the words "not over sixteen years of age."

The next amendment was in the same section in the provision allowing the Secretary of the Navy to issue a certificate of good conduct to those reported from each ship as deserving it, to insert after the word "certificate," "provided the person to whom the same shall be issued, shall reenlist in the Navy within three months from the date thereof," and to strike out a similar proviso in another place.

The next amendment was in the seventh section, to strike out the words "Order and Detail" wherever they occur, so that the bureau there provided for shall be "the Bureau of Equipment."

The next amendment was to insert after the provision allowing traveling expenses to the judge-advocate of the Navy the words "as allowed to officers of the Navy;" and to strike out the words "to be designated by them," occurring in a subsequent part of the section.

The next amendment was to strike out the proviso—

"Provided, That nothing herein shall preclude commanders of squadrons on foreign stations from ordering such courts," [courts of inquiry and courts martial,] "when, in their opinion the exigencies of the public service may demand it, under such rules and regulations as such judge-advocate general, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Navy, may prescribe."

And to insert in lieu of it the following:

Provided, That nothing herein shall preclude commanders of squadrons on foreign stations from ordering such courts as now authorized by law.

These amendments to the amendment reported by the committee as a substitute were agreed to, and that amendment as amended was adopted.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, the amendment was concurred in, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask that the question on the passage of the bill be not put at this moment. There is an amendment which I wished to have incorporated in it. I am very sure it has been made, but still I desire to look at it; and I wish the Senator from Florida to consent to allow the question on the passage of the bill to be postponed until to-morrow. It can then be passed during the morning hour.

Mr. MALLOY. Very well.

So the further consideration of the bill was postponed until to-morrow.

ANNUAL MEETING OF CONGRESS.

The bill to appoint a day different from the first Monday in December for the annual meeting of Congress, was read a second time, and on motion by Mr. DOUGLAS, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

It proposes to enact that after the expiration of the present Congress, the annual meeting of Congress shall commence on the first Monday in October.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me, Mr. President, that the first Monday in October is a little too soon for our meeting. I will suggest to the Senator from Illinois whether the first Monday in November will not be better.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think that would not equalize the sessions enough. We should hardly get through with our business by the summer holidays. By meeting on the first Monday in October, we should be able to get through with our business by the holidays, without increasing the time which is now taken up by the two sessions. A great deal would be gained by it; and I think we had better adopt the time I have indicated; however, I wish to submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. In many of the States of this Union the month of October is a very busy month both with farmers and lawyers, who constitute a large proportion of the members of both Houses. It seems to me that it would be better to meet on the first Monday in November instead of the first Monday in October, and I propose an amendment to that effect.

Mr. CLAYTON. I think, sir, there is probably not a month in the year in which lawyers are not busy, and as to farmers, they are occupied in November as well as in October. The object of the bill, I suppose, is, as far as possible, to equalize the sessions of Congress—to make the long sessions shorter, and the short sessions longer. I think that object would be better attained by the bill of the Senator from Illinois as it stands. I would prefer October to November. In that way you could gain two months, virtually, to the short session; and I suppose there is no other object for which the bill is intended.

Mr. MASON. I should prefer very much the first Monday in November to the first Monday in October; but I am utterly unprepared to meet at an earlier day than now fixed by law. I fear that the only effect of it would be to prolong the short session, without at all diminishing the duration of the long session. It is the theory of our Government—and the practice of it—that our labors here at Washington are not to interfere seriously with our private business.

The compensation which is given to members of Congress, everybody knows, cannot be increased. I think it would be idle to attempt it. Everybody equally knows that what they now receive is not a remuneration for their services. Why, then, I respectfully ask, should we run any risk of prolonging the time of our services here? We all have our occupations, and we are all obliged to abandon them to a very great extent. Certainly gentlemen who come here from a great distance have to abandon them almost altogether.

Now, we know that the experience of the Government is—and it may be a very proper experience—that members of both Houses of Congress indulge themselves in most protracted debates, either upon matters relating to the public policy or upon matters which tend to diffuse information which the people probably could not well gather from other sources than from the public debates. The debates last here, and must continue to last, upon interesting topics, not for weeks only, but for months, and nothing drives us home at last at the long session, but an utter physical inability to continue here longer.

I fear, therefore, if we adopt an earlier day for our meeting at the long session, we shall remain here just as long as we should if we met on the first Monday of December, and we know—the practice of both Houses of Congress proves it—that all the business of the session, if we mean by business the legislation, the actual voting—is, either at the long or short session, crowded into the last two or three weeks. I do not think, therefore, any practical good will result from meeting at an earlier day, and for one, I would be gratified if the Senator who has introduced this proposition would reconsider it, or the Senate reject it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Virginia has evidently overlooked another proposition, which is intended to be a part of this, and which meets the objection which he presents. It is a proposition which I submitted at the same time that I introduced this bill—to fix the adjournment of the long session of Congress by a joint rule, on the first Monday in May.

Mr. MASON. I do not understand that we have the power to limit the term of Congress by law. The day of adjournment is fixed at any time during the session which is most convenient to a majority. I ask the Senator how he is to limit the term, because the Houses of Congress may at any time, during the long session, pass a joint resolution fixing a day of adjournment?

Mr. DOUGLAS. We have no power, I am satisfied, to limit the term of the session of Congress, by law. I am inclined to think that the objection which was taken by President Jackson to the bill which passed during his administration was valid—that we could not fix the time of adjournment by law; but we can fix it by a joint rule of the two Houses, subject to the disapproval of either House. If we adopt a joint rule fixing the time of adjournment on the first Monday in May, we shall then come here with reference to adjourning at that time. We shall arrange our business for that adjournment.

The day will be fixed during the whole session, unless there are special reasons at the end of the session for changing it; and it is not probable that it would be changed by a vote of either House, unless some emergency arose at the time rendering it absolutely necessary to prolong it. In such a case the power ought to exist.

If there should be an emergency, some stern necessity arising just at the end of the long session of Congress, and requiring the prolongation of the session, of course it would be made longer in order to cover that necessity; but unless such an emergency did arise, it is evident that we should adjourn on the day fixed by the joint rule of the two Houses.

Looking, therefore, at the two propositions together, it will amount to this: We shall meet on the first Monday in October, and the first session will adjourn on the first Monday in May, and the second session on the 4th of March. That would make the short session about five months long, and the long session about seven months, which would be less than we now have.

My object is to shorten the session, and at the same time do the public business. I believe we can accomplish much more by this arrangement than we can do now by meeting three months at one session, and nine months at another session, and then we avoid the hot weather of the summer months by it. I bring forward the proposition for the purpose of inviting the attention of the Senate to it. Whatever disposition is made of it of course will be acceptable to me. If another day than the first Monday of October suits the Senate better, I shall be entirely willing to acquiesce in it, although I think the first Monday in October will be the best time.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the Senator from Illinois, what he supposes would be the effect of the joint rule, in relation to the time of adjournment, in the event, at some future Congress, of one House passing a resolution changing the day of adjournment, and the other House not receiving it?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Of course it would stand precisely then as if there were no joint rule of the two Houses to that effect. The two Houses must concur in such a case in another day of adjournment, or, in the event of their disagreeing, the time must be determined by the President.

Mr. ADAMS. I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, and then, if that succeeds, I shall vote against the bill. In addition to the consideration that I am of opinion that as much public business is done at the short session as at the long session, the convenience of the State which I have the honor, in part, to represent, is a matter which will control my vote on this question. We elect our Representatives upon the first Monday in November, in reference to the meeting of Congress as fixed by law at this time, and as it existed at the time of the adoption of our Constitution.

The effect of this law would be to deprive Mississippi of her representation in the other branch of Congress entirely until some two months after the two Houses met. This would place her in such a condition that her Representatives would have no chance to be put upon the committees of the other House. It would be effectually disfranchising her in the other branch of Congress, or forcing her to change her constitution so as to bring on the election at an earlier day. Her people have not thought proper to do so, and I should not feel authorized to vote for bringing on the session of Congress a month before the election of her members for that Congress.

But I am convinced that, by meeting on the first Monday in October, no more business will be done in five months than is now done in three. We do no more in the nine months of the long session than we do in the three months of the short session. If we should fix the time now to adjourn in the middle of July, we should do as much, according to my observation, as we should by sitting to the first of September. Until the time of adjournment is fixed, somehow or other—no body is disposed to delay, but we do nothing until the last days of the session.

I do not think any practical effect would result to the country from the change proposed by the bill, but great inconvenience would result to the State which I have the honor in part to represent, as well as to other States. There are others in which their Representatives are not elected in time to meet on the first Monday in October. They would, therefore, be required to change their constitutions, or they would in effect be disfranchised in the other branch of Congress for some time after its meeting.

Mr. BAYARD. If I supposed that this bill were calculated to equalize the sessions of Congress and produce an earlier adjournment, I would cheerfully vote for it; but it seems to me it does not meet the source of the evil. By the bill you propose to extend the length of the short sessions, but it would never curtail your long sessions.

As to the idea of the honorable Senator from Illinois to pass a joint rule providing that Congress shall adjourn on the first Monday in May, at the long session, such a rule would be perfectly nugatory, if either House were to differ from it. I do not suppose that it would have any practical effect at all; but my objection to it would be that the Constitution evidently intends, and the character of the business to be transacted implies it—that each Congress shall determine the time of adjournment for itself. The public business of each Congress may differ, and the subject is evidently left, in my mind, to each to determine for itself when it shall adjourn. I do not think it is properly a subject for a joint rule by a preceding Congress at all. I object to it, therefore, on principle.

But I do not think it would have any practical effect; because on the terms of any such rule, or of any law which should be passed, either House of Congress, without assigning any reason, could refuse to adjourn on the day fixed, and Congress then would not stand adjourned on that day. There is no power by which you could impose any obligatory terms upon them to stand adjourned, if either House chose to dissent from it.

I do not think, therefore, that the object of equalizing the sessions would be accomplished by this bill. I believe, however, you may accomplish that object. I believe you may reach the result of diminishing the length of time during which Congress may continue in session. I believe you can do it in but one way, and that is by changing your per diem compensation into an annual salary.

Do that, and Congress will not sit beyond the first Monday in May. Do that, and all the public business will be transacted as well in three months as it would be in a session of five months, or as it is now done in your sessions of nine months and three months. You will have to do that before you reach this evil connected with the prolonging of the sessions of Congress. You may, by this bill, in this way, lengthen the short session, but you would find that in the long session, you would not adjourn by the middle of July, and it would gradually creep up as it has been in former times, until you would get into the first of September, which has been the ordinary time of adjournment for several sessions past. As long as the per diem compensation exists, which is the source of the evil, you will find that you cannot shorten the session of Congress, but there will be an eternal tendency to prolong it.

There will be no difficulty about it if the per diem is changed into an annual compensation. Interest—I speak of the masses, not of individuals—lies the other way; and the object will then be to transact the business and go home. Therefore, it being the interest of members of Congress to do that, according to all reasonable inferences of human action, they will necessarily do the business sooner. I have no doubt of the capacity of Congress to transact all its business within a far less period of time than it does now. There are a great variety of ways in which the sessions of Congress might be shortened, if that rule were adopted as to the compensation of members, and it is the only way in which you can accomplish it.

A much higher result which would be derived from that, independent altogether of shortening the sessions of Congress, would be that in order to shorten them, all the mass of private claims which are foolishly heard here—probably foolishly is a strong term, but certainly not properly investigated here—would, by a general law, be placed before a proper tribunal by which justice would be done to all properly and speedily, and Congress would disburden itself of a class of business which it is incompetent to investigate and decide upon.

You would accomplish, therefore, in my judgment, an immense benefit to the country, independent of shortening the sessions, for, in order to shorten them, a vast amount of cases which are kept up here, and which otherwise would not be kept up, would be transferred to another tribunal, where the public and the individual would be represented, and where there would be notice and publicity in regard to the case, and something like evidence would be received. I think you can reach that result; I do not think you will reach it, by establishing such a tribunal, until you do abolish the per diem compensation. Unless that be done, I do not believe the result will be reached, but when it is done, I have no doubt that the effect will follow, because, in point of fact, the period of time which we occupy in matters really of public importance—I do not speak of private bills merely—is but little indeed.

My own belief is that Congress would transact all its business in three months in each year under the system of annual compensation to its members; and it would get rid of a vast mass of business which is not proper to it; and what is proper to it would be done far better than it is now done. It is true we might not have the same lengthy speeches made that are now made; it is true that we might not have a political excitement in every Congress—but I think the general interests of the country would be subserved by that course of action. I hope that at some day, at all events, Congress will adopt the principle of annual compensation. I am very sure, in reference to the particular matter now before you, the sessions will never be shortened until that principle is adopted.

Mr. FOOT. I hope the Senator from Illinois will consent to the postponement of this question until to-morrow, in order that the Senate may now proceed to the consideration of the special order, which is the bill returned to the Senate by the President of the United States, with his objections.

Mr. DOUGLAS. If it is the desire to go on with the special order, I have no objection to letting this go over until to-morrow.

The further consideration of the bill was accordingly postponed until to-morrow.

INDIGENT INSANE BILL VETO.

The Senate resumed the reconsideration of the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of the indigent insane persons which had been returned by the President of the United States with his objections.

Mr. SEWARD addressed the Senate for more than an hour in support of the bill, and in reply to the objections made thereto by the President. His speech will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to address the Senate on this subject.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. If the honorable Senator from Alabama will give way, I will move to postpone the further consideration of this subject, with a view to an Executive session.

Mr. CLAY. I am willing to accommodate myself to the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of the subject before the Senate until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

ISSUE OF A REGISTER.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator from Arkansas will defer his motion for an Executive session, I should like to make a report from the Committee on Commerce. That committee have instructed me, upon the petition of Charles Parsons, to report a bill "to authorize the issuing of a register to the brig Amelia by the name of Abby Frances;" and I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put the bill on its passage now. I will say, in a word, that this is a foreign vessel on which it is proposed to add repairs equivalent to three fourths of the valuation of the vessel. The general law provides for issuing an American register under those circumstances where a vessel has been wrecked. This case does not come within the letter, though it does come within the spirit of the law. The vessel is a foreign vessel, requiring repairs to the extent of three fourths its value, although it has not been wrecked.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read a first and second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize a register to be issued, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the Russian-built brig named, if it shall be proved to his satisfaction that the cost of repairs made in the United States since its purchase, is equal to three fourths of the value of the vessel at the time of the repairs.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

COMPENSATION OF PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. BELL. I hope the Senate will allow me—I am sure my friend from Arkansas will not object to it—to call up the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, "making provision to compensate agents for paying pensions, and prescribing the time and manner of settling their accounts." It is to compensate a class of pension agents who served the public for a long time without any remuneration whatever. I am sure there is no Senator who has heard of the subject, that is not fully convinced this is an act of justice. I hope the bill will be taken up and passed now. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make suitable compensation to agents for paying pensions, (in no case exceeding three per centum on the amount of moneys annually disbursed by each agent,) to be paid out of the fund appropriated for the payment of revolutionary pensioners. This compensation is to be in full for all services and contingent expenses of the agency, except for books, printing, and stationery. The amount allowed to any one agent is not to exceed $1,500 a year. Each agent is to state his account quarterly and transmit it to the proper accounting officer of the Treasury for settlement, and a duplicate to the Commissioner of Pensions. He is also to transmit semi-annually to the Commissioner the names of all pensioners on the lists in his agency at the commencement of each half year, to whom he is liable to make payments, the names of such pensioners as have been inscribed on the lists, or transferred to his agency during that time, and the names of those he has paid, those who have died, those whose pensions have terminated, those who have not demanded their pensions for fourteen months, those who have been transferred to other agencies, and the names of the female pensioners who have married.

The Secretary of the Interior is to regulate the remittances of funds to the agents for the payment of pensioners, in such manner and at such times as to prevent any accumulation of balances in their hands.

It further provides that the provisions made by the bill for the compensation of pension agents shall be extended to those persons who served as pension agents prior to February 20, 1847, and subsequent to April 20, 1836, when no compensation was provided by law for such services.

Mr. HUNTER. I would ask the chairman of the committee that reported this bill, whether there is really any necessity for it? whether there is not an existing provision of law for the compensation of pension agents?

Mr. SHIELDS. There is a system of payment now in operation. This bill regulates that system according to the recommendations of the Department; and it also provides for payment to those pension agents who performed the duties for a number of years without any compensation.

The bill itself states distinctly on its face what is to be its operation.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope this bill will not be passed. I take it that the provision in the last section of the bill will allow compensation for alleged services rendered twenty years ago. Oftentimes, I know, officers of banks in different States took upon themselves the duty of paying these pensions for the purpose of getting the deposits in their banks of the money for that purpose. They took the office without compensation, with that understanding for their own advantage. Now, it is proposed to go back and pay people who rendered service in that way twenty or twenty-five years ago. It does seem to me that it is one of the most unreasonable and unnecessary wastes of the public money which could possibly be conceived of. The fourth section of the bill, if I understand it, provides for payment to all persons who served as pension agents before 1847, and who were not compensated. If that be the provision, we may have to go back forty years perhaps, and we may have accounts rendered under that provision to the extent of how many millions we can have no knowledge.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the bill will be laid over, so that we can look into it.

Mr. SHIELDS. There is a report accompanying the bill which explains the whole matter. I do not take any particular interest in it, but I hope the bill will be passed.

Mr. BELL. The interest which I feel in it is, that there is a very worthy gentleman, who was a faithful officer of the Government, and acted in this capacity for a number of years without any compensation. He is not, and never was a political friend of mine; but I should like to see him paid for his services. If the Senator from Georgia will look at the bill, he will find that the provision about which I feel most concern, goes back only to 1836. I do not distinctly perceive whether it includes the deposit banks or officers of those banks who assumed the duties of paying pensioners in place of the old United States Bank. Its benefits are intended for a class of agents who were appointed in different parts of the country, especially where there were no deposit banks, when the United States Bank went down, and the pension moneys were withdrawn from that institution. Those men actually served for a number of years without the slightest compensation whatever. I always attributed it to the difficulty which the party then in power felt in making compensation to these agents, because it had been alleged and argued in favor of sustaining the United States Bank, that that institution acted as the agent of the Government in every quarter of the country, without any extra compensation, and they did not wish to create any feeling in favor of that institution.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator will find that this bill covers banks as well as individuals.

Mr. BELL. If it be proposed to pay the deposit banks subsequent to 1836 for disbursing these moneys, from the use of which they derived large profits, I should wish to have that portion of the bill stricken out, because they were amply compensated for any duties of that description by the advantage which they received from the Government deposits. But in Nashville, where there was a deposit bank, I know that bank did not act as pension agent, but there was a distinct agent, to my recollection, from that time forward, and he continued to labor on without compensation under the assurance which he received from time to time, that by-and-by the Government would see that he was paid. He was a very faithful man—my colleague knows him very well—Mr. Joel L. Smith. As I have already stated, I considered that the point of difficulty with the then Administration in not coming forward and proposing to give compensation to these agents, was that it had been an argument in favor of upholding the old United States Bank, that there was a vast amount of service rendered to the Government in the disbursement of the public moneys, and the payment of pensions in every portion of the Union, without any extra compensation from the Government—that they did it merely in virtue of being the depositaries under the United States Bank law of the public moneys, and considered the circumstance of holding the public moneys in their vaults, as sufficient compensation for the services of the clerks, and officers employed by them for the Government business. Now, sir, what can be more equitable and just, than to go to 1836, and make compensation to the agents who were employed to pay pensions after the United States Bank went down. I do not care for paying any of the banks.

Mr. SHIELDS. The report gives the law and the whole facts of the case. From the report, it appears that on the 20th of April, 1836, Congress repealed the law which authorized the Bank of the United States to pay pensions, and at the same time enacted that all such payments should thereafter be made by such persons or corporations as the Secretary of War might direct, and that no compensation or allowance should be made for such service. Soon after the passage of this act, the report says, many of the pension agents tendered their resignations, but were induced to withdraw them on the assurance that Congress would speedily compensate them for their services. Numerous efforts were made from time to time to fix their compensation, but nothing was done in the matter until February 20, 1847, and then a general law was passed, and they have received compensation according to its terms ever since. There is, therefore, but a short period to which the provisions of the last section of the bill will apply. But after all, the Senator from Georgia is correct in one particular, and I think it would be better to insert a provision that that section should not apply to banks. It was not intended to include them; but in order to avoid all difficulty, it would, perhaps, be as well to insert an amendment of this nature:

Provided, That no compensation shall be allowed where banks acted as such agents.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Illinois, that they had better give us a little time to examine this subject. The amendment suggested by the Senator from Illinois will not reach the evil, because in old times there was a technical discrimination taken in the departments between private bankers and incorporated banks. The amendment of the Senator would reach incorporated banks but would still leave private bankers, who had all the benefit of the deposits, to charge a commission.

Mr. TOOMBS. Frequently an officer of the bank was made an agent, and not the bank itself.

Mr. BELL. If the bill be postponed, will the Senator from Virginia agree to take it up on some morning?

Mr. HUNTER. I only ask a day or two to look into it, and when I have examined it, I shall be willing to take it up and dispose of it.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I hope the Senate will dispose of this bill now. It strikes me as being eminently just and proper to be passed; but in order to obviate the objection raised by gentlemen, as respects the compensation to be allowed to the banks who acted as agents, I will move this amendment:

Provided, That no payment be allowed, under the provisions of this act, to any bank or bank officer, agent, or attorney.

Mr. HUNTER. That would not reach the case, which I suggested, of an unincorporated bank or a private banker.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. Then I will agree to add to my amendment the words of the honorable Senator: "unincorporated bank or private banker." I will take it as a favor, if the Senate will pass the bill now.

Mr. HUNTER. I asked to have the bill postponed, but now I move that it lie on the table.

Mr. BELL. Would it not be better to postpone it?

Mr. STUART. If it be ordered to lie on the table, it can be taken up at any time.

Mr. BELL. Very well.

The motion was agreed to.

URBAN STOLL.

The bill for the relief of Urban Stoll was read a second time, and, on motion by Mr. HAMLIN, the Senate proceeded to consider it as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to pay to Stoll, now a pensioner of the United States, a sum equal to seventy-two dollars per annum, from July 4, 1845, to the time when his present pension was allowed.

Stoll, who was a soldier of the regular Army, and served faithfully and with distinction in the Florida war, and was disabled by a serious wound in the thigh, in the battle of Whitlacoochee, in July, 1845, made application to the Pension Office for an invalid pension, and forwarded to the office certificates of Captain Drane and Surgeon Abadie, showing his services and disability. Hearing nothing from his application, he went in person to the office, and was informed that no such papers as those he had forwarded could be found, and that it would be necessary for him to send duplicates, and make a new application. Owing to the distant service and circumstances of his former officers, he was not able to obtain duplicates until within this year, when, upon a re-examination of his case by a medical board, he was placed on the pension rolls, at the rate of six dollars per month. He claims that he was deprived of his pension, to which the late action of the Pension Bureau proves he was entitled, by the carelessness of the clerks or employees of the office, in 1845, and from that year to the present time. The fact of his papers having then been duly forwarded in 1845, is proved by affidavit of John Hammond, accompanying the papers, and that upon those papers, if properly examined, he would have been allowed a pension, is proved by the recent action of the Pension Office.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

REFERENCE OF HOUSE BILLS.

The bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Henry Lewis, of Clinton county, Indiana, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

The House bill, to authorize the President to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota, belonging to the half breeds, or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The following House bills were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

Bill to establish the offices of surveyor general of New Mexico, Kansas, and Nebraska, to grant donations to actual settlers therein, and for other purposes;

Bill to extend the right of pre-emption over unsurveyed lands in Minnesota, and for other purposes; and

Bill to amend the act approved September 27, 1850, to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon, &c.; and also, the act amendatory thereof, approved February 19, 1853.

The following House bills were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

Bill to provide for the continuation of a military road from Myrtle Creek to Scottsburg, in Oregon;

Bill to authorize the Secretary of War to settle and adjust the expenses of the Rogue River Indian war;

Bill to provide for the construction of a military road in the Territory of Utah;

The House bill to increase the salaries of the Executive and judiciary officers in Oregon, New Mexico, Utah, Washington, and Minnesota, and House bill making appropriations to defray the expenses of the Cayuse war, were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33d CONGRESS, 1st Session.

TUESDAY, JUNE 20, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 91.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILLIER] to suspend the rules for the purpose of introducing a bill "to change the day for the annual assembling of Congress."

Mr. CHURCHWELL, by permission of the House, then made a personal explanation, growing out of a speech made by Senator BELL, in reference to the Nebraska question. [The speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the consent of the House to make a personal explanation.

There being no objection,

Mr. CAMPBELL proceeded. Mr. Speaker, in the course of my five years' service I have never before asked the consent of the House to make any personal explanation. Grievances of a purely personal nature have always seemed to me better settled outside this Hall. But, sir, I am induced this morning to change my usual policy, because there is, perhaps, a pertinency in my doing so just now, the gentleman from Tennessee having brought before the House matters connected with his speech on the Nebraska question.

I shall bring to the notice of the House some remarks personal to me, which purport to have been made by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] upon this floor, on the subject of the Nebraska bill. It is with great regret that I feel it necessary to advert now to any of the occurrences which took place during that memorable struggle. So far as any personal difficulty which I may have been connected with during that struggle is concerned—I am very happy to say to the House that I had only one—to use the stereotyped expression, "which has been amicably adjusted on terms, I believe, entirely consistent with the honor of both parties!" [Laughter.]

But I hold in my hand the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, who has just taken his seat. I find that I am alluded to in that speech as an "Abolitionist." Now, sir, I listened to that speech with great attention, and I did not hear my name mentioned at all. I will read the extract, and then I will ask the honorable gentleman whether he uttered these remarks upon the floor of the House, or whether he followed the somewhat usual custom in the House, and inserted them in revising the notes for the purpose of perfecting his argument? He says:

"So, it will be seen by this vote, that both the Whig Senators from Tennessee [Messrs. JONES and BELL] voted for the repeal, while four of my colleagues [Messrs. CULLOM, EVERIDGE, TAYLOR, and BUGG] in this end of the Capitol are found voting with such Abolitionists as GIDDINGS and CAMPBELL, and with the Free-Soilers, against it."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman whether he uttered this language upon the floor of the House or not?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. My recollection does not serve me whether I used those words in the Hall or not; but I am responsible for them.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Yes, sir; I have no doubt the gentleman is responsible. I have no question of his responsibility at all. The interrogatory I propounded was this: Did you utter that language on this floor? The gentleman evades the question, and says he is responsible.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman yield me?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not unless the gentleman can answer my question. That is the purpose I am driving at.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Then the gentleman will allow me to answer?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. My colleague [Mr. SMITH] tells me that he heard me use the language referred to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I have to say, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has done me injustice, and thereby, I think, he has done injustice to his colleagues. I do not care what position the gentleman may give me where his speech will be circulated. I care but little for the name, whether the gentleman calls me an Abolitionist or Free-Soiler, Whig or Democrat, in Tennessee. I have always avowed here, sir, on all proper occasions, without fear, I think I may be permitted to say, my principles in relation to the institution of slavery, and every other great question which came before this House.

And I have this to say—and I say it in connection with another passage of the gentleman's speech, to which I will call his attention in a moment—that I know a very great effort was made on the eve of the last presidential election to brand the supporters of General Scott as Abolitionists throughout the South; and as it was well known that the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CULLOM] and myself united in his support, on the eve of that election there was published in this city, in the organ of the Administration, the Union newspaper, a base and infamous forgery over my signature, in which it was alleged that I knew, from private conferences with General Scott, that, if elected, he would use his influence to repeal the fugitive slave law. I know that that document thus published, that forgery thus issued from this city and that press, over my name, was circulated broadcast throughout the State of Tennessee; and I appeal to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ZOLLICOFFER] whether such was not the fact?

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER, (in his seat.) That is true.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I discovered the fact but a few days before the presidential election, at my home in Ohio; and I immediately telegraphed to all the leading Whig papers in the South that the paper was a forgery. Among other gentlemen, I think that I telegraphed to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ZOLLICOFFER.]

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER, (in his seat.) That is true.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Having thus created the impression, by this forged document, in the South, that I am an Abolitionist, the gentleman comes here and assumes that I am such, and classifies his colleagues with me in order that they might be affected by it in Tennessee. And it is not on my own account, sir, as I said before, that I make this correction; but for the reason that I am unwilling any friend or foe of mine shall have injustice done him by means of this kind, if I can prevent it.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Of course.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. If I mistook the gentleman's position, I presume it is for him to define now what his position really is. I do not desire to misrepresent the gentleman. If I misunderstood him, I would be glad to know where the misunderstanding was. I judged of the gentleman by his associations on this floor, and by his votes; finding him always voting with the Abolitionists, I think I had a right to view him as such.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to correct the gentleman. I am not charging that he has made a willful misrepresentation; but I am charging that by these statements, and by this particular association, he has done gross injustice to his own colleagues. Now, sir, my antecedents and my principles are known here, and you may call them what you please.

My antecedents are these: My first vote was given for Henry Clay. I voted for him always when he was a candidate, and used all my energies and power, and not a little money, to secure a triumph for him. My last vote upon the presidential question was given for General Scott, and in the meanwhile I never voted any other than a Whig ticket.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question? Did he not vote against the fugitive slave law?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did I not vote against the fugitive slave law? To be sure I did, and so did every Whig from the North upon this floor, except three. I might say in relation to the measures of 1850, that a great many southern men voted against the admission of California. I now come to another part of the gentleman's speech, and to which I wish to invite the attention of the gentleman from Tennessee. In speaking of the speech of his colleague [Mr. CULLOM] upon the Nebraska bill, and of those who had congratulated him, he says, "such men as GIDDINGS, of Ohio, did so."

I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. GIDDINGS] whether, at the time the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] made his speech upon the Nebraska bill, he did come up and congratulate him?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I cannot speak as to the time the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] made his speech, otherwise than by reports in the newspapers. At the time the gentleman made his speech upon the Nebraska bill I was in Ohio.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Did you congratulate him by telegraph?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I did not. I knew nothing of the speech till some time afterwards, and could not have had any communication upon the subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Again, he says GERRIT SMITH congratulated him. I would ask the honorable gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] whether he came up on that occasion and congratulated the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. SMITH. I did not.

Mr. CAMPBELL. It seems, then, that neither of these gentlemen congratulated the gentleman from Tennessee. Now comes the point to which I ask the gentleman's particular attention. He says that "Mr. CAMPBELL, who is of the same stripe with these gentlemen, did congratulate the gentleman from Tennessee," [Mr. CULLOM.] I sat in my seat closely observing and listening to the debate between the two honorable gentlemen from Tennessee, and I never heard a syllable of the statement which the gentleman has published. I now ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he uttered those remarks upon the floor of the House, or did he print them subsequently in his speech, merely?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. The gentleman from Ohio is indeed jealous of the reputation of my honorable colleague.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Not at all. He is able to take care of that himself.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. When I made allusion to the fact that my colleague was congratulated by the Abolitionists of the North, I had no idea of making any personal allusion, or indulging in any personal disrespect to the gentleman. Nor did I know before that the gentleman considered it disrespectful to be congratulated by such men as the gentleman from Ohio. My object was to show who seemed to admire most the sentiments uttered by my colleague.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I have not said that it was.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I referred to these honorable gentlemen congratulating my colleague, because they were the most prominent men on that side of the question. I believe I said, in the first instance, that men of such stamp as GIDDINGS, of Ohio, congratulated him. I did not say he (GIDDINGS) congratulated him, and I repeat the same now. I alluded to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] as next in my mind upon the Abolition side of the question. I referred to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] first. I now accept the correction, but I believed that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] congratulated my colleague [Mr. CULLOM]; it matters not, others of the same stripe did.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The point is, did the gentleman from Tennessee say that?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. My recollection is that I did. It is here in the speech.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not ask anything more than the gentleman's recollection.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. But one thing more. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he considers himself an Abolitionist or not? Did he not say in a speech made by him at the last session of Congress "That if a law were passed respecting the fugitive slave law, General Scott, if elected to the Presidency, would not veto it?"

Mr. CAMPBELL. The gentleman shall not find me either evading any question that he pro-pounds, or going afterwards and inserting in my printed speech any other remarks than those which I actually make use of when thus interrogated.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Nor will the gentleman find any remarks in my speech for which I will not hold myself responsible.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That is another thing; I am not questioning the gentleman's responsibility at all. It was as to a matter of fact that I inquired. Did he utter this sentence on the floor?

First, then, I have never voted the Abolition ticket; and I reply to the gentleman's question that I did say that I believed General Scott was a Whig—that he entertained Whig doctrines in regard to the exercise of the veto power; and that I believed, if he were elected President, and if the Congress of the United States should repeal the fugitive slave law, he would not veto the bill; and I believe so still. If the gentleman desires to know anything further on the subject of my opinions of the fugitive slave law, I can tell him that I not only voted against that law, but I "spit on platforms" which approved its details, and I am opposed to it now. He will see by this confession that there is no evasion of the question on my part.

But, Mr. Speaker, I propounded the question to the gentleman as to whether he made use of the terms which appear in his printed speech? He says his impression is that he did. Now, I would appeal to the honorable gentleman, his colleague, [Mr. CULLOM,] who was watching every remark that he made at that time, as will be seen by his response I did myself, whether he [Mr. CHURCHWELL] did make this remark, and charge in his speech, when he delivered it, that I had congratulated him?

Mr. CULLOM. In relation to the question raised by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] touching the discussion on the Nebraska bill, in which my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] took part when that question was pending, it will be seen, by reference to the speech of my colleague, that he referred to me, making certain accusations against me, and that the main thread of the speech turned upon the positions which I had taken in my speech on this question, and the course of my honorable colleague in the Senate, [Mr. BELL.] In the course of his speech, my honorable colleague said that my speech was received with much éclat by northern Abolitionists, and announced that, on the conclusion of it, I was congratulated by the Abolitionists of the House. I was met, he said, by such Abolitionists as GIDDINGS, of Ohio. I then rose and said to my friend that that was untrue; and that Mr. GIDDINGS never had congratulated me, but was in the State of Ohio when my speech was delivered.

Mr. CHURCHWELL, (interrupting.) When my colleague rose on the occasion he refers to, I said—as the House will recollect, and as my speech will show—"such men as GIDDINGS, of Ohio." I repeat the same now.

Mr. CULLOM. He charged me, as I understand it, with having been congratulated by avowed enemies of our institutions, such as GIDDINGS, of Ohio. I then told him I was not congratulated by him. Then he said that he meant men of that stamp; GERRIT SMITH and others, congratulated me. I told him that he was equally unfortunate in that charge; that Mr. SMITH had never congratulated me upon the speech, from that day to this. Then he said that I was congratulated by men of such stamp; but did not mention the name of my friend, [Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio;] and had he done so, I should have told him that he was also, in that charge, incorrect, because he never congratulated me upon this floor in reference to my speech.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who raises this question of veracity, is very jealous of the reputation of my colleague, and perhaps thinks him not capable of defending himself. He calls upon men directly interested, and makes witnesses of them, to state what was said. Now, I have a colleague here who says he heard me in every remark I made; and he says I did make the remarks in my printed speech.

Mr. CULLOM. The remark of my colleague, when I told him that Mr. GIDDINGS did not congratulate me, was that Mr. GERRIT SMITH did. I told him he was in fault in that. Then he said that gentlemen of like political sentiments did, without specifying any name.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. "Of that stamp" were the words. Such was the fact, and I repeat it now.

Mr. CULLOM. I told my colleague those gentlemen did not congratulate me, and that Mr. SMITH did not.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Did not the Abolitionists congratulate you upon the occasion?

Mr. CULLOM. I am glad my colleague has asked the question. I have seen it charged, in the Union newspaper of this city, that I was congratulated by Mr. GIDDINGS and the Abolitionists, who hung around me like a cloud. I say here, in my place, that if any Abolitionist upon this floor congratulated me upon the occasion I do not know him as such to-day, nor did I then. But men of both political parties, and both sections of the Union, did congratulate me in great numbers, as all saw and know, among whom were extreme southern men, announcing that though they differed with me in opinion upon the question, they congratulated me upon the effort. Among them was the distinguished gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON,] and my worthy friend from Virginia, now no more, [Mr. SNODGRASS,] Governor Aiken, of South Carolina, Mr. REESE, of Georgia, Mr. KERR, of North Carolina, several of my own colleagues; and many other gentlemen, whose names I need not repeat, who differed with me in reference to the bill, would, if necessary, do me the justice to say the same thing.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. They did not congratulate you upon the sentiments of the speech.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course not; but I felt it was the greater compliment. I positively deny that I was congratulated by a single Abolitionist upon the occasion; and the gentleman should learn to be a little more particular in making those sweeping and random charges, intended to affect others, without the semblance of truth or fact to sustain them. Being untrue, these charges all fall to the ground.

Mr. OLDS. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the adjournment of Congress is now under consideration, and that this debate is not applicable to that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asked, and obtained leave, to make a personal explanation. And therefore, what he is saying is in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not intend to have my attention diverted from the issue that is made. I assert that, although I paid the closest attention to the honorable gentleman during the delivery of his speech, I did not hear him make any allusion to me. His colleague [Mr. CULLOM] says he did not hear him. I now ask his other colleague on my right, [Mr. TAYLOR,] whether he heard him say any such thing.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order, I want to know what is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House is the personal explanation of the gentleman from Ohio, for which the House have given unanimous consent.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I object to his proceeding upon the ground that this is not personal explanation.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope the gentleman will not object to my colleague answering the question which the gentleman from Ohio has put.

Mr. SEWARD. I do object. This is not the place to settle matters of this kind. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the question of order, and decides that the gentleman has not the floor to make the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I now ask the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. TAYLOR,] to say whether he heard his colleague use the language to which I have referred.

Mr. HILLYER. I rise to a question of order, and I place it upon a ground which I think will be sustained by the Chair. The gentleman from Ohio has the floor to make a personal explanation, but I hold that consent does not give him the right to interrogate members about the House in relation to a controversy respecting the speech of a brother member. That does not come within the privilege which has been extended to him by the House. I ask that he may be confined to the privilege allowed him by the House to make a personal explanation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the House, by unanimous consent, gave the gentleman from Ohio the privilege of making a personal explanation, and that he must be the judge, to a very great extent, of what that explanation shall be.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. Having been called upon to state what is my recollection as to the point of difference between the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] and my colleague from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] all that it is necessary, I presume, for me to say is, that my recollection of what occurred between my colleagues, [Messrs. CHURCHWELL and CULLOM,] on the occasion referred to, is precisely as stated by my colleague, [Mr. CULLOM.] That is my recollection.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Now, I hope the gentleman from Ohio will ask the same question of my other colleague near me, [Mr. SMITH,] who was close by me when I made the remarks alluded to.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring this matter to a close.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope the gentleman will allow my colleague [Mr. SMITH] to make a statement in justice to me.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Very well, propound the question to him yourself.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. No, sir; I will not ask it, but in justice to myself I ask you, sir, to propound it.

Mr. SEWARD. I now renew my point of order. The House will perceive that this is not a proper personal explanation.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his objection until my colleague has made his statement.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I apprehend that the gentleman from Georgia cannot prevent the statement from being made.

Mr. SEWARD. I insist upon my question of order. The object of this discussion is evidently to arraign the gentleman from Tennessee upon the charge of falsehood. [A laugh.]

Several MEMBERS. "Oh, no!"

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I do not so understand it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly I have no such purpose.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, this is a question in which the gentleman from Tennessee is only concerned. I want to know how the gentleman from Ohio is personally interested in the matter?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House unanimously permitted the gentleman from Ohio to make a personal explanation. The gentleman from Georgia raises the question of order that the gentleman from Ohio is not confining himself to that explanation. The Chair overrules the question of order, and from that decision the gentleman from Georgia takes an appeal. The question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope, in justice to myself, that the gentleman from Ohio may be allowed to proceed.

Mr. SEWARD. At the suggestion of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] I withdraw the appeal.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I am very far from arraigning the gentleman from Tennessee on the charge of falsehood. I wish that understood. What I do undertake to say is, that there are things printed in that speech which, whether said or not, are not true. I do not say that the gentleman from Tennessee has wilfully and deliberately uttered untruth; but he has uttered, if what is printed was uttered, an untrue statement of several things.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Point them out.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Whether they were said or not the allegations are not correct, the first that is untrue, and the gentleman will understand me to use the term in no disrespectful sense, is that his colleague was congratulated by my colleague, Mr. GIDDINGS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks that the gentleman must, in his explanation, confine himself to the portions of the speech referring to himself.

Mr. CAMPBELL. So closely am I associated in all these matters that I cannot explain without referring to them.

The gentleman is next mistaken as to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. GERRIT SMITH;] and thirdly, as to the charge that I congratulated the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CULLOM] upon this floor, I know that it is not correct. The gentleman will so recollect himself. It is untrue, and I know it, and so pronounce it, for the reason which I shall now proceed to give. I purposely and studiously avoided turning my face to the gentleman when he was delivering his speech, and I purposely and studiously avoided going to him, shaking hands and congratulating him, as the distinguished gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Aiken] and others did. I did so for the reason that I believed an effort would be made in some quarter or another to put these personal friends of mine [Messrs. CULLOM, ETHERIDGE, TAYLOR, and BUGG] in a false position at home. Now, I say, in the face of God and the country, that the gentleman is mistaken when he says in this speech that I did go up and congratulate his colleague.

I have but a word more to say. I am actuated in this matter by no unkind feeling towards the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] for I think that a harsh word has never passed between us since the commencement of our intercourse here. I did not rise because I felt that any injury was done me by classing me with the distinguished gentlemen to my right, [Messrs. GIDDINGS and SMITH;] not at all; for I do not know but what they have been more in the right than I have. I have never acted with their party. I arose for the purpose of correcting this matter, for the benefit of the gentleman's colleagues, supposing that, by reason of the forged papers which have been used heretofore to stigmatize me in Tennessee, and the means used to associate these gentlemen with me now, their constituents might be led to indulge in erroneous opinions in relation to their associations and their action here upon great national questions.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I ask but a word in reply.

Mr. HILLYER. I must object. We have already taken up a full hour with this matter, and I object to the gentleman's proceeding.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will allow me to reply to what the gentleman from Ohio has said.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee may be allowed to proceed with his remarks.

Mr. ORR. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Tennessee to go on.

Mr. HILLYER. At the earnest request of the gentleman from Tennessee, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I am indeed thankful for the speech just closed by the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL.] The point which he rose to make was, that I had said that the Abolitionists and Free-Soilers had congratulated my colleague, [Mr. CULLOM]—men of such stamp as Mr. GIDDINGS, of Ohio, Mr. SMITH, of New York, and Mr. CAMPBELL, of Ohio. The direct point which the honorable gentleman makes is,—and he says he means it in no disrespect,—that I used his name in connection with men of such stamp as GIDDINGS and SMITH as congratulating my colleague. I have been informed by several gentlemen, particularly by my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] that I made use of the language contained in the speech, as published by me. If I was then incorrect, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CULLOM] should have corrected me. There was a crowd of northern Free-Soilers around my colleague, [Mr. CULLOM.] I may have been mistaken as to Mr. CAMPBELL being among them—I am not mistaken as to the point of fact, that he was congratulated by Free-Soilers and Abolitionists.

There is one thing about which there is no mistake: that the speech of my colleague contained sentiments which made it popular at the North.

I find Abolition names upon the record, or list of those who subscribed for the honorable gentleman's speech—SUMNER, SEWARD, and others of like stamp.

Mr. SEWARD. Say SEWARD, of New York. [Laughter.]

Mr. CHURCHWELL. With pleasure, sir; all know it is the Abolitionist I allude to.

Mr. CULLOM. A much larger number of my speech was circulated at the South than at the North.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I do know that fifteen thousand of this speech, which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] rises here and attempts to justify, were circulated at the North, and that five thousand were subscribed for by one gentleman, [Mr. MATTESON, of New York,] who is, I believe, a known Abolitionist, and known to be an intimate friend of SEWARD, of New York. The gentleman's own statement makes a worse case for my colleague than anything said by me. What does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] say to-day? He assigns as the reason why he did not congratulate my colleague, that he was afraid that it would do him an injury.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will not misstate what I said. I was then alluding to the assertion which the gentleman made, that I did congratulate his colleague, [Mr. CULLOM.] I said I did not congratulate him, and I gave as a reason for it that I had understood from other sources that I was charged with having made an effort to sway the opinions of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CULLOM.] I purposely and studiously, therefore, avoided congratulating him, because I did not desire to have any suspicion of that kind entertained by gentlemen.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that he studiously avoided congratulating my colleague for fear that he might do him an injury with the people of Tennessee. And why, why, I would ask, was he under that apprehension?

Mr. CAMPBELL. I will answer the gentleman why it was. It was for the reason which I have given—that I knew tens of thousands of forged documents, purporting to have been written by me, and over my signature, had been scattered over the State of Tennessee, charging Abolition sentiments, and so forth, on me. That is the reason why I feared to injure him with the people of Tennessee.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. It is the first time, since the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] has been a member of this House, that I have ever heard of the fact that he has attempted to defend any gentleman who it might be thought would be injured by an association with him. The honorable gentleman need not get up and tell the people—because they all believe it—that he entertains Abolition notions. They know that he is an enemy to the fugitive slave bill. What better evidence do they want of his being an Abolitionist? Why, he answers that by saying that all the Whigs of the North are equally Abolitionists. This makes his case still worse, and is, indeed, poor palliation!

But I shall detain the House only a few moments longer. I have been astonished at the extraordinary position assumed by these gentlemen this morning. It was a deep-laid scheme that was laid to entrap me, in which the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] set the triggers, which my colleague from Tennessee was to pull. Beautiful association that, [Mr. CULLOM and Mr. CAMPBELL.] It will make my colleague popular in Tennessee!

Mr. CAMPBELL. I expressly stated that I did not mean to charge that the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] had made his misstatements willfully, or for the purpose of misrepresenting me. What I stated emphatically was, that the remark of the gentleman was not true, was not correct; that the gentleman was mistaken in saying that I had congratulated his colleague; and I have proven that he was mistaken.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I accept the gentleman's explanation. He has a right to correct me; and I accept his correction. But I hold to what I did say, that my colleague was congratulated by Abolitionists. He [Mr. CULLOM] does not deny that, but he says that gentlemen alike from North and South, congratulated him; and he mentions the names of some two or three southern men who did so. But, sir, I am well satisfied that those gentlemen congratulated the ability, and not the sentiment of his speech.

Mr. CULLOM. Of course.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Of course—the gentleman says.

Mr. CULLOM. Let my colleague state the Abolitionist on this floor who congratulated me on that head.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I said that Free-Soilers and Abolitionists congratulated him.

Mr. CULLOM. I say that not one Abolitionist or Free-Soiler congratulated me, as far as I know.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. So far as the gentleman knows of.

Mr. CULLOM. I deny that they did, and I require proof of the fact.

Mr. SAGE. Give the names.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I would name you first.

Mr. SAGE. As the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] has made allusion to me as one of those who congratulated the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CULLOM,] and as being a Free-Soiler, I want to state that the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I did not say that you did. I stated that the gentleman from New York approved of the sentiments of that speech.

Mr. SAGE. I will state to the gentleman my position. I have ever been a Whig of the Henry Clay school, and one of the few who supported him in the Philadelphia convention, until General Taylor was nominated, and that, too, when a portion of the Kentucky delegation voted against him.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I wish to ask my colleague if Messrs. MATTESON and MORGAN did not congratulate him?

Mr. CULLOM. I presume they did. I cannot speak with certainty; but I presume they did. I do not know the fact whether they did or not.

Mr. MATTESON. Did the gentleman ask whether I congratulated him?

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I did.

Mr. MATTESON. I was at Utica, New York, at the time the speech was made; but had I been here I should have done so.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Then nobody congratulated the gentleman. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman allow me to answer?

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of order. It is this: whether, when any question arises in the House, it is in order for any one member to poll the members of the House?

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not yet commenced.

Mr. MORGAN. I will now answer the gentleman's question. I am called upon to state whether I did not congratulate the gentleman's colleague [Mr. CULLOM] at the close of his speech? I thank God I had the opportunity of congratulating a good and honest man from the South.

Let me say to the gentleman, that I never belonged to a Free-Soil or Abolition organization, but always to the old-fashioned Whig, Henry Clay school, until he [Henry Clay] abandoned us on the fugitive slave law. [Laughter.]

[A message was here received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

S. R. No. 390. An act to authorize the coinage of gold pieces of the value respectively of ten eagles and five eagles, and for other purposes; and

S. R. No. 398. An act for the relief of the heirs of Captain Joshua Chamberlain, deceased, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles:

House bill No. 178. An act for the relief of Benjamin Rowe; and House bill No. 266. An act for the relief of Captain E. A. F. Lavalette, of the United States Navy, severally without amendment.]

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I have at last ascertained that he was congratulated by at least one Abolitionist, [Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I did congratulate the gentleman, and I shall ever congratulate such noble sentiments, by whomsoever uttered.

Mr. EWING. I should like the gentleman from Illinois to state whether he, too, is of the Henry Clay school? [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHBURN. I am. I will state that I was a member of the convention at Baltimore, and helped to nominate Henry Clay, in 1844.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. One word, and I will close. The points, and, as I understand it, the only points which have been made by the gentleman from Ohio upon me, is simply whether I used the expression to which he has referred in my printed speech, in my remarks in the House, and whether he did congratulate my colleague upon his speech. The gentlemen have presented their evidence. Now, sir, I come in with rebutting testimony. I will present affirmative evidence. I ask my colleague, [Mr. SMITH]—and I might bring other witnesses to back him, if necessary—to state to the House whether he did not hear me use the language contained in my printed speech to which the gentleman from Ohio has referred?

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. It will be recollected that I occupied a seat near my colleague during the delivery of his speech. At the portion of his speech now in controversy, I was handing my colleague an extract which he had desired me to turn to for him, and as I handed it to him, he turned to me, and while finishing a remark, I distinctly heard him use the name of Mr. CAMPBELL. I do not think he said it loud enough to be heard by the House generally, but I heard him distinctly.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Now, I think that matter is settled; and now I want the gentleman distinctly to understand that I accept his correction, but that he has not entrapped me, as was premeditated, and as he desired. I have done.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I now rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say a word. I will not occupy the time of the House but a moment.

Mr. STANTON. It seems to me that enough has been said upon this matter; but as the gentleman desires to make an explanation in reference to himself, I will yield to him, hoping that he will make his remarks as brief as possible.

Mr. HILLYER. I must object to any further personal explanation. I gave notice some time since that I would.

HON. MIKE WALSH—CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. On Saturday last there was presented to this House a petition signed by George W. Isaacs, of the city of New York, and others, protesting against the right of the Hon. MIKE WALSH to hold a seat upon this floor. As that memorial is short, I send it to the Clerk, and ask that it may be read.

The memorial was read by the Clerk, as follows:

To the Honorable the House of Representatives:

The petition of George W. Isaacs and others, whose names are hereunto appended, of the city of New York, respectfully sheweth:

That early in the present session, a petition was presented to the House, alleging, and offering to sustain by evidence, the fact that Mike Walsh, now holding a seat in the House, from the fourth congressional district of the State of New York, was incapacitated to retain the same, by reason of his being an alien. The petition was reported back by the Committee of Elections, because no proofs accompanied it. A further petition was subsequently presented, with two affidavits annexed, of respectable witnesses, taken before a United States Commissioner, establishing the fact of Mr. Walsh's ineligibility, with an offer to produce additional testimony in support thereof, in such manner as the House or its Committee of Elections might order and direct. Repeated efforts have been made by personal correspondence with some members of the committee, to obtain a hearing of the matter; but thus far it has been without success. We now desire to bring this question directly to the attention of the House, and to ask, as we respectfully do, that some order shall be promptly made, by means of which your petitioners shall be enabled to lay before you their proofs, which we are ready to adduce whenever an opportunity shall be afforded to us; and in such manner as shall be directed by you.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

G. W. ISAACS,

JOHN GRIFFIN, 192 Hester street.

WILLARD PHELPS, No. 16, First avenue.

PATRICK HURLEY, No. 823 Chatham street.

WILLIAM P. POWERS, 76 Prince street.

JOHN KETCHUM, 271 Elizabeth street.

New York, May 30, 1854.

Mr. STANTON. The memorial just read was sent to the Speaker of this House, accompanied by the letter which I hold in my hand, with the request that it be read to this body. The letter to the Speaker goes on to say that the first memorial to the House was sent at the commencement of the session, to Mr. EWING, one of the Committee of Elections, who "has played the traitor and coward in stifling its contents from the country."

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, in the chair.) The gentleman had better have the letter read from the desk.

Mr. STANTON. I do not intend to have the whole of the letter read. I only wish to refer to those parts which cast censure very unjustly, I think, upon members of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. PENNINGTON. I claim that the whole paper ought to be read.

Mr. STANTON. Very well; if that be the wish of the House, it must be so; though I prefer it should not be done.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the letter as far as Mr. STANTON had stated its contents.

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) I object to the reading of a document which reflects in the manner this does on a member of this House.

Mr. EWING. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection, and let the letter be read. It would be doing me great injustice to stop its reading now.

[Cries of "Read it!"]

The SPEAKER. The paper will be read. Connected with the right of a member to a seat in this body, and introduced on a privileged question, it must, in the opinion of the Chair, be read, if desired.

Mr. ORR. I do not assent to the correctness of the proposition that everything submitted here as a question of privilege must, of necessity, be read. The gentleman from Kentucky asks me to withdraw my objection. In justice to him I do so; but I think that the paper ought not to have been presented when it reflected in the manner it does on a member of this House.

Mr. STANTON. I have no desire that the paper should be read. I intended simply to read a few lines of it, in order to show to the House that the Committee of Elections have been very much censured in consequence of their not having, as these persons suppose, taken proper action on their petition. These letters are addressed, one to the Speaker, and the other to the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH,] and reflect on the committee and the honorable member whose claim to a seat here is contested, in very gross and vulgar language. My object in obtaining the floor this morning, was simply to present this matter to the House, and to ask it to take some action on the subject, which I shall indicate in proper time. I hope that the further reading of the papers will be dispensed with, and that I may be allowed to go on with my statement.

[Cries of "Read!"]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman move to dispense with the further reading of the papers?

Mr. STANTON. I merely suggested that their further reading be dispensed with, on account of the nature of their contents; and as that seems to be the desire of some gentlemen, I submit the motion now to dispense with the further reading, if that be necessary to get rid of the reading.

Mr. EWING. I would ask it now as a favor from the House that the letter be read. I think, in justice to me, that its further reading should not be dispensed with.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Enough has been read to make the reading of the remainder necessary.

Mr. HUNT. I think that the entire letter ought now to be read. It brings a charge of dishonor against a member of this House. The whole letter, when read, will show the temper in which it has been communicated to the body. As an act of justice to the gentleman from Kentucky, it ought to be read.

Mr. STANTON. Permit me to say, that the remarks inclosed in brackets are only those which relate to the committee. The balance of the letter refers to the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. WALSH,] and treats him quite as badly, if not worse, than the committee.

Mr. PRESTON. I hope the letters will be read.

The question was then taken whether the letters should be read, and it was decided in the affirmative.

The letters were then read through by the Clerk.

Mr. STANTON. It will be seen that the author of these letters refers to former memorials which have been sent to this House, one of which was sent to my honorable colleague, [Mr. EWING,] and by him regularly presented to the House, and referred to the Committee of Elections. The committee met, and took up the question; but found that there was no proof submitted by these memorialists which would justify their taking any action on the subject; and, after waiting a reasonable time, they reported the memorial back to the House, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Subsequently another memorial—the one which I hold in my hand—was presented to this House. I believe by myself, at the request of one of the parties. It contains two affidavits, which purport to be the proof on which this whole charge against the honorable gentleman from New York rests. One of these affidavits states that on a certain occasion the affiant met the Hon. Mr. WALSH either in Albany or in New York, and that in a conversation with him, the Hon. Mr. WALSH said he would not acknowledge himself to be an Irishman born, because at some future day he might be called upon to become President of the United States, [laughter;] and the Constitution, said he, would forbid him to occupy that position.

The next affidavit is that of a person who calls herself Charlotte Malony. She says she was once on a visit to Ireland, or happened to be in Ireland, when she met the mother of the Hon. Mr. WALSH, and her son Mike, who was then a child of six or eight years of age; and that when there the mother told her that Mike was born in Ireland. That subsequently she had met the mother and child here in New York, and recognized Mike as the same one she had seen in Ireland. That is the whole of the testimony presented by this memorial, and which has come before the committee. Some time after the memorial was referred to the committee, I received the following letter from the gentleman who signed it:

NEW YORK, May 9, 1854.

SIR: Can I ask the favor to be informed if any proceedings are likely to be soon taken by the Committee of Elections, in reference to the petition of myself and others in your possession, or in that of the committee?

I dislike to be troublesome; but your prompt and courteous reply to my former note warrants me in again calling your attention to the subject. Those who have united with me in this matter have been daily expecting to receive some notification from your committee, and are constantly importuning me with inquiries.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

G. W. ISAACS,
No. 141 east 27th street.

HON. RICHARD H. STANTON.

When I received that letter, (which is from one of the persons whose names are attached to the memorial presented on Saturday,) I called the Committee of Elections together. I laid the matter before them; and, under their instructions, I replied to the letter, assuring the gentleman who wrote it that the Committee of Elections would take up the matter whenever the papers and proof substantiating the case were laid before them; that the testimony then before them was not sufficient to justify any action on their part; that it scarcely made out a prima facie case; and that the committee could go no further, unless they were put in possession of more and stronger testimony. I said to him, also, that if he and his friends desired to produce more testimony on the point before this committee, it was for them to have it taken in the city of New York, and sent here to some member of the New York delegation, so that it might be presented to the House, and regularly referred to our committee; and that when they made out a case in this way, the committee would be prepared to act upon it, and to act promptly. At least such is my recollection of the contents of my reply, as I kept no copy of the letter.

I am satisfied, from the correspondence which I have had with this gentleman, and from the letters which have been presented here to-day, that this whole crusade against the honorable gentleman from New York, grows out of some personal ill-will entertained towards him by, at least, some of the persons who have signed the memorials.

I am satisfied that the matter ought not to engage the attention of this House further; and for this reason I intend to move, before I close my remarks, that the Committee of Elections be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

I omitted to say that in my letter to Mr. Isaacs, I stated to them, as well as I now remember, that the Committee of Elections had no power to send to New York to have testimony taken, or to go there for that purpose. They seemed to think from their letter to me previously to the one that I have just read, that the committee would come to New York and sit there and take testimony, or else send a commission for that purpose. I informed these gentlemen that, under the rules of the House, the committee had no such power; and now, if the House think that the matter ought to be further considered, let them, instead of voting affirmatively on my proposition that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, reject that proposition, and give the committee the power to send for persons and papers, or to send a commission to New York; and I am sure there is not a single member of the committee who will not discharge his duties in the premises promptly. These persons have no right to complain of the course of the committee, as every disposition has been shown to hear and consider whatever testimony might be furnished them; and the committee had no power to take or consider any testimony which did not come to them through the House by regular reference. The fact that they did not send further testimony, and pursue the course which I indicated, is not explained by their last memorial, in which they censure the committee. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I will suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] that in my opinion the proper course to be taken in this matter is to suspend the rules, so as to enable us to reconsider this vote by which these papers were referred to the Committee of Elections. They were so referred; but they never ought to have been; and I am sure it was a matter of inadvertence on the part of the Speaker, that they were so referred; because the reference of them was in direct violation of one of our standing rules. They are not respectful to this body, or to its members.

Mr. STANTON. The letters which I read were not referred to the committee.

Mr. EWING. I wish to ask the gentleman from Virginia to withhold his proposition in reference to this matter until I can make a very few remarks.

Mr. BAYLY. I shall finish my remarks in a moment, and then the gentleman will have an opportunity to submit what he has to say.

I suggest to the House that the appropriate mode of getting rid of this whole matter is to reconsider what has been done. My own opinion is, that the proper course is not to receive these papers at all. They are disrespectful to the House, and I am sure, as I said before, it was an inadvertence on the part of the Speaker that the papers were ever referred to the committee.

A MEMBER. They have not been referred.

Mr. EWING. I did not suppose that I should be called upon to make any personal explanations this morning. I was overtaken by this necessity in unconscious innocence. The House seems to have been abundantly satisfied, and even to be satiated with them. But I may, perhaps, as well begin my explanation in the usual form used this morning; and will state, therefore, that I have been a Clay Whig all my life; but I have never been congratulated by an Abolitionist, [laughter;] and that Henry Clay never did abandon me, as he was unkind enough to do with the gentleman from New York, [Mr. MORGAN;] but adhered to me in all the vicissitudes of my changeable life.

In reference to this very grave matter, which has been brought before this House—with all due respect to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] and with a conviction that his motives were perfectly correct—I must say, I think he erred in bringing it before the House at all; and I think he further erred, if he will allow me to say so, in laying it before the House, without giving me some notice that he was going to do so, and without exhibiting to me those documents so interesting to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. STANTON. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky, that I did not do it solely upon my own suggestion. It was first suggested in a conversation with the Speaker of this House, and I afterwards consulted some members of the Committee of Elections, and from the result of such consultation I determined to do it.

Mr. EWING. I do not intend to find fault with the course which has been pursued; but I will only say, that it is my opinion, as I have a right to say, interested as I am in it, being a grave political controversy, which may perhaps result in my political death, [laughter,] I will say I think he erred.

Well, they say I have smuggled this matter out of the way. I may, perhaps, be allowed to say, that I did not think it proper to have it brought before the House. It may be proper to state in a few words the reasons which have influenced my course upon this matter; and I do not suppose that any gentleman upon this floor will think that I have not acted upon good reasons.

An ex-member of the last Congress, an eminent and worthy gentleman, asked me if I would present a petition or memorial of the character referred to, from the city of New York, if signed by respectable gentlemen in that city. I told him I would not hesitate to do so, as the gentlemen who should sign it were constituents of the member whose seat was sought to be contested, and must seek some other organ of communication to the House. Upon that assurance the memorial was sent, and it was referred to the Committee of Elections. I did not read it before it was so referred. The memorial was shown to the gentleman from New York most interested in it, and he told me the character of each and every signer of that paper; and he painted their character in by no means favorable colors.

Subsequently, in confirmation of his representations, we received a most delectable document, somewhat similar in its character to those which have entertained the House at my expense. I hold in my hand a letter from the same gentleman—for it seems to be in the same hand writing, and written by one—but signed "more than one Irishman." It is an anonymous letter. Here is the letter, (holding it up before the House.) The characters seem to swell and grow larger, as the writer swelled in indignation; and by the time that he reached the close of the page, he makes such characters as I have no doubt the Speaker can see from his chair. He says, in such swelling characters, "If he has papers, let him show them."—in characters large enough to make a sign for a wholesale commission store. [Laughter.]

I, of course, could make no reply to that, and I showed it to my friends. From these, in connection with other facts, taking in view the fact that it was couched in unusual terms, and asked that a committee be sent to New York, and that it was unaccompanied by any proof, we waited some little time; the committee met; I was not present; but they determined to ask the House to discharge them from the further consideration of the memorial. The chairman came to me and requested that I should make the report of the committee. I did so, having originally presented the memorial, concurring, as I did, in the conclusion of the committee.

I afterwards received another document, even more interesting than either of the others, abusing me and the committee in the most delectable orthography, taking great liberties with our good names and characters, and still greater with the Queen's English. It seems to me that if anything is to be done in this matter, the first step ought to be taken by her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain. I have been waiting for her to first avenge the outrage which has been committed upon her Majesty's language. When that insult has been settled or avenged, when their differences have been amicably adjusted, I may then feel myself called upon to hunt up Mr. John Griffin, and hold him responsible for charging me with lying. [Laughter.] He ought not to have done it. It is simply a question of veracity between him and myself. He says I lied in my throat; I say I did not. [Laughter.] I hope the matter will be amicably adjusted. [Renewed laughter.] But he takes greater liberty, even, with my friend from New York than with myself. He calls him a rask-i-l, [great laughter,] and of the superfine stamp.

A MEMBER. Read it.

Mr. EWING. No, I will not read the letter. His language is, that "Mike is a superfine raskil." He signs himself, "A Hard Shell Democrat." Now, sir, I confess, to the charge the gentleman—as my colleague upon the Committee of Elections [Mr. STANTON] is pleased to call him—a gentleman, I suppose, by way of a joke, [laughter]—I confess to the truth of the charge that I did wish to "smuggle" the matter from the House; or, rather, to be more accurate in the expression, I did not think it worthy to occupy the attention of even one member of the House. The whole affair seems to be founded in malice, from the fact that, in the first communication it is said that they would not have published this—that is, that Mike was an Irishman—but for the fact that, in a private correspondence, Mike had given them an insult. He says he would "sometimes say, 'Never mind; it takes us (meaning us Irish) to come the shy over the Yan-k-e-y-Softs.'" [Laughter.]

It seems from this letter that if there were any fraud, these people were confederates in the fraud; and now they want to turn State's evidence, and revenge themselves upon the honorable member from New York on account of some fancied or real insult. [Cries of "That's clear! That's clear."] Of course, I had no other interest in the matter except that I should very much regret to lose so useful and industrious a member from this House. He is, I believe, now present, as he almost always is, as well as my friend from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR,] and myself. [Laughter.] I say the services of so industrious a member could not well be dispensed with; and I could, therefore, of course, have no feeling in common with those gentlemen who wish to pursue this prosecution. I have no other explanation to make further, save that I wish it borne in mind that I am a Whig of the Henry Clay school, and that he did not forsake me when the slavery question came up, as he did the gentleman from New York. With these remarks, sir, I will not trouble the House further with an affair so unimportant. I do not doubt that you will concur with me in the propriety of pursuing the course I did.

Mr. ORR. I agree with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] that this matter should never have been brought before the House. But, upon subsequent inquiry, I learn that these letters were never sent to the Committee of Elections at all. I regret exceedingly that I did not adhere to my original purpose, and insist that these papers should not be read. But I think the House ought now to dispose summarily of the matter. A motion has been made to discharge the Committee of Elections from the further consideration of the memorial. In order to close debate, I will move to lay the memorial upon the table. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia would accomplish the purpose, but we would have to go a round-about way to accomplish it. It would require a suspension of the rules; and there is a motion to suspend the rules already pending; and as the memorial was presented and referred under the rule, there may be some doubt as to whether we have the right to reconsider the reference. I think, with the gentleman from Virginia, that it should never have been received; but the best way we can dispose of it now is to discharge the committee from its further consideration, and lay it upon the table.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. My friend from South Carolina will allow me to say a word. The remarks which I made were predicated on the supposition that these letters had been referred with the memorial. Otherwise I could not conceive why they were brought here. My remarks, I distinctly say, were predicated on the supposition that those matters had been referred. If they had not been referred, then I adhere to my former remark that they were introduced through inadvertency, but very improperly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the letters were not referred, either in the House or under the rule, and that the memorial was the only paper referred.

Mr. BAYLY. I have no further suggestion to make.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope that there will be unanimous consent to exclude these letters from the Congressional Globe. They have come improperly before the House, and I do not think that they should be allowed a place there.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Kentucky uses them as part of his speech; and he has the power to suppress them, if he chooses.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. The House will recollect that I did not desire the reading of more than a single paragraph of the letters—no more than four or five lines—and that portion going to censure the Committee of Elections. I shall not publish the letters, as a matter of course, in my printed remarks.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then no motion is necessary.

The question was taken; and the committee was discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

Mr. ORR. I move to lay the memorial upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

TIME OF MEETING OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on a motion made by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILLYER,] that the rules be suspended in order that he may introduce a bill to change the time for the meeting of Congress.

Mr. HILLYER. The bill is short, and I would ask its reading.

The bill was read. It provides that hereafter the day appointed by law for the meeting of Congress shall be the first Monday in November of each year, instead of the first Monday in December.

Mr. HILLYER. I demand tellers on the motion for suspension of the rules.

Mr. BRIDGES called for the yeas and nays, but subsequently withdrew the call.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I renew the demand for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 115, nays 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Banks, Belcher, Bell, Benson, Benton, Bliss, Boeck, Boyce, Brooks, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chrisman, Clingman, Colquitt, Corwin, Crocker, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, De Witt, Dick, Disney, Edmunds, Everhart, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagg, Fuller, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Haven, Hendricks, Henn, Hillyer, Howe, Hughes, Ingersoll, Johnson, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, Lindsey, McCulloch, Matteson, May, Middleworth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Millson, Morgan, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Reese, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Seward, Shannon, Shower, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Straub, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Kurtz, Leitcher, Lilly, McMullin, Murray, Noble, Andrew Oliver, Packer, Peck, Peckham, Phelps, Powell, Ready, Robbins, Ruffin, Sapp, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Hester L. Stevens, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Vail, Wheeler, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright—58.

So, two thirds not voting in the affirmative, the rules were not suspended.

MODIFICATION OF THE TARIFF.

Mr. HAVEN. I want the ear of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, while I have that of the Speaker. I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to enable the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill reducing the revenue and adjusting the tariff.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I object.

Mr. HAVEN. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose indicated.

Mr. ROBBINS. As a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, I desire to submit a minority report. If one report be submitted, so ought the other. Will the gentleman include in his motion the minority as well as the majority report?

The SPEAKER. The minority report would come in more regularly after the majority report had been submitted.

Mr. HOUSTON. I presume the gentleman from New York will not object to the suggestion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAVEN. I accept the modification.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RITCHIE] will withdraw his objection. The bills are merely asked to be received for reference, and that they may be printed.

Mr. PENNINGTON. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers and yeas and nays were both refused.

The question was then put, and (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the following bill; which was then read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill reducing the rates of duty on imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. ROBBINS. I wish to state that I have accompanied the substitute drawn up by a minority of the committee with a report, which I desire to have printed with the bill.

The bill and substitute were then referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and, together with the report presented by the minority of the committee, ordered to be printed.

TIME OF MEETING OF CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that there was a mistake upon the former vote upon the motion made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HILLYER] to suspend the rules. The vote being 115 to 57; and that being two thirds, the rules are suspended.

The bill was then read a first and second time by its title, as follows:

A bill to change the day for the annual assembling of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now will be upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. HILLYER. I do not intend to make a speech to the House in support of the bill I have introduced; and I only desire to say just one word in reply to the remarks made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] the other day, in relation to the proposition that Congress should meet prior to the first Monday of December. The position taken on that occasion by that gentleman was, that Congress, upon assembling on the first Monday of December, would do nothing until after Christmas; and if Congress assembled at an earlier day than the first Monday of December, that still no business would be done until after the Christmas holidays were passed. I merely wish to say, by way of reply to the position taken by that gentleman, that the very object I had in view in introducing this bill was to avoid the force of the gentleman's objection. I know it has been the general practice of Congress to do but little business before Christmas, for the obvious reason that the first week of the session, and even more than that, is consumed by the members in drawing their seats, in the organization of the House, the appointment of committees, in providing themselves with rooms, and in making arrangements to remain here during the winter.

After these necessary preliminary arrangements are completed, we are come to the middle of December, and are approaching the Christmas holidays; and generally but little business has been transacted before the expiration of that time. My object, then, is, that the House should meet earlier, at least about the first Monday in November, thereby adding another month to the short session, so that members could make the necessary arrangements, &c., and then proceed to the business of the session in good earnest—thus giving us time to act upon the vast amount of the business of the long session that may remain undisposed of. And also to act more judiciously and properly upon the questions appropriately arising for our consideration during the short session. It is within the experience of every man that has any experience on this subject, that three months is too short a time to be allotted to the short session of Congress. It ought to be extended at least one month.

I shall not pursue the discussion of the subject any further, but yield the floor for the purpose of enabling the gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] to make a motion to amend.

Mr. PECKHAM. I move to amend the bill by striking out "the first Monday in November," and insert in lieu thereof "the first Monday in October;" and upon that I move the previous question.

Mr. HAMILTON. Will the gentleman from New York withdraw his call for the previous question, and allow me to say one word?

Mr. PECKHAM. Certainly; I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would state to the House, that unless they fix the day of meeting on the second Monday in November, the State of Maryland cannot be represented in this House at the commencement of the next Congress. By the constitution of Maryland, the day of the general election for that State is fixed on the first Wednesday in November. We must therefore either have a special election for members of Congress, or we must at times be unrepresented in the organization of this House, or we must elect a year in advance; all and either of which will be wrong and injurious in operating upon us.

I think it wrong, and I think that the people of Maryland will consider it wrong to resort to the latter alternative, believing that Representatives should be elected as soon before the convening of Congress as they well can; because then will they more likely reflect the sentiments of their constituents, and then they are more immediately responsible to public sentiment.

Mr. GOODE. What is the time of the assembling of Congress provided for in the original bill? And what would be the effect of the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill as it now stands, as introduced by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILLYER,] provides that the future meetings of Congress shall take place on the first Monday in November. The gentleman from New York proposes to strike out the words "first Monday in November," and insert in lieu thereof the words "the first Monday in October." If the previous question be demanded and sustained, it will bring the House first to vote on the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and then on the engrossment of the bill, and ordering it to a third reading.

Mr. GOODE. I desire to say that the original bill proposes to lengthen each session of Congress one month, so as to add sixty days to the legislation of the country, and sixty days additional expense to the country. It proposes thirty days addition to each session, which will be sixty days for the two years.

The amendment proposes to double this additional time, by adding sixty days to each session. Let the country understand that fact. The object is, or, at least, the result will be, to prolong the sessions of Congress. The tendency is—and the fact has been declared frequently by distinguished statesmen—to make our sessions of Congress perpetual. Sir, the evil of this age is excess of legislation, and we are providing, by this bill, to add to that evil. These remarks are designed simply to justify my vote in opposition to this bill, and I desired to have my grounds of opposition recorded.

Mr. BARKSDALE. By the provision of the constitution of the State of Mississippi, our State elections are required to be held on the first Monday and day following in November. The act of the Legislature passed in 1833, providing for the election of members of Congress, conforms to this provision in our constitution; and since that period our State and congressional elections have been held at the same time—on the first Monday and day following in November. The Legislature of the State convened on the first Monday in January last, and adjourned in March; and will not meet again until January, 1856.

The constitution also contains the following provision:

"Whenever two thirds of each branch of the Legislature shall deem any change, alteration, or amendment necessary to this constitution, such proposed change, alteration, or amendment shall be read and passed by a majority of two thirds of each House, respectively, on each day for three successive days; public notice thereof shall then be given by the Secretary of State at least six months preceding the next general election, at which the qualified electors shall vote directly for or against such change, alteration, or amendment; and if it shall appear that a majority of the qualified electors voting for members of the Legislature shall have voted for the proposed change, alteration, or amendment, then it shall be inserted, by the next succeeding Legislature, as a part of this constitution, and not otherwise."

The House will see at once that the period for holding our State election is fixed by the constitution, and cannot be altered unless in the manner prescribed by it, according to the above clause. The bill under consideration provides that Congress shall meet on the first Monday of November, the very day of our election. The Legislature may alter the time of electing our members of Congress without any change of our State constitution; but the Legislature will not meet again until January, 1856, two months after the meeting of Congress, according to the time specified in the bill.

The Governor would be compelled then to call an extrasession of the Legislature, at considerable expense to the State, to provide for the election of members of Congress, or the State of Mississippi would be disfranchised by this bill for an entire month, because it would require at least that length of time for the members to reach the capital after the election. It would also require us to separate our State and congressional elections, until our constitution could be altered so as to unite them again.

The act of our Legislature, prescribing the time for electing members of Congress, was passed in conformity to the Constitution of the United States, fixing the time of the meeting of Congress on the first Monday of December; and I contend, sir, it would be palpably unjust and oppressive now to change it, without giving all the States due notice of your intention to do so. Sir, I do not believe that this law should be imposed on any State in this Union, when its effect will be to disfranchise that State from any portion of the session of Congress. During the period when the Representatives from Mississippi could not be here, questions deeply affecting her rights and interests may be before this body, and she would have no voice in their decision. I am opposed to the passage of this bill. It was introduced to-day, and is being hurried through the House, without any time whatever for reflection or deliberation upon it.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I do not rise either to advocate or oppose the passage of this bill, but I do mean to say a word or two in reply to the argument of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. HAMILTON,] and others, in respect to the effect of the State constitutions upon the mode and time of electing members of Congress.

Mr. HAMILTON. I ask the gentleman from Virginia to allow me to explain in reference to the provisions of the constitution in the State of Maryland. It says nothing about the election of members of Congress. That is left for the Legislature to provide for. But a law has been passed specifying the time of the election; and unless this bill is altered, there will have to be a special election called before the commencement of the next Congress.

Mr. BAYLY. What I was proceeding to say was, that so far as the State constitutions which contain provisions in reference to the mode and time of holding elections for members of Congress are concerned, paradoxical as the remark may appear, these constitutions are unconstitutional; for the Constitution of the United States, which is the supreme law of the land, any constitution or law of any State to the contrary notwithstanding, provides that "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof;" and not by their constitutional conventions, or by any provisions of fundamental law. It goes on to say: "But the Congress may, at any time by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Only the first part is applicable. The whole authority in fixing the time and place of the election for members of Congress is committed by the Constitution of the United States to the Legislatures of the States, and not to their conventions.

Well, as to the present Congress, its members are already elected; and the Legislatures of the States have nothing to do with the time for the meeting of Congress, nothing whatever. Their next election will take place at a period subsequent to the expiration of this Congress; and the Legislatures in the mean time will have ample opportunity to change their laws; not their constitutions, because their constitutions on this point, as I have already said, are unconstitutional.

Mr. HAMILTON. With the gentleman's permission, I will make one remark. The constitution of Maryland fixes the first Wednesday in November as the time of our general State election. The same time is fixed by the Legislature for the election of members of Congress; and thus the gentleman will perceive that we must have a special election, or want Representatives here for a short time.

Mr. BAYLY. I commenced what I had to say by stating that I did not rise to support this bill. The case which the gentleman from Maryland states is one of the strongest I have heard. I do think, and have always thought, that the elections for members of Congress ought to be separated from all the State elections, whether they be for Governor, sheriff, constable, or anything else; because it breaks up all chance of combinations of parties. They ought to be elected by themselves. I have always thought that that would be the best mode of legislation.

What the gentleman has stated would be good argument, so far as his State was concerned, for changing the law; but I am not arguing in favor of this law. If that thing could be done which General Jackson thought could not be done, and in respect to which I believe that he was right, though I am sorry such is the law; if by law we could limit in advance the first session of Congress and prolong the second, so as to equalize the two sessions, I think that it would be one of the wisest things that we could do. But I agree with General Jackson, that you have not the power by law in advance to limit the first session of Congress. And the question before the American Congress is, whether we cannot approach equalization of the sessions of Congress under the pressure of hot weather in summer, with the prospect of a five-months session ahead?

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I am opposed to the bill introduced by the gentleman from Georgia, because its provisions conflict with the time fixed for the elections in my State. Our elections come off the first Monday of November. That time was fixed because experience in that State has shown that elections cannot be held there before that time, so as to secure a full expression of the public sentiment. Formerly we had our elections in Louisiana during the dog-days, and the consequence was that, owing to the sickness which prevails in that State, and upon our streams in the southwest, a very large proportion of gentlemen who were away could not get back to attend the elections. It is well known, I presume, to a very large number of gentlemen here, that the yellow fever prevailed there last year very early in the spring, and quite late in the fall—so late that it is known to some of my friends here that I was detained at home twenty days after the session commenced, because of the sickness of my wife, who was prostrated by the yellow fever. The elections in Louisiana have been fixed in November, as the earliest period in the season at which citizens would return to their homes to deposit their votes. I say it would be doing injustice to the State of Louisiana to fix the time for the commencement of the sessions of Congress at an earlier day, and thus force her to hold her elections for members of Congress twelve months in advance. I believe that no elections for members of Congress take place in December in any part of the United States. In nearly all the months preceding December, elections for members of Congress take place in some of the States of the Union. I appeal to gentlemen to give us a chance in Louisiana, in Mississippi, in Maryland, and elsewhere where elections are held in November, so that we may go home, and defend ourselves, if necessary, and not compel elections to be held twelve months before the term of service commences.

Mr. McMULLIN. My colleague [Mr. BAYLY] has satisfied this House that it is perfectly competent for every State in the Union to fix the time of its elections by law. I would remind the House, and my worthy friend from Mississippi, [Mr. BARKSDALE,] of the fact, that they can, in that State, elect their members of Congress as they do in Pennsylvania, New York, and Ohio, so that the argument of my friend must fall to the ground.

But, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact stated by my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. JONES.] He has told the House that they could not hold their elections in that State, unless in the fall of the year, because of the sickness; and that was his objection to the earlier meeting of Congress. Let me tell that gentleman that his State can change the time of their elections. They can hold them in the month of April, or May, as we do in Virginia, to avoid the sickly season of the year.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to notice very briefly, and to answer the argument of my friend from Virginia, on my left, [Mr. GOODE.] We have been told by that gentleman, that we have too much legislation. I ask my honorable colleague, if the work of thirty-one States can be done as easily as that of thirteen? This Government consists of thirty-one States, while originally—and when the terms of holding sessions of Congress were fixed—it consisted of but thirteen; and, of course, a greater amount of legislation is required. Now, what are the facts as to the business before this Congress? There have been before this House a number of bills, both of a public and private character, which have been here for years, and have not been disposed of, because you have had legislation on subjects which have agitated, not only the minds of members of Congress, but which have agitated the minds of the people. I particularly refer to the negro question which is continually brought forward, and, in the discussion of which, the time of the American Congress is unnecessarily and improperly consumed, until it has become the cry of the presses throughout the country that we do not attend to the business in which the private interests of the community, and their private fortunes are invoked. And yet we are told by my colleague, that we have too much legislation. I grant you that we have too much legislation of an improper character; but it is necessary, it is absolutely necessary, with a view to the consummation of the public business, that there should be more time allotted for the consideration of the business of the country.

And while I am opposed to our taking a recess for this session, for I am not prepared to say here to-day that I shall be a member of the next Congress, and certainly if much reliance is to be placed on the threats of the party designated by the significant cognomen of Know Nothings, I would seem to have but little chance of returning here, I am in favor of the principle of this bill. I know the fact that there are bills of a private character in which my own district is interested, which have been before Congress for many years. There is a bill from western Virginia in reference to the judiciary, which was reported five years ago, and which cannot be reached this Congress. The bill is simple in its character, proposing to allow the judge to hold his terms in western Virginia, and to increase his salary. That bill, I say, cannot be reached, and the same is true of an immense mass of private matter, and yet the gentleman, my colleague, [Mr. GOODE,] says to the House and the country, that we have too much legislation. I agree with him that we have, but it is of an improper character. Let us equalize the length of the two sessions, and for that purpose let us pass this bill, and my word for it, if gentlemen will go home and present the facts to their constituents, they will be borne out in their action. I hope the House will pass the bill.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I will not delay the House by any extended remarks. I simply wish to express my opposition to the bill, as also to the amendment, for the reason that, in my humble judgment, it is entirely unnecessary. "And why?" I say here, that notwithstanding we have exhausted so much of the present session in discussing a question which has touched the heart of the nation, if members will agree this day, to meet at eleven o'clock, for a month hence, and sit five hours each day, we can act upon every important bill presented to the House. I, for one, am willing to take that course. If gentlemen will content themselves with short and sensible explanations of the matters before us, business can be dispatched with great rapidity. I think we ought to confine our remarks to five minute speeches. They are quite as effective as longer ones. I think it unwise to extend the length of what is called the short session. The Constitution prescribes the first day of December as the day upon which the sessions of Congress shall commence, unless changed by a law of Congress. The fourth section of the first article of the Constitution declares:

"That Congress shall assemble at least once in every year, and such meeting shall be on the first Monday in December, unless they shall by law, appoint a different day."

I think the long session of Congress ought never to last beyond the first of July; and, in my humble judgment, from seven years' experience here, there is no necessity for it. I can name to you a single measure, and one which ought to be adopted by Congress, which would curtail the length of the long session at least one third. I mean the establishment of a board of accounts, to pass upon private claims. That measure was presented in the Senate a few years ago, by a distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] and it was recommended to our consideration. You cannot act upon private claims in so large a body as this. If you should establish a board of accounts, you would find no necessity for a longer session than four or six months at a time.

I am opposed to a recess of Congress, and still I do not wish to stay here during the months of August and September of this year. The cholera prevails all over the country, and is said now to be in our neighborhood; and I do not think there is any necessity of our remaining later than the 20th of July, or the 1st of August. By meeting at eleven o'clock daily, we can do all our business by that time. We can take up the Calendar, and go through with it from the beginning to the end, and pass upon every bill upon it, if members will meet at an early hour, and content themselves with making five-minute speeches in explanation of them. I trust the House will not pass the bill.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It appears to me, as I view this subject, that there can be but one sentiment. The question is, whether we will sit here in dog-days or in November. The whole matter resolves itself into that. At the commencement of our Government the three winter months afforded abundant time for the legislation of Congress. We then had five millions, or less, of population. We now have twenty-three millions; and we all know that business has increased in proportion to population.

Now, sir, I would not, as one member of this body, urge anything which would promote a disregard or inattention to business here; but we know that, for ten years, we have sat here during the dog-days at great inconvenience to ourselves, and with but little advantage to public business.

By adding one month at the beginning of a session, you would take off at least a month at the close of the first session of a Congress in the hot weather, when we do not, and cannot, labor as we do in cooler weather. Gentlemen will not attend to business during the dog-days. They have not the energy to do it. Their health will not permit of it. We all of us feel disinclined to labor during the hottest of the summer months.

Now, why not meet on the first Monday in November instead of December? I can see no reason why it shall not be done. It is a better time for ourselves, and for our own convenience, as well as for our constituents. When I say "ourselves," I speak of members of Congress generally; for we ought to legislate as though we were to be here forever; we ought to do by those who are to come after us as we would ourselves be done by. It seems to me there is every consideration in favor of our meeting at that time.

As to the objections of the gentleman over the way, [Mr. BARKSDALE,] it is very evident that the elections in the States can be made to conform to the time fixed by Congress for our meeting. It is very easy for them to take the necessary action to accomplish that end.

I am very happy to say that I most heartily approve of the bill which is now under consideration. I approve of it in every respect in which I have been able to view it. I desire to say that, as one member of the House, I am willing to take all the responsibility that may attach to it. I repeat, sir, that I wish to throw no responsibility upon the majority of the House. I am willing to take my portion of it. I do hope the majority will give this to us at an early day, so that it may apply to the present session, and so that we may adjourn without the necessity of continuing this session into the dog-days. I am willing to assume my portion of the responsibility at once.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I do not propose to make a speech at this time. I move the previous question.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 104; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abernethy, James C. Allen, Barkdale, Barry, Benton, Bliss, Bocoek, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Caskie, Chamberlain, Churchwell, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Cox, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Goode, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Hill, Houston, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, Matteson, Maxwell, Smith Miller, Murray, Noble, Orr, Packer, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Robbins, Rufin, Sapp, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Alexander B. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Vail, Vansant, Wheeler, and Daniel B. Wright—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Appleton, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Banks, Belcher, Bell, Benson, Boyce, Brooks, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chandler, Corwin, Crocker, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Disney, Edmonds, Thomas D. Eliot, Everhart, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Henn, Hillyer, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, Ludisley, McCulloch, McMullin, Mace, Macy, May, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Mulson, Morgan, Nichols, Norton, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Reese, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Seward, Shannon, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Straub, John J. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Uphan, Wade, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, and Zollicoffer—104.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KEITT. I ask the gentleman from Maine to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN. For what purpose does the gentleman wish it withdrawn; for the purpose of discussion, or to move an amendment?

Mr. KEITT. I wish to move an amendment, and merely to explain its effect to the House.

Mr. WASHBURN. If the gentleman does not wish to make a speech, I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, and allow him to move his amendment.

Mr. KEITT. I desire, Mr. Speaker, if this bill is to pass, that it may be amended, and put in such a shape that it shall not go into operation until the various State Legislatures shall have an opportunity to so modify their laws as to provide for the election at the proper time of members from such States as would otherwise be disfranchised, or be under the necessity of ordering special elections. In South Carolina the time of election is fixed at such a day that we should suffer no inconvenience from the proposed change—members of Congress are elected fourteen months before their term of service commences.

That, however, is no reason why I should press this on other States where such is not the case. We are now in session twelve months of the twenty-four. I apprehend that we shall be in session hereafter no longer, if we pass this bill fixing the meeting of Congress at the first Monday of October or the first Monday of November. The only difference will be that we shall be in session during the winter instead of the summer months. It will be practicable for us to do more business than we do now. In other words, we shall be in session thirteen months instead of twelve, thus enabling the House to do more business, and at a time more propitious for its consideration. This is the reason of my desire for the passage of this bill.

Now, sir, I find in the Constitution a provision requiring Congress to assemble the first Monday of December of each year; also, a provision authorizing the State Legislatures to fix the time for the election of members of Congress. The various State Legislatures have fixed the time accordingly; and if you pass this bill, you come in conflict with their laws passed in obedience to the requirements of the Constitution of the United States. I desire to see the bill so amended as to be adapted to the machinery of State legislation. In order to do so, I move to amend the bill so as to postpone its operation to the first Monday of October, or November, which ever may be hereafter adopted, 1856. I now renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. HILLYER. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question?

Mr. KEITT. My friend from Maine has it in charge.

Mr. HILLYER. As I introduced the bill, it would be but courtesy to allow me a word of reply to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I withdraw the call, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. HILLYER. I will renew it. The gentleman from South Carolina moves to amend the bill by postponing its operation to a day so distant as not to affect the present Congress. I see no reason for this postponement; and the arguments which have been urged by the gentlemen from Mississippi, Louisiana, and Maryland, in opposition to the bill, have, on my mind, strong and powerful force in support of it. The Constitution of the United States authorizes the President, when, in his opinion, the public interest may require, to convene both Houses of Congress in extra session. The official term of every member expires on the 4th March next. I hold, then, Mr. Speaker, that it is the intention of the Constitution and the policy of the Government, that members of the next Congress should be elected prior to the 4th March next. In other words, that members of Congress should be elected prior to the day at which their term commences, so that if an extra session should be required, a Congress, or rather a House of Representatives, would be in existence, to assemble on the call of the President. The constitutions of the States of Maryland and Mississippi, and the laws of Louisiana, which require their elections to be held a few days or weeks prior to the meeting of Congress, and long after the time at which their official term commences, are in contravention of the policy of our Government and the meaning of the Constitution.

Now, it will be perceived that if the bill which I have introduced should pass, one of its great and salutary effects would be to bring the legislation of the whole country within the meaning of the Constitution and the policy of our Government. The States of Maryland, Mississippi, Louisiana, and I may add Georgia, perhaps, will be required to alter their laws in relation to the election of members of Congress. This alteration will be salutary, and will have the effect, in the event of the call of an extra session by the President of the United States, that Congress can assemble at any time, and every State will be fully represented, which is not the case under the present legislation of the different States. The position of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. GOODE,] that the tendency and effect of this bill will be to make the session of Congress perpetual, can be replied to by the simplest statement. Under the law, as it now stands, this House, and every subsequent House, can prolong the first session of each Congress just as long as they choose. That is all that the House can do under the bill now under consideration. And this is a power, of which, under the Constitution, the House cannot be deprived; so that the only effect of this bill will be to add one month more to the short session; and leave the House with the same power which it now has, and which, under the Constitution, it must have, to regulate and determine, by joint resolution, the length of the first session. This view of the subject, to my mind, is a conclusive reply to every objection which has been urged by gentlemen who have argued in opposition to this bill. I renew the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES of Louisiana. I hope the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HILLYER. The day is already so far advanced that I most respectfully decline to withdraw it.

Mr. ORR. I move that the House adjourn. The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I demand tellers upon the previous question. Tellers were not ordered.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That question has just been taken, and no business has been done by the House since.

The House was then divided on the demand for the previous question; and there were—yeas 105, noes 29.

So the previous question was seconded.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The main question was ordered to be now put, being first upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PECKHAM,] to strike out the "first Monday of November," and insert in lieu thereof "the first Monday of October."

Tellers were called for and ordered; and Messrs. PENNINGTON and BOCKOCK were appointed.

The House was then divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 77.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. ORR demanded tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered.

Mr. JONES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Messrs. DAWSON and McMULLIN were then appointed tellers.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported thirty-six in the affirmative, (a sufficient number.) So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Willis Allen, Benson, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Corwin, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Disney, Everhart, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Florence, Fuller, Giddings, Green, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Henn, Hughes, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Latham, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, Mace, Matteson, Morgan, Orr, Parker, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Riddle, Sabin, Shannon, Skelton, William Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Straub, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Tappan Wentworth—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Appleton, David J. Bailey, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Bell, Benton, Bissell, Bliss, Bockock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dick, Dickinson, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edmunds, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Faulkner, Goode, Goodrich, Greenwood, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Hill, Hillyer, Houston, Hunt, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Kidwell, Knox, Kurtz, Lamb, Letcher, Lindley, Lindsley, Mace, May, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Millson, Murray, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Packer, John Perkins, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Reese, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Ruffin, Russell, Sapp, Seward, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Wells, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—110.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. KEITT.

A MEMBER. I understand that amendment has been withdrawn.

Mr. KEITT. I would most cheerfully withdraw the amendment, if the members from Mississippi had not told me that my amendment meets their case exactly. Therefore I cannot withdraw it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the power to withdraw it, as the main question has been ordered.

Mr. ENGLISH. I call for the yeas and nays upon its adoption.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If the House now adjourns, will not this be the first business in order to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not prepared to say. This comes up under a suspension of the rules; and, as it has heretofore been held, the Chair thinks that business coming up under such circumstances goes over until next Monday.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will it not be the first business in order on Monday next?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

Mr. STEPHENS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HILLYER. I understand that where the previous question has been ordered, it is the first business in order upon the succeeding day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House should adjourn now, that question will be for the Speaker to decide to-morrow. The Chair admits the correctness of the position of the gentleman from Georgia, but states that it has heretofore been held that business coming up under a suspension of the rules on Monday, and the House adjourning without disposing of it, goes over until the next suspension day. This does not come before the House by a report of a committee, or as business from the Speaker's table.

As to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] that the House do now adjourn, the Chair will state that no business has been done since the last motion adjourn, and consequently it is not in order.

The question being first upon the demand for tellers upon the yeas and nays, tellers were refused.

The yeas and nays were also refused.

The question was then taken upon the amendment; and it was disagreed to.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Upon that motion tellers were called for, and ordered; and Messrs. JONES, of Louisiana, and ETHERIDGE, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported thirty-one in the affirmative, a further count not being demanded.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I call the yeas and nays upon that motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

The question then recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ORR. I desire to inquire whether the bill has been engrossed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is not able to inform the gentleman. He will, however, remark that the House have not yet ordered the bill to be engrossed.

Mr. DAWSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question again recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and being taken, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ball, Banks, Belcher, Bell, Benson, Boyce, Brooks, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chandler, Crocker, Thomas Davis, Dawson, De Witt, Dick, Disney, Edmunds, Everhart, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Fuller, Giddings, Goodrich, Green, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Henn, Hill, Hillyer, Hughes, Ingersoll, Kerr, Kidwell, Knox, Lamb, Lindley, McCulloch, McMullin, Mace, Mace, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Millson, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Packer, Parker, Peck, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Pringle, Puryear, Reese, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Seward, Shannon, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Straub, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Wade, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, and Zollicoffer—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, David J. Bailey, Barksdale, Barry Benton, Bliss, Bockock, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, John G. Davis, Dickinson, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Florence, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Houston, Hunt, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kurtz, Latham, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsley, Matteson, Maxwell, May, Smith Miller, Morgan, Murray, Nichols, Noble, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peckham, Pennington, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Robbins, Ruffin, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, Skelton, George W. Smyth, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Vail, Vansant, Wheeler, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright—81.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

CALIFORNIA MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill providing facilities for the mail service to San Francisco was postponed. I do not desire to call up the motion now, but merely to have it entered.

The motion to reconsider was entered, and the consideration of the bill changing the time for the meeting of Congress again resumed.

Mr. HILLYER. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. HAMILTON. I demand the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MATTESON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides the motion to be out of order. The House have just refused to adjourn.

The question was then taken upon the passage of the bill; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 81, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Appleton, Ball, Banks, Belcher, Benson, Brooks, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Crocker, Thomas Davis, Dawson, De Witt, Dick, Disney, Edmunds, Everhart, Farley, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Fuller, Giddings, Goodrich, Greenwood, Aaron Harlan, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Henn, Hill, Hillyer, Hughes, Ingersoll, Kerr, Kidwell, Knox, Lamb, Lindley, McCulloch, McMullin, Mace, Mace, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Millson, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Pringle, Puryear, Reese, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Seward, Shannon, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Richard H. Stanton, Straub, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Trout, Upham, Wade, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, and Zollicoffer—81.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, David J. Bailey, Barksdale, Barry, Bell, Bliss, Bockock, Bridges, Bugg, Caskey, Chamberlain, Chrisman, Clark, Cobb, Colquitt, John G. Davis, Dickinson, Dowdell, Dunham, Eddy, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Florence, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Haven, Hendricks, Houston, Hunt, Johnson, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kurtz, Latham, Letcher, Lilly, Lindsley, Matteson, Maxwell, May, Smith Miller, Morgan, Murray, Nichols, Noble, Andrew Oliver, Packer, Pennington, Phelps, Powell, Pratt, Robbins, Ruffin, Shaw, Shower, Singleton, Skelton, George W. Smyth, Hester L. Stevens, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Vail, Vansant, Wheeler, Witte, and Daniel B. Wright—77.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HILLYER. I move that the vote by which the bill passed be reconsidered, and that the motion to reconsider lie upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to—ayes 40, noes 95.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider was then agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend the title of the bill by substituting for the present one the following:

An act to add thirty days to each session of Congress.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to substitute the following:

An act to equalize the sessions of Congress.

A MEMBER. Is the latter amendment in order?

Mr. McMULLIN. I withdraw it.

The question was taken on Mr. LETCHER's substitute, and it was rejected.

The title was then agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move to reconsider the vote by which the title was adopted; and that that motion be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARTHA WASHINGTON CASE.

Mr. BLISS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a bill of the following title:

A bill to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint an agent to investigate and bring to justice certain offenders against the laws of the United States, and making appropriation of $15,000 for that purpose.

Mr. HAVEN. I object.

Mr. BLISS. I would ask the gentleman to withdraw his objection until I make a short explanation.

Mr. HAVEN. I have no objection to the explanation, but I cannot withdraw objection to the introduction of the bill.

Mr. BLISS. I move a suspension of the rules for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Thereupon (at twenty minutes past four o'clock) the House adjourned till to-morrow at twelve, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 20, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled bills of the following titles; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker:

H. R. No. 266. An act for the relief of Captain E. A. F. Lavalette, of the United States Navy; and

H. R. No. 178. An act for the relief of Benjamin Rowe.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of "A bill granting lands equally to the several States to aid in the construction of railroads and for the support of schools." The pending motion is to recommit the bill to the Committee on Public Lands, on which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. The gentleman from Maryland, in consequence of the absence of the author of the bill, [Mr. BENNETT,] yields the floor, that I may submit a motion that its further consideration be postponed to this day two weeks.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

JUAN M. LUCO AND JOSE L. LUCO.

Mr. HILLYER. I hold in my hands Senate bill No. 330, being a bill for the relief of Juan M. Lucó and José L. Lucó, which has been referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. Unless the bill passes this session of Congress, the petitioner will lose his right. It is full of merit; and if any gentleman objects to the passage of the bill, I pledge myself to withdraw it at any moment. In order to do justice to the parties interested, and prevent irretrievable wrong, I ask the unanimous consent of the House that I may be permitted to report this bill.

Mr. DAVIS. Has the morning hour commenced?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. DAVIS. I must object, because there are a thousand bills that ought to receive consideration.

On motion by Mr. WELLS, it was Ordered, That the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 239, "for the relief of Sylvester Petition," and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COBB. I insist upon the regular order of business.

FULLER'S SURVEY OF THE OHIO RIVER.

Mr. BALL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to cause to be furnished to this House, as soon as practicable, a copy of Fuller's survey of the Ohio river, made in 1853, at, and in the vicinity of Marietta, together with any reports, estimates, explanatory notes, or other papers on file in his Department adapted to illustrate the same; also, with a copy of any papers emanating from the City Council of Marietta having reference to the improvement of the Ohio river at that point.

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan. I demand the regular order of business.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House simply to change the reference of two propositions that have been pending before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I am instructed by that committee to make the following report:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the memorial and bill of this House for the erection, in the city of Indianapolis, in the State of Indiana, a United States circuit court-house, have directed me to report the same back to the House, and recommend its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have another request of the same kind to make.

The SPEAKER. This proposition is objected to also.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the Chair by whom is objection made?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object; the regular order of business is the call on committees. When the committees have been called, then the gentleman from Indiana can report back the bills, and give them the right direction. It will take up less time in this way than asking unanimous consent.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It will not take one minute to have them referred as I desire. And I therefore hope that the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his objection.

The objection was not withdrawn.

MINNESOTA LAND BILL.

The SPEAKER. The business next in order is the consideration of the following bill:

Bill to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad therein.

The SPEAKER. Objection was made to the second reading of the bill; and on the question whether the bill be rejected, the previous question was demanded. The question now is on seconding the call for the previous question.

Mr. ORR. And on that I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and Cox, were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes not counted.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was ordered to be now put; which was, "Shall the bill be rejected?"

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope that the bill will be read for information; for if I understand it aright, it is the same old bill that was rejected here before. It is the same—

[Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. STEVENS. It is not the same old bill.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The bill will be read.

The Clerk read the bill in extenso.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Belcher, Boeck, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskie, Chastain, Christian, Cox, Cruge, Curtis, Dick, Dickinson, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Ewing, Faulkner, Fenton, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Hastings, Haven, Hill, Hillyer, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kuriz, Leicher, Lilly, McCulloch, Middlesworth, Millson, Murray, Peck, Packham, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Rufin, Shaw, Slower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trout, Vansant, Witte, and Zollcoffer—65.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ball, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Benson, Bliss, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Crocker, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Edmunds, Thomas D. Eliot, English, Farley, Florence, Goodrich, Greenwood, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Hinn, Houston, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, McMullin, Mace, Macy, Matteson, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordcaid Oliver, Orr, Packer, Parker, Pennington, John Perkins, Phelps, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Reese, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sahin, Sapp, Seward, Singleton, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Upham, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—95.

So the House refused to reject the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STEVENS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES. He had the floor before the yeas and nays were called, but has not now.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides otherwise; and the gentleman from Michigan is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Michigan does not seek the floor.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.]

Mr. JONES. I now move to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan. I believe I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair paused to hear the gentleman, but he did not respond at all, and he then recognized the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who made the motion to commit the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. STEVENS. I understood that I had the floor, but I was taken up for a moment in conversation. I was about to make a motion in reference to the bill, and I hope I have not lost the opportunity of doing so.

The SPEAKER. The history of the matter is this: Before the bill was read the second time the gentleman from Michigan addressed the Chair. The bill was read a second time, and, without the gentleman from Michigan again addressing the Chair, the Chair announced that he was entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] addressed the Chair, and claimed that he was entitled to it, for the reason that the gentleman from Michigan addressed the Chair before the bill was read a second time, and was not entitled to it after it was read. The Chair decided differently, and that the gentleman from Michigan was entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Michigan was engaged in conversation with some gentlemen, and the Chair twice, he thinks, certainly once, with great distinctness, and considerable pause after it, said that the gentleman from Michigan had the floor. The gentleman did not respond, and the Chair then recognized the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who made the motion to commit to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The Chair thinks he cannot alter the state of the case.

The gentleman from Michigan is now recognized as having the floor, if he desires.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Will the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STEVENS] yield me the floor for a moment?

Mr. STEVENS. I will.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I desire to make a personal explanation.

[Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to do so.

Mr. BRIDGES and others objected.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I will state simply what it is for. The point made upon me yesterday was, that I had inserted—

[Cries of "Object!" and "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Chair is bound to enforce the rules.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I hope, at least, gentlemen will hear me state the point, without entering into its discussion.

[Cries of "Object!"]

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Gentlemen would not object if they could hear the circumstances.

Mr. BRIDGES. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the gentleman cannot proceed.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. What gentleman objects?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BRIDGES,] and two or three others, object.

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan. I now move the previous question.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I appeal to the gentleman from Michigan to allow me a moment of his time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan cannot do that, for the reason that he is not now upon the floor—he having moved the previous question, which cuts off all debate.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdraw the previous question, if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I will renew it. I feel compelled to throw myself upon the charity of the House for one moment. It will be recollected—

Mr. BRIDGES. Is that in order? I object to the gentleman's proceeding, upon the ground that the matter he wishes to introduce is irrelevant to the bill under consideration.

Mr. McMULLIN. Has not the gentleman from Tennessee the right to proceed, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. STEVENS] having yielded him the floor?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is not entitled to the floor. The gentleman from Tennessee is, however, entitled to the floor to speak upon the bill under consideration.

Mr. McMULLIN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will allow me one moment. I ask the Speaker whether it is not competent, upon motion submitted to the House, and acquiesced in by the House, for the gentleman from Tennessee to proceed with his personal explanation?

The SPEAKER. It is not competent, under the rules, to submit any such motion, unless it be a question of privilege affecting some member of this body, or the body itself.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I consider this to be a question of privilege. I do not know how the House will consider it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the House will allow the gentleman from Tennessee to proceed, because, provided that privilege is accorded to him, I wish to ask him a question arising out of the debate of yesterday, as reported in the Globe of this morning, in which he speaks of me as an Abolitionist.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is entitled to the floor, and has the right to address the House upon the subject of the bill before the House. The gentleman, however, was proceeding to submit remarks which, in the opinion of the Chair, are not in order; and being called upon to enforce the rule, he decides that the course of remark indicated by the gentleman from Tennessee is not in order, and cannot at this time be pursued.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I ask the Speaker whether I can have a better opportunity to make this explanation any other day than to-day?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee must be aware, the Chair presumes, that it is competent for the House to indulge these personal explanations at any time, by unanimous consent, but that they are not in order except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I have but one single object in view. It is not to speak upon the Minnesota bill; it is to reply to a point made upon me in this House, in the course of that peculiar debate. Afterwards my colleague [Mr. CULLOM] inserted, in the report, language which he did not utter in the House, and which I pronounce false—infamously false—

The remainder of the sentence was lost amidst shouts of "Order!" and the confusion which immediately ensued.

Mr. CULLOM rose from his seat and rushed towards Mr. CHURCHWELL with threatening gestures. Members crowded around both gentlemen and interposed between them. Amidst loud shouts of "Order!" and the greatest confusion, Mr. CULLOM was heard to exclaim, "It's a lie."

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms will restore order.

The Sergeant-at-Arms thereupon proceeded with the mace of the House to the scene of the difficulty, and after some minutes succeeded in partially restoring order.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not hear any motion until order is restored in the Hall.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will resume his seat.

Many members still standing in the area and around Messrs. CHURCHWELL and CULLOM.

The SPEAKER. Can it be possible that the Chair must so often admonish gentlemen to resume their seats and preserve order?

Order being restored,

Mr. CHURCHWELL said: In compliance with my promise to the gentleman from Michigan, I renew the call for the previous question.

[Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. In calling for the previous question, the gentleman from Tennessee is in order.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I prefer, Mr. Speaker, to yield the floor to the gentleman from Michigan, that he may call for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I demand the previous question?

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to submit an amendment to the bill, and I hope that the demand for the previous question may not be seconded.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand tellers on seconding the call for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and HOUSTON were appointed.

The question was taken; and the demand for the previous question received a second, the tellers having reported—ayes 77, noes 52.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays on ordering the main question to be now put.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Bell, Benton, Bliss, Breckinridge, Brooks, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Crocker, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Disney, Dowdell, Eastman, Eddy, Edmunds, Ellison, Farley, Florence, Goodrich, Greenwood, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Hobson, Hughes, Johnson, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindsey, Mace, Macy, Matteson, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Pennington, John Perkins, Phelps, Reese, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Tweed, Upham, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashe, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Belcher, Benson, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chastain, Chrisman, Colquitt, Cox, Craige, Dick, Dickinson, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Fuller, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hill, Hillyer, Howe, Hunt, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, McMullin, May, Middleswarth, Millson, Morgan, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Peck, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Rufin, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, John J. Taylor, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Witte, and Zollcoffer—74.

So the main question was ordered to be now put, being upon the motion to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HAVEN. Upon that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 72, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Belcher, Bocock, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chastain, Colquitt, Cox, Craige, Curtis, Dick, Dickinson, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hill, Hillyer, Howe, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, Matteson, May, Middleswarth, Millson, Morgan, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Peck, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Pratt, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Rufin, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, John J. Taylor, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Witte, and Zollcoffer—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Bell, Benson, Benton, Bliss, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Disney, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edmunds, Ellison, Ewing, Farley, Florence, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Hughes, Johnson, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindsey, Mace, Macy, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Parker, Pennington, Phelps, Preston, Pringle, Reese, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Singleton, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Tweed, Upham, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—97.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 66, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, Ashe, Thomas H. Bayly, Belcher, Benton, Bocock, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskey, Chastain, Chrisman, Craige, Curtis, Dick, Dickinson, Etheridge, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hill, Hillyer, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Smith, William Smith, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trout, Vail, and Vansant—66.

wood, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howe, Hughes, Johnson, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindsey, Lindsey, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Pennington, Phelps, Pratt, Reese, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Singleton, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Tweed, Upham, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, and Hendrick B. Wright—97.

So the House refused to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. HOUSTON. I then move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania, in the chair.) The Chair will state, that the main question having been ordered to be now put, it must be disposed of before that motion can be entertained.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does the Chair decide that my motion is out of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The present incumbent of the chair is informed that the practice has been such as he has stated.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was subsequently read the third time.

Mr. HAVEN. I rise to a question of order. I object to the reading of the bill, unless it has been engrossed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill has been engrossed, and has been already ordered to a third reading, and read a third time. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would like to know how the Chair can tell whether the bill is engrossed? Certainly, there has not been time to compare it with the bill since it was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. ORR. Oh, it is just the same with this bill as with bills which we pass every day.

Mr. JONES. That may be the custom; but it is not proper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was engrossed before the House met this morning.

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan. I move the previous question.

Mr. HAVEN. But as to the question of order which I raised: I am not through with it yet. I have not been heard fully. I do not want to debate it. I raised the question of order previously to the reading of the bill. The Chairman overruled it, on the ground that the question came too late. Now, I desire to have that corrected; for I addressed the Chair previously to the Clerk reading the title of the bill the third time; for I had the subject in my eye all the while.

As to the question of fact as to whether the bill has been engrossed or not, I, of course, am uninformed; but a moment or two ago I saw the bill unengrossed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from New York, that at the time the Chair heard his point of order raised he was informed by the Clerk that the bill had been engrossed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) But when has it been engrossed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And being so informed, the Chair overruled the point of order raised by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JONES. Time ought to be taken to compare the bill as engrossed with the original, and to see whether the engrossment is right or not. I now ask whether the decision of the Chair has not been made on a false assumption?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair was informed by the Clerk that the bill was engrossed before the House met to-day. Such was the information the Chair had on the subject, and on that he made his decision.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it now in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? If so, I wish to make that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been called for.

Mr. HAMILTON. Before the question is put on seconding the call for the previous question, I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I rise to a point of order. I hope that we will have a uniform rule of practice in transacting the business of the House. The previous question has been demanded on the passage of the bill, and, besides, a motion is now made to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Now, it will be recollected by the House, that some time ago, when I had occasion to look up the precedents in this body, I made the point to the Speaker, when we were considering the Nebraska bill, that I had found decisions of his in the last Congress—with which he was satisfied—that when the previous question had been demanded, and when subsequently a motion was made to go into the Committee of the Whole, the question on seconding the call for the previous question would have to be first put, before the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole was disposed of. I can turn to these precedents. The Speaker became satisfied with them. I hope that a uniform rule of practice will be established on this point. I do not care what the rule is, but I do think it ought to be a uniform one.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from North Carolina, that the temporary occupant of the chair must be governed by what he is informed have been the decisions of the Speaker; and his information is, that the Chair has held, that when the previous question has been called for, and when, at the same time, or subsequently, a motion is made to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the latter question is one of higher privilege than the former, and takes precedence of it.

Mr. CLINGMAN, (interrupting.) I can show decisions the other way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And from that information, the temporary occupant of the chair decides that the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HAMILTON] is in order, and must take precedence of the demand for the previous question.

Mr. CHANDLER. Before the question is put on the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union—which I suppose will lead to the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill—I ask permission to present to this House a report from the Committee on the Library, in the form of a resolution, which was referred to that committee for a construction of the joint resolution of the two Houses touching books for new members.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By unanimous consent the gentleman can do so.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I object. I want to vote down the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, in order that we may pass this bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the House will go into committee now. Let the morning hour have its own business, and let the other business of the House have the balance of the time. I will vote for the bill in the morning hour, but I am unwilling that it should rule out everything else.

Mr. COBB. If the House goes into committee now, does not the bill go upon the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the opinion of the Chair it does.

Mr. COBB. Very well; I want the friends of the bill to understand that.

Mr. HAMILTON. I call the gentleman from Alabama to order.

The question now being upon the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union,

Mr. HAMILTON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 70, nays 99; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Beaton, Boveck, Boyce, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskie, Chastain, Chrisman, Colquitt, Cox, Craig, Curtis, Dick, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Fuller, Giddings, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hill, Hillyer, Houston, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, Matteson, Middleswarth, Millson, Murray, Andrew Oliver, Peck, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Preston, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, George W. Smyth, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trout, Vail, Vansant, and Zollicoffer—70.

NAYS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Bell, Benson, Benton, Bliss, Breckinridge, Brooks, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Crocker, Cullom, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Disney, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edmands, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, English, Ewing, Farley, Florence, Goodrich, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morgan, Nichols, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Parker, Pennington, Phelps, Pratt, Reese, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Singleton, William R. Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hestor L. Stevens, Straub, David Stuart, Thurston, Tracy, Tweed, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, and Daniel B. Wright—99.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put, being upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HAVEN demanded the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Banks, Barksdale, Barry, Bell, Benson, Benton, Bliss, Breckinridge, Campbell, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Corwin, Crocker, John G. Davis, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dick, Disney, Dowdell, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edmands, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, Farley, Florence, Goodrich, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hendricks, Henn, Houston, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, Mace, Macy, Maxwell, Middleswarth, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Noble, Norton, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Parker, Pennington, John Perkins, Phelps, Pringle, Reese, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Singleton, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hestor L. Stevens, Straub, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tracy, Tweed, Upham, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, and Daniel B. Wright—99.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Belcher, Boveck, Bridges, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskie, Chastain, Chrisman, Colquitt, Cox, Craig, Curtis, Dickinson, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Ewing, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Fuller, Goode, Grow, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Hastings, Haven, Hill, Hillyer, Ingersoll, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Letcher, Lilly, McCulloch, Matteson, May, Millson, Morgan, Murray, Nichols, Andrew Oliver, Peck, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Powell, Pratt, Puryear, Ready, David Ritchie, Ruffin, Shaw, Shower, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Witte, and Zollicoffer—71.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the call of the yeas and nays,

Mr. BOYCE stated that he had paired off with Mr. MAYALL upon the bill, and that otherwise he should have voted against it.

Mr. STEVENS, of Michigan. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The title of the bill was then agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reconsider the vote by which the title was adopted, and also to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BOOKS FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire now to offer the resolution which I have made several attempts to bring before the House; and with a view of having settled a question which proposes to prevent a large expenditure.

The resolution was then read, as follows:

Resolved, That, in adopting the joint resolution from the Senate, authorizing the distribution of books among the new members of the two Houses of Congress, the House of Representatives intended that when the publisher of any such books is unable to supply them, the Clerk of the House shall be at liberty to purchase them of any other person; and that when such works as have been distributed to members are not to be readily obtained, other books of a similar character may be supplied to them: Provided, That no more shall be paid therefor than has been paid for the books for which those shall be substituted: Provided also, That the new edition of the Opinions of the Attorneys General of the United States, contained in four volumes, and having an index, be substituted for the imperfect edition heretofore distributed, provided the cost thereof shall not exceed fifteen dollars per copy: And provided also, That no more than one copy of any one work shall be furnished for any member.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object.

Mr. CHANDLER. I trust the gentleman will not object. We cannot get on with the appropriation bill without having something of the sort done. Its passage will save $25,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. The general appropriation bill certainly has nothing to do with that resolution.

Mr. CHANDLER. Unless this resolution be passed, it is the duty of the Clerk to purchase immediately one hundred and sixty copies of Hickey's Constitution for each new member of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the resolution was received.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the resolution by striking out the last proviso, which is as follows:

Provided also, That no more than one copy of any one work shall be furnished to any member.

I now call upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania to explain the necessity of that proviso.

Mr. CHANDLER. The gentleman from Georgia calls upon me to explain that proviso. I will do it. In the joint resolution which passed some time since, it was provided that the members of each House should be furnished with all those books which had been previously furnished to the new members by other Congresses. The Senate decided that the resolution must be so construed as to give each new member of each House one hundred and sixty copies of the Constitution which now lies upon your table. That construction would involve a cost of $25,000. That part of the resolution seemed to the committee as plain as any other portion of it, but because it has been construed differently, they have reported this resolution.

Mr. SEWARD. The object which I have in view in making the motion to strike out this proviso is, that the new members of this House may be entitled each to one hundred and sixty copies of the Constitution, the same number as is given to Senators. That is the construction which has been given in the Senate. That is the construction which has been given it by the Clerk of the House, and that is the construction which I think should be given to it. If this proviso should be adopted, the effect would be that the Senators would get one hundred and sixty copies each for distribution, and the members of the House will be denied the same number which we should be entitled to by a similar construction.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether the old members of this House have ever received more than one copy of this work? It has never been furnished to them for distribution. If the construction which is provided for in this resolution be given, each new member will receive one copy as heretofore. If not, each new member will receive one hundred and sixty copies.

Mr. SEWARD. In answer to the gentleman, I have only to say this: If the old members do not think proper to take care of their rights, and provide themselves with the same number of copies under joint resolution that Senators take, it is not the fault of new members. So far as I am myself concerned, I propose to take care of my individual rights, and the rights of my constituents, in the distribution of copies of the Constitution. Old members have legislated for themselves heretofore, and I cannot go back on the record to correct the mischief which may have been done. I hope that the new members here will protect themselves and get what Senators take.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend by striking out the following words:

And that when such works as have been distributed to members are not to be readily obtained, other books of similar character may be supplied for them: Provided, That no more shall be paid therefor than has been paid for the books for which those shall be substituted.

The SPEAKER. There is an amendment now pending to strike out that last proviso. The Chair will, however, entertain the amendment of the gentleman.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me that this provision of the resolution ought not to be here, even if the House determine to adopt the balance.

Heretofore, the House has supplied members as they come into the body with books, or so many as had been received by their predecessors on this floor. When they are exhausted, it is proposed to go into the market, at the instance of the member himself, and to select literary or miscellaneous books of one sort or the other, in order that he may supply to himself the amount of books prescribed by the resolution. In other words, he may go there and purchase a literary library, so far as the expenditure of Congress will enable him to do so, for his own private use. I hope that portion of the resolution may be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, to strike out the last proviso, being first made, is the first in order.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, sir, the object of presenting these books to members, in the first instance, was to supply them with political works connected with the discharge of their duties here, to afford them facility in acquiring the requisite knowledge to enable them to discharge those duties in a satisfactory, or at least a more satisfactory manner to their constituents and the public. Now, it seems to me that the portion of the resolution to which I refer can have no such effect; on the contrary, it can be regarded in no other light than as a matter of personal favor to members, by which their personal interest and their convenience are alone to be consulted. I hope that we shall not enlarge the rule at any rate; but that we shall confine the distribution of books to the limits heretofore assigned.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The matter in reference to which the Committee on the Library now report, was a joint resolution of the two Houses to furnish the new members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the present Congress such books as had heretofore been distributed to members. It was understood at the time to be one copy of each of the works which had been heretofore distributed for new members use. And why, sir, was it necessary to pass the joint resolution? Heretofore the Senate have adopted a resolution for the distribution of books among its members. The House have also adopted a similar resolution in reference to its members; but at the last Congress, with an appropriation to pay for the books then directed to be distributed by the respective Houses, it was enacted that thereafter no other book should be distributed, except such as should be ordered by the Senate or the House. Then, sir, in order to distribute books similar to those usually distributed, it was necessary to pass a repealing law to be approved by the President.

Congress, I believe, have never authorized, by joint resolution, any number of books to members of either House for distribution. If you now pass the resolution giving to each of the new members of this House one hundred and sixty copies of Hickey's Constitution, you give them a greater number of books than any members of the House have ever heretofore received. The House of Representatives have never distributed, or authorized to be distributed to its members, Hickey's compilation of the Constitution, other than one copy for each of its members. The House passed a joint resolution, and estimates were submitted to the committee, in order to make an appropriation for the payment of these books, and a list of such books as each member is entitled to accompanies those estimates.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] if we do not pass any resolution now explanatory of the joint resolution, what construction will the Clerk give to it?

Mr. JONES. The Clerk puts this construction upon the joint resolution, that each member is entitled to but one copy of the Constitution. The Clerk has submitted his estimates under that joint resolution of the cost of books for the new members, and he makes the cost of a full set of books for each member $1,043 85. If you say that the true construction of the resolution is that he shall purchase one hundred and sixty copies of the Constitution for each member, it will make $1,202 00 as the cost of books to be distributed to each new member at this session.

The Senate have at different times ordered copies of the Constitution for distribution through the country, sometimes a larger and sometimes a smaller number; but the House have never ordered more than one copy of the work for each member. I do not believe the House would have passed this joint resolution, if they had believed at the time that it was intended to order books for general distribution by members of the House. It was merely intended to give to each member one copy of such works as have heretofore been distributed to members for their own use. I do not know what proportion of these books can now be had. The editions of many of them have been exhausted, and I believe, in every resolution heretofore passed by this House, there has been a clause inserted that nothing in the resolution should be construed to authorize the reprinting of any of these works; but now it is proposed that the works that have been exhausted shall be supplied by an equal amount in value of other works, to be selected by the member himself. I will in this connection read the estimate submitted by the Clerk:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, }
June 14, 1854.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit, herewith, estimates of additional appropriations for the expenses of the House of Representatives, made necessary by existing orders of the House and its committees, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1855.

J. W. FORNEY,
Clerk of Ho. of Reps. United States.

Hon. LINN BOYD,
Speaker of Ho. of Reps. United States.

Amended Estimates of Appropriations for the contingent expenses of the House of Representatives for the year ending 30th June, 1855.

For furniture and repairs, three thousand eight hundred and seventy-five dollars. $3,875 00

The above is in lieu of the $3,000 now in the printed bill. The addition of $875 is made necessary by the order of the House for a new set of light chairs for summer, the contract price of which is $875.

For horses and carriages, four thousand seven hundred and forty-five dollars. $4,745 00

This is in lieu of the $3,920 in the printed bill, the addition of $1,825 being made necessary as follows:

Additional mail carriage, allowed by the Committee on Accounts	$730
Horse and wagon for heavy documents, allowed by Committee on Accounts	730
Carry-all of Sergeant-at-Arms, omitted in former estimate, for six months	365
	$1,825

For newspapers for members, twelve thousand five hundred dollars $12,500 00

This is in lieu of the $10,000 in the printed bill. The addition is made necessary by the resolution of the House which allows to each member $50 for newspapers, instead of $40, as heretofore.

For books voted to the new members of the House of the Thirty-Third Congress, one hundred and fifty-one thousand nine hundred and forty-nine dollars and eighty-seven cents. $151,949 87

The foregoing estimate is made up as follows: There are in the present House one hundred and fifty-four new members, of whom one hundred and forty-three are entitled to full sets of books, and eleven to partial sets. The following list gives the cost of a full set of books for one member:

Register of Debates	$145 00
Revised Statutes and Index	35 00
Globe and Appendix	155 00
Contested Elections	5 00
Senate and Laws	10 00
Constitution	1 00
Elliott's Debates	16 00
American Archives, (9 vols.)	151 60
Diplomatic Correspondence	15 00
American State Papers	235 00
Opinions of the Attorneys General	15 00
Finance Reports	24 00
Annals of Congress, (40 vols.)	200 00
Adams's Works	20 00
Hamilton's Works	15 75
	1,043 85

143 full sets, at $1,043 85.	$149,270 55
11 partial sets	2,679 32
	151,949 87

For Annals of Congress for the House Library under resolution of the House of September 28, 1853, one hundred sets of each volume, from the twenty-third to the fortieth, both included, in all seventeen hundred volumes, at five dollars per volume, eight thousand five hundred dollars. $8,500 00

For Annals of Congress for one hundred and forty three members of the Thirty Second Congress entitled to them under the resolution of July 26, 1852, one hundred and forty three sets of twenty-four volumes each, from the sixteenth to the fortieth, inclusive, in all three thousand four hundred and thirty-two volumes, at five dollars per volume, seventeen thousand one hundred and sixty dollars. $17,160 00

The resolution, it seems to me, was certainly framed with the design of giving to each new member one copy of each work which I have read from that estimate submitted by the Clerk; and this thing of including one hundred and fifty-nine copies of Hickey's Constitution, to be distributed to the new members, is, in my opinion, an afterthought for the benefit of the author or compiler of that work. And, to say nothing about the wrong in itself, it would be doing injustice to those districts—not to the members themselves, but to their districts—which have been represented on this floor, and whose Representatives have never received one solitary copy of that work for distribution among their constituents. This work has never been taken by the House since it was first compiled. It has never been ordered since. And it was, in my opinion, clearly not the intention or understanding of this House, at the time this resolution was adopted, that they should go beyond the copies for the members of the works that are now in use.

Mr. BOYCE. I merely wish to say that I think the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] a very proper one. The object of buying these books, if I understand it, is that members may have the means of informing themselves upon political subjects. What then do they want with more than one copy of any one work before them? This whole thing of the distribution of books is one upon which the country is somewhat sore. Let us proceed, then, with some degree of regard to public opinion. If there is any doubt of the meaning of the original resolution, let us adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which is designed to explain it.

Mr. UPHAM. I understand that the present difficulty arises from the circumstance that the original joint resolution, was so interpreted in the other branch of the National Legislature as to give a large number of one of the books to the new members of that body. I also understand that if that joint resolution shall receive the same interpretation here, it would give the same large number of books to each of the new members of this House. I understand that the old members of this House never received that large number. I learn, also, from the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on the Library, [Mr. CHANDLER,] that the Opinions of the Attorneys General, in the edition which he proposes to provide for new members, are in a form and shape vastly more valuable than in the previous edition, which edition the old members received.

I rise, therefore, to give notice that if the motion of my friend from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] to strike out the last proviso of the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall prevail, I propose to move an additional proviso, as follows:

And provided further, That the members who have not received the books contemplated herein, shall be provided therewith.

The object of the proviso is, that the old members of this body may have an equal number of the work upon the Constitution to circulate in their districts, and among their constituents; and, also, that the old members may have the advantage of the very superior recent edition of the Opinions of the Attorneys General.

Allow me to say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not at all sympathize with my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] in the argument which he has made to the House in enforcing his views, that this resolution operates, and ought to, exclusively to the personal benefit of members. I should rejoice to have the resolution, in its final form, assume such a shape that it will be valuable, not only to us, but to our constituents. And I maintain, sir, that there is no book which we order, in large numbers, more appropriate to be circulated among our constituents than that book on the Constitution. It is a book which we should rejoice to be able to deposit in every county, in every town, and in every village in our respective districts.

With these views, I shall offer the proviso which I have read to the House.

Mr. SEWARD. If I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. UPHAM,] he proposes to offer his proviso in the event that my motion is adopted.

Mr. UPHAM. Yes; and I shall offer it in case the motion of my friend from Georgia fails, if it will be in order to do so.

The SPEAKER. It is in order to move to strike out and insert.

Mr. SEWARD. I will not object to that.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I myself have never been in favor of the policy of publishing books by Congress for circulation, either among members or their constituents. But, sir, the policy has long prevailed, and I suppose that this resolution involves a simple construction of a resolution heretofore adopted. It is true the discussion has been extended to embrace the general policy of voting books to members; but the objections which have been urged to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania have been confined to the ordering of but one copy of this particular work for distribution by the members.

Now, if I understand it, it has long been the practice to distribute largely many works; for instance, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Patent Office report. Well, sir, what is the object in ordering large numbers of these works printed? Undoubtedly it is that members may act as trustees for their distribution. Every member who receives these books is bound to distribute them among his constituents in the manner best calculated to promote the object in furnishing them to him. No member has the right to sell or dispose of them for his own personal advantage. No member, I am sure, will so dispose of them.

The Constitution of the United States, it is true, is all over the country. It is contained in the editions of the constitution and laws of most of the States. It may be found in many of the school books. It is found in all the books containing the laws of the country. But the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that it is not sufficiently circulated. Well, sir, I concur with him in the opinion that a proper knowledge of it is wanting in many portions of the country. I dare say that he speaks knowingly when he makes the observation. I have no doubt he has seen a manifest want of it in the State which he so ably represents upon this floor. We have had a startling illustration of the utter want of knowledge of the provisions of this instrument on a recent occasion, in carrying out the laws of the Federal Government, in the far-famed city of Boston.

I have no doubt the honorable gentleman speaks from what he has seen, and that the circulation of the Constitution is really necessary in that portion of the country from which he comes. I have generally voted against the largest number of these publications, but I am almost constrained, in this particular instance, to go against the construction advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and in favor of that of the Senate. I do not know that I will vote in favor of that proposition, but I shall be strongly inclined to do so. I hope, sir, that this question will be brought to a close without further discussion.

Mr. SEWARD. I have only one remark to make. I am very sorry the gentleman from Virginia has thought proper to allude to the want of the Constitution in Massachusetts. Sir, we need it as much at the South as anywhere. It is needed North, South, East, and West; our whole people need it. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. UPHAM. I desire to offer a single sentiment in reply to the remarks which have fallen from the honorable member from Virginia, who has just taken his seat, bearing upon myself and upon my State—the venerable, enlightened, and illustrious Commonwealth which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor. The gentleman from Virginia says, if I understood him—my attention having been to some degree interrupted—that the State of Massachusetts needs to have the Constitution of the United States circulated among its people.

Sir, the Representatives and the faithful and patriotic citizens of that State intend that the Constitution of the United States shall be kept fresh in the minds of the people of every generation; that in every school district every child shall grow up with its principles engraven deeply on his heart. The people of Massachusetts do not intend that lapse of time shall render it necessary to have their minds reformed in reference to the Constitution.

There may be portions of this Confederacy, which took a great part, too, in the formation of that Constitution, where its original and fundamental principles need particularly to be reënfined, and among whose people they need to be repeated and revived. And, in reference to such portions of the Confederacy, I would particularly suggest to my honorable friend from Virginia, it surely is of even greater importance that every member on this floor should be provided with the means of conveying to his constituency a correct knowledge of the Constitution, so that errors which may have grown up, and heresies which may have thriven in the minds of the people they represent, may be corrected and removed; and that they may be brought back to the knowledge of those primitive sentiments and truths in support of which the fathers of Virginia and the fathers of Massachusetts were united. And if we do our duty, and recall those who have strayed into error, to the grounds on which the Constitution was established, their sons will again come together, and be united in the maintenance of those same great first principles.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am happy, really very happy, sir, to agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts in the opinions which he has expressed. In all sincerity, from very slight acquaintance with that gentleman, I entertain for him really a great respect. I speak this now as con amore. I did not venture to say that the people of Massachusetts needed additional information on the subject of the Constitution. I remarked, it will be remembered, that I supposed it was in all their school books. But I was very much gratified at the testimony of the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts on this subject, which was very much strengthened by a recent circumstance which occurred in Boston, from which it would seem, in fact, that additional information on this sacred instrument was necessary. I am told that it is in every common prayer-book.

I admit that Virginia and Massachusetts once united cordially in the construction of this instrument. They moved together harmoniously for a season, but they soon diverged; different constructions prevailed in the two Commonwealths—wisely I will not say as to both; for I could not say so; but patriotic as to both I am willing to admit. Still, sir, they have differed; they at present differ; and I am sure that the gentleman from Massachusetts will admit that a want of knowledge of the Constitution—for it is not to be supposed that there is want of patriotic purpose to observe its provisions—has been strikingly manifested in the great emporium of New England.

As the gentleman understands the subject well, and thinks that there ought to be an additional circulation of the Constitution among his constituents, I bow in submission to his opinion. I agree with him in opinion, and may perhaps unite with him when we are called on to vote. I do not promise, however, to do so.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question was ordered to be now put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays, and tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JONES, of Tennessee, and PERKINS, of New York, were appointed.

The House was then divided; and the tellers reported only twenty gentlemen voting in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. STUART, of Michigan. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to anticipate another motion to adjourn, and therefore I take this opportunity to give notice to the House that on tomorrow I shall call their attention to a question of privilege connected with the recent violation of the order and decorum of the House.

[Cries of "Good!" "Good!" and "That's right!"]

Mr. GOODE. I ask the Chair whether a division of this question is in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. PHELPS occupying the chair.) Under the rule of the House a motion to strike out and insert is not divisible.

The question now being on the adoption of the amendment,

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WHEELER and CHAMBERLAIN were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 90, noes 47.

So the amendment was adopted.

Mr. LETCHER. I now present to the House the amendment to which I called the attention of the House some time ago, and which is on the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House has sustained the demand for the previous question, and ordered the main question to be now put. The present occupant of the chair was not presiding when the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] was offered; but as he is informed, it was not entertained by the Speaker.

Mr. LETCHER. It was entertained and debated for some time; and then the Speaker remarked that he must give priority to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, which was first made.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would state one fact to the Chair, that exactly the same occurrence took place yesterday on the bill of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HILLIER.] There was a motion submitted to strike out the day at which the session of Congress should commence. Then another gentleman moved to amend the prior part of the bill, by inserting a provision as to when the act should take effect. The previous question was called, and sustained. The question was then taken upon the amendment first offered, and which was to come in at the latter part of the bill. Then the question was taken upon the amendment last offered, and which was to come in at the first part of the bill.

Here the SPEAKER resumed the chair.

The SPEAKER. When the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] first submitted his amendment, as it was to come in at the first or second proposition in the resolution, the Chair did indicate to him, at that moment, and for that reason, that he would entertain it. The Chair afterwards corrected it, and said—no doubt, correctly—that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD,] having been first made, the motion of the gentleman from Virginia was not in order until the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia was disposed of.

Mr. LETCHER. Then the Chair decides now that the previous question cuts off my amendment?

The SPEAKER. It cuts off all amendments.

Mr. LETCHER. Then I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered, that we may get back to my amendment.

Mr. KERR. I move to lay the motion of the gentleman from Virginia upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. How did the gentleman get the floor to make that motion? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. No doubt the gentleman has the right to the floor, because nobody can make a speech, and—

Mr. LETCHER. Not upon a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] moves to lay the motion of the gentleman from Virginia upon the table. Neither motion is debatable, and therefore the gentleman from North Carolina was in order in making his motion.

Mr. LETCHER. I was upon the floor, and made the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman could not retain the floor, because he had no right to debate his motion.

Mr. LETCHER. No right to debate a motion to reconsider?

The SPEAKER. A demand for the previous question is not debatable. The question of reconsidering the main question is not debatable; and the gentleman from North Carolina was in order in moving to lay the motion of the gentleman from Virginia upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. I have no desire to delay the action of the House, or to embarrass the House in any way. I offered the amendment in good faith, and desire to have a vote upon it. I hope the Chair will have my amendment read for the information of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the proposition correctly. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. SEWARD] submitted the amendment which has already passed. Afterwards the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] submitted his amendment, which was to come in at an earlier part of the resolution, and, at the moment, the Chair said he would entertain it. Very soon thereafter, however, the Chair stated that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia was first in order, and, until it was disposed of, the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia was not in order.

Since that time the Chair understands that the House has ordered the main question to be now put. The gentleman from Virginia moves to reconsider the ordering of the main question by the House. That is the proposition under consideration. The gentleman from North Carolina moves to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. I have asked that my amendment may be read to the House, in order that members may know what it is.

The SPEAKER. If it is not objected to, it will be reported to the House.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I object.

The question then being upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, it was put; and the motion was agreed to—ayes eighty-eight, noes not counted.

The question was then upon the passage of the resolution, as amended.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move to lay the resolution upon the table; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken upon Mr. Davis's motion; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Thomas H. Bayly, Barksdale, Barry, Benton, Bocock, Boyce, Caskie, Churchwell, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, John G. Davis, Eddy, Edmundson, Ellison, Ewing, Faulkner, Hamilton, Aaron Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Hendricks, Henu, Gillyer, Houston, Daniel T. Jones, George W. Jones, Kidwell, Letcher, Smith Miller, Millson, Murray, Orr, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Puyear David Ritchie, Ruffin, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, David Stuart, Tracy, and Trout—47.

NAYS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, David J. Bailey, Banks, Belcher, Bell, Benson, Bliss, Brooks, Bugg, Campbell, Carpenter, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Corwin, Crocker, Culloh, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Dowdell, Eastman, Edmonds, Thomas D. Elliot, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Farley, Feuton, Florence, Giddings, Goodrich, Greenwood, Harrison, Hill, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, Roland Jones, Keiti, Kerr, Knox, Lamb, Latham, Lilly, Lindsey, McCulloch, McMullin, Mace, Macy, Matteson, Maxwell, May, Mayall, Middlesworth, Morgan, Nichols, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Peck, Pennington, Powell, Pratt, Preston, Pringle, Ready, Reese, Riddle, Thomas Ritchey, Russell, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Shower, Samuel A. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Vansant, Walker, Walley, Elihu B. Washburne, Wells, Tappan Wentworth, Westbrook, Wheeler, Witte, and Hendrick B. Wright—107.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

[Mr. DE WITT, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following titles; which were signed by the Speaker:

An act to authorize the issue of registers to vessels owned by the Accessory Transit Company; and

A resolution giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance, by Lieutenant M. F. Maury, of the Navy, of a gold medal from his Majesty the King of Sweden.]

Mr. HILLYER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SEWARD. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw the motion.

Mr. HILLYER. I cannot.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the passage of the resolution, upon which the yeas and nays had been demanded.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was then taken; and the resolution was passed.

Mr. WHEELER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and that that motion be laid upon the table.

The later motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by the hands of ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., its Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

S. B. No. 404. An act to authorize the issue of a register to the brig Amelia, by the name of Abby Francis; and

S. B. No. 357. An act for the relief of Urban Stoll.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to have the record corrected with regard to my vote. The other day, when the bill on the subject of postage was under consideration, I voted against laying the first four sections upon the table. At that moment I was called from my seat by a gentleman who desired to communicate with me. On my return the yeas and nays were being called. The question I presumed was on the fifth section of the bill. I voted, as I understood, against laying that section upon the table. By examination of the record, however, it will be seen that the question was on the bill originally introduced by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I desired to vote to lay that bill upon the table, because I was opposed to an increase of the present rate of postage. I ask that the Journal may be corrected.

There was no objection; and the correction was accordingly ordered to be made.

MARY P. FRANCISCO.

On motion by Mr. EDMUNDSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of Mary P. Francisco be withdrawn from the files of the House, for reference to the Pension Office.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I ask unanimous consent for leave to change the reference of two bills now before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LETCHER. I object; and move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. There can be no higher privileged motion than that to adjourn.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to make a correction of the Journal, and hope that the gentleman will withdraw the motion to adjourn, so that I may be allowed to do so.

Mr. LETCHER. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The question arises whether or not the gentleman from Connecticut has not the right to submit his motion, at least, this being the only day during which he can do so; but not to interrupt the House in its disposition to adjourn.

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I find myself recorded as voting against laying upon the table the bill reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I intended to vote, and I believe that I did vote, in favor of laying it upon the table. I wish to have the Journal corrected.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can only effect his object by unanimous consent.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the House will grant it to me.

There was no objection; and the correction was accordingly ordered to be made.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House adjourned (at four o'clock, p. m.) till tomorrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, June 20, 1854.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. WADE presented a memorial of inhabitants of Ohio City, Ohio, praying a reduction of the present rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of Thomas W. Mather, of New York, and William R.

Glover, of Kentucky, merchants trading in Mexico, praying indemnity for property forcibly seized by officials of that Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MASON presented the memorial of John S. Pendleton, praying compensation for services on a special mission to negotiate a treaty with the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, in 1852 and 1853, under instructions received from the President of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. NORRIS presented the memorial of a committee appointed by the corporation of Georgetown, to represent its interests before Congress, praying the erection of a bridge across the Potomac river at the point known as "The Three Sisters," according to the plan of Charles Ellet; which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Also, twenty-three memorials of citizens of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia, and counties of Alexandria, Loudon, and Fairfax, in the State of Virginia, praying the erection of a bridge across the Potomac river, on a site near Georgetown, known as "The Sister Islands;" which were referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DIXON presented a memorial adopted at a meeting of the inhabitants of Louisville, Kentucky, praying a reduction of the present rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DAWSON. I have had placed in my hands the petition of the Friends Aid Society of Washington, District of Columbia. They state that their object is to establish Sunday schools in this District, which has been partially done; and that they desire to establish free day-schools within the limits of the District. They state that they do this with the concurrence of every denomination, there being nothing sectarian at all connected with it. They say they also wish to establish an asylum, providing employment for the idle and instruction for the ignorant; and a house for the protection of females who deserve the interference and support of the better portion of creation, in order to rescue them from certain habits calculated to bring evil upon society. I present the petition, and ask that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. I hope that committee will take it into consideration, and if possible make a report which will carry out these worthy purposes.

The petition was so referred.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky, presented the memorial of Edward D. Tippet, praying that an appropriation may be made to enable him to test the cold water safety steam engine, of which he is the inventor; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SEBASTIAN presented the proceedings of the fourth anniversary of the White River Arkansas Baptist Convention, held in Izard county, Arkansas, in favor of the adoption of measures for securing to American citizens in foreign countries the same degree of religious liberty that is enjoyed by the citizens of those countries emigrating to the United States; which were ordered to lie on the table.

A motion by Mr. SEBASTIAN to print the above proceedings, was referred to the Committee on Printing.

HOOSAC TUNNEL.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I present the memorial of the Troy and Greenfield Railroad Company, a corporation of Massachusetts, which represents that they are engaged in the enterprise of tunneling the Hoosac Mountain, on the air line between Troy and Boston, and on the most direct route between the great West, New England, the British Provinces, and Europe; that this tunnel will advance the value of the public lands by rendering them more accessible, their occupants more prosperous, and their productions more valuable; that it will strengthen the bonds which hold the Union together, and will secure the speedy transmission of the public mails, will facilitate the quick transmission of fresh fish from the sea-coast to the interior, promote intercourse, stimulate commerce, and contribute to the defense of the country. They further represent that this is not merely a State work, for it lies near the junction of three States, Massachusetts, Vermont, and New York, and will facilitate the commerce not only of New England, but of New York, Canada, Pennsylvania, and the West. They conclude, Mr. President, by asking Congress to grant to them, or to the State of Massachusetts, in aid of the tunnel, one million acres of public land, or its equivalent in land scrip, upon such terms as shall seem to Congress just and proper. For precedents in this matter they refer to the liberal grants made by Congress for the canal around the falls of the Ohio; for the canal at the Sault Saint Mary; for removing impediments in the Ohio, Wisconsin, and Mississippi rivers; for the Aroostook and National roads; for artificial harbors and breakwaters, both on the lakes and the sea-board. I ask the reference of this memorial with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Public Lands; and I beg leave especially to commend it to them, as entitled to their best attention, from the eminent worth of the gentlemen from whom it comes, and from the character of the enterprise in which they are interested—an enterprise which, in its very conception, reflects credit upon our age, and which, if accomplished, will constitute an epoch in the achievements of science.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. WALKER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Moren Moore, praying to be allowed the difference between the pensions paid his father and mother, and that to which they were entitled, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Rebecca P. Stansbury and others, children of Thomas Peters, deceased, praying to be allowed an amount of money equal to the pension their father and mother would have been entitled to for the services of the former during the war of the Revolution, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions; which was agreed to.

Mr. TOOMBS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred a report of the Secretary of the Interior, as to the fulfilment, on the part of the Government, of the stipulations of a treaty made with the Pottawatomies on the 26th of October, 1832, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom were referred the following bills from the House of Representatives, reported them back without amendment:

Bill to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota, belonging to the half breeds, or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes; and

Bill to authorize the Secretary of War to settle and adjust the expenses of the Rogue River Indian war.

Mr. JAMES, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, reported a bill to amend the several acts now in force relating to the Patent Office; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the heirs of Stephen Morrell, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill to pay the heirs of Stephen Morrell, deceased, the amount due their father for a pension; which was read, and passed to the second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRODHEAD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives for the relief of Henry Lewis, of Clinton county, Indiana, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims; which was agreed to.

NOTICE OF A BILL.

Mr. SEWARD gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to regulate navigation to the coast of Africa, in vessels owned by citizens of the United States, in certain cases.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MALLORY. I move that the bill for the improvement of the naval service, which was yesterday ordered to its third reading, be now taken up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. Is that bill now open to amendment?

The PRESIDENT. It is not. It has been ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I must submit a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. I think the bill requires some amendment. I think it requires amendment in various particulars. It creates an additional bureau. I see no necessity for that. I am opposed to this provision. Besides, the bill virtually gives the appointment of officers of the Navy to members of Congress, and I doubt whether we have any right to do that. I know some such provision crept into one of the appropriation bills last year, but it was the first of the kind, and I believe it was improper. I think we should retrace our steps in that regard.

Nor is that the only particular in which the bill may need amendment. It certainly requires explanation to my mind. It proposes two retired lists—one to receive one grade of pay, and the other another—one to wear the naval button, the other to be refused that privilege. If I understand it, upon one of them a sort of stigma is to be cast, and that is to be done at the mere discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. Now, sir, I admit the propriety of one list, and it may be that when I hear the explanation I shall feel the force of the proposition to have two; but from all I have as yet heard I am not satisfied that this distinction and discrimination should be made. I think there is danger that injustice may be done by it. Suffering may be occasioned, and for that reason I am disposed, unless I can hear some good reason for it, to reduce the two lists to one. I therefore move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. MALLORY. I am very glad that my friend from Virginia has made these remarks, because they render the explanation which I was prepared to give, more pertinent and proper; and I should dislike to see the bill pass without securing for itself, not only his approbation, but that of every member of the Senate.

The bill comes before this body at so late a period of the session that it is incumbent on the committee to explain the delay, and to show that it has not been un mindful of the important duties devolved upon it. At an early day of the session, as early as February last, it had a conference with the corresponding committee of the House, and with the Secretary of the Navy. The result of that conference was an agreement upon certain important principles, and upon many details of a thorough naval organization. The Senate had, at its previous session, passed a bill for the organization of the Navy, which had gone to the House and was there lost. Expediency, therefore, seemed to dictate, that on this occasion, the bill should emanate from the House; and the able and accomplished chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs there [Mr. BOCCOCK] undertook to bring it forward. Circumstances, however, which I am not able to explain, but which arose, perhaps, as much under the rules of the House as from the pressing character of the business which has so long and earnestly engrossed its attention, have deferred the introduction of that bill until within a day or two; and as yet I have not been able to get a copy of it.

Under these circumstances your committee, unwilling to permit the session to close without an attempt to obtain some legislative action where so much is manifestly necessary, has deemed it proper to bring forward this brief bill, embracing a few provisions, and such only as are deemed of special moment to the service. They have been prepared under the eye and with the aid of the Secretary of the Navy, whose general concurrence in them I feel at liberty to state. They by no means embrace all which the service requires; but I am convinced that much improvement must be the work of time and detail. Among other features which the committees of both Houses regarded as essential, was that of the establishment of the relative rank of the several grades of the service. The committee of the House is in possession of its details, and I trust they will be engrafed upon this bill, believing as I do, that they are generally acceptable, and that they will have a beneficial influence upon the intercourse, and consequently, upon the efficiency of the whole corps. It seems to be no less expedient than just, that the rights and privileges, no less than the duties, of every officer should be clearly defined.

Though many important additions might be made to this bill, the committee did not suppose that it contained a single provision liable to serious objection. It aims only at the improvement of the personnel of the service; and depend upon it, sir, that if the present state of things is permitted to continue—while the naval Powers of the Old World are straining every nerve to attain the highest state of naval efficiency—we may build and equip the finest ships that float, but the time will come when their guns will but serve to salute the triumphs of their adversaries. Sir, I will not occupy the time of the Senate with remarks of my own upon the policy and national importance of sustaining and fostering this great branch of the public service; but it may not be unprofitable to recur to the counsels which the fathers of the Republic have solemnly and impressively left us, under circumstances which give them peculiar interest. Washington, in his eighth annual message, in reference to the Navy, says:

"To an active external commerce, the protection of a naval force is indispensable. This is manifest with regard to wars in which a State itself is a party. But, besides this, it is in our own experience that the most sincere neutrality is not a sufficient guard against the depredations of nations at war. To secure respect to a neutral flag requires a naval force, organized and ready to vindicate it from insult and aggression. This may prevent even the necessity of going to war, by discouraging belligerent powers from committing such violations of the rights of the neutral party as may first or last leave no other option. These considerations invite the United States to look to means, and to set about the gradual increase of a Navy. Will it not, then, be advisable to begin, without delay, to provide and lay up the materials for the building and equipping of ships of war, and to proceed in the work by degrees, in proportion as our resources shall render it practicable without inconvenience, so that a future war of Europe may not find our commerce in the same unfortunate state in which it was found by the present?"

General Jackson, in his memorable farewell address, speaking upon the same subject, says:

"But no nation, however desirous of peace, can hope to escape collisions with other Powers; and the soundest dictates of policy require that we should place ourselves in a condition to assert our rights, if a resort to force should ever become necessary. Our local situation, our long line of sea-coast, indented by numerous bays, with deep rivers opening into the interior, as well as our extended and still increasing commerce, point to the Navy as our natural means of defense. It will, in the end, be found to be the cheapest and most effectual; and now is the time, in the season of peace, and with an overflowing revenue, that we can, year after year, add to its strength, without increasing the burdens of the people. It is your true policy. For your Navy will not only protect your rich and flourishing commerce in distant seas, but enable you to reach and annoy the enemy, and will give to defense its greatest efficiency by meeting danger at a distance from home. It is impossible, by any line of fortifications, to guard every point from attack against a hostile force advancing from the ocean and selecting its object, but they are indispensable to protect cities from bombardment; dock yards and navy arsenals from destruction; to give shelter to merchant vessels in time of war, and to single ships or weaker squadrons when pressed by superior force."

Such, sir, were the views of these illustrious men; and let us see how the actual condition of our naval service accords with them.

Naval strength, (or weakness,) from the character and design of the service, is altogether relative, and must ever be measured by that of its probable adversaries; and in determining what the condition and strength of our service should be, we have first to ascertain those of the only naval Powers whose ability to contend with us upon the sea is unquestioned.

Perhaps the following comparative view may best illustrate the relative force of our Navy in 1846, (see Sen. Doc. 187, 20th Cong., 1st sess.,) before the three great Powers of Europe had put in commission many of their ships, which have since been sent to sea:

Great Britain, for every 100,000 tons of commerce, had	adroit and efficient.....	588 guns.
France had.....	1,063 "
Russia.....	2,466 "
And the United States had but.....	97 "

The British Navy has at no period been so formidable as at this moment, as will appear from a glance at Steel's list of the Royal Navy for 1853. It is stated at 545 effective ships, mounting 13,754 guns, many of them of the heaviest character.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 92.

The list of screw steamers gives: 2 of 120 guns; 1 of 101 guns; 5 of 90 guns; 2 of 80 guns; 8 of 50 to 70 guns; 6 of 21 to 40 guns.

The screw steamers in course of completion were: 3 of 100 to 120 guns; 6 of 90 guns; 3 of 80 guns; 1 of 50 guns.

The application of the screw to the ordinary ship of the line, giving her an auxiliary speed of from four to seven knots, is the salient improvement where the British have excelled the French. Even while we are writing, we learn that the Cressy, a ninety-gun ship of the Baltic fleet, was driven from her moorings, and only saved from going ashore on the Swedish coast by her screw.

Some idea of the formidable character of the British Navy may be obtained by a glance at the following force, which sailed from Spithead on the 11th of April last, and which constitutes only the first division of the Baltic fleet:

I will not institute a comparison between our naval force and those of the maritime Powers of Europe. I design only to state enough to show that the subject is fruitful in suggestions of the gravest national consequence. It is not our interest, it has never been our policy to maintain an expensive naval establishment; but I submit to the consideration of this body, whether the condition of the Navy, as disclosed by the Secretary's late report, is adequate to the wants, or consistent with the honor and character, of the country. But, sir, in rising upon this occasion to speak for the Navy, I designed not to refer at any length to its ships, its ordnance, or any of its material; for legislation upon these points is not contemplated by the bill; but I came here to speak of its soul, its spirit, by which the service moves and has its being; and for these—for the men who sustain your flag, and represent your spirit upon the sea, who hold their lives in their hands whenever her interests or the honor of their country demand their sacrifice: who, from Decatur, Somers, Wadsworth, and Israel, to Stewart, Stockton, Morris, and Ingraham, have identified themselves with your growth, your glory, and your greatness—for these sir, in behalf of the committee, do I invoke your action.

And, sir, disposed, as this body ever is, to be just, nay, to be generous, I know that I have but to direct your attention to the Navy, to secure for it your cheering and sustaining hand. In doing so, then, sir, let me briefly remind you that, though inseparably connected, as it is, with national character, national rights, and even national greatness, disclosing, as it does, so many heroic deeds and memorable examples of devotion to country, it has received less attention from the fostering legislation of Congress than any other branch of the public service.

Let me remind you, sir, that the gallant spirits who composed our Navy at the beginning of the present century, curbed the barbarous princes of Northern Africa, compelled them to respect our flag and its commerce, abolished the tribute, planted the stars and stripes for the first time upon a fortress of the Old World, and drew from the then existing Pope the declaration that infant America had done more for Christianity in one year than Europe had done in a century. And let me remind you, too, sir, that our Navy, feeble in ships, arms, and men; feeble as it was in every thing but character, courage, discipline, and devotion, was the first that ever dispelled the charm of British invincibility upon the sea, and taught their country the fact—a fact whose moral power transcends all armies and navies—that in an equal contest with any people upon earth the honor of our flag might safely be intrusted to the Navy.

Sir, in one hour after his official notice of the declaration of the war of the 18th of June, 1812, Commodore Rodgers, with his squadron at New York, was under weigh. With his own hand he fired the first gun of the war, which, ominous of success, struck the enemy, and the triumphs which followed in quick succession not only cheered and animated our own people, and awakened a public spirit of confidence and enthusiasm hitherto unknown, but did more to elevate our character abroad and enforce respect to our just pretensions than we can now readily understand. No single combat on land or sea ever produced happier results to a just cause than did the action between the Constitution and Guerrier.

Our inability to cope with Britain upon the sea had been regarded as an axiom that it was folly to question. It was commonly said that France built and equipped ships and sent them to sea only to fall into the hands of England, and that we should profit by her example; and hence we see that from the reduction of the Navy in 1801 to the war of 1812, during which period scarcely a day passed without some insolent violation of our neutral rights, not a single frigate was added to our Navy; and it is questionable whether it was as efficient as it had been in the Tripolitan war.

It seems that the Administration relied but little upon it in the contemplated struggle with Great Britain; for when war was declared, not only were our few ships so scattered as to be unable to act promptly and vigorously against the enemies' commerce before it should have had knowledge of hostilities, but there can be little doubt that it had determined to dismantle our ships and retain them in port, and that this policy was only averted by the interposition and earnest arguments and representations of two naval officers.* Happy was it for the country, sir, that this policy was averted; for had our ships—instead of that bold and dashing career upon the sea which won the admiration even of their gallant foes—been ignominiously dismantled and moored under the guns of our forts, and suffered to rot in cowardly inaction, the moral power awakened by its achievements, and the vast resources of our country as a naval power, might still have remained undeveloped.

Sir, some of the naval men who figured in your Tripolitan war, and in the war of 1812, still adorn the service, linking it with its past glories, and their own deeds and renown; men who, to all that forms the skillful, bold, and finished seamen, unite rare capacity and judgement, ripened, but unimpaired by years; men upon whose acknowledged ability and courage the country would instantly call in any naval emergency.

Sir, such men make themselves the property of the nation; and I feel that in my place here, I can speak as justly as I can impartially of Stewart and of Morris, having never seen the one, and having but slight personal acquaintance with the other, and looking at our public records alone. To Stewart's personal and earnest intercession with the American Cabinet in 1812, no less than to his brilliant courage and matchless coolness during the war—more than to any living man—do we, in my judgment, owe the character which the service won; and whether we regard Morris in a hand-to-hand struggle with the Tripolitan gunboats, or as one of the forlorn hope so gallantly led by Decatur, and the first to reach the deck of the Philadelphia, or as the Executive officer of the Constitution, who, in her memorable action with the Guerrier, lashed the enemy's ship to his own, we cannot but regard him as a man whose rare merit has enabled him to carve out of every responsibility devolved upon him, an honor for his country, and a leaf upon her records for his own fame. And who does not see with pleasure these men still maintaining their places at the head of their profession, performing its active duties with warm hearts, zealous industry, and unclouded intellects?

In this brief mention of these gentlemen I trust it is unnecessary for me to disclaim any invidious discrimination against others. I cite them not exceptions to, but rather as types of, those gallant spirits who freely shed their blood to sustain the honor of the country in the war of 1812, while thousands of their countrymen, in security at home, were denouncing it.

Sir, we cannot, at this day, review the declaration of war of 1812 without regarding it as one of the most heroic acts of any age. We made it against greater odds, infinitely greater odds, than opposed Napoleon when Europe was arrayed in arms against him; when our foe had annihilated his gigantic navies; when Duncan at Camperdown; Howe on the 1st of June, 1794; Nelson at the Nile; Cochran in Basque Roads; Parker at Copenhagen, and Nelson again at Trafalgar, had filled the world with Britain's fame, and united its belief in her invincibility. The naval flags of Europe were at her feet; she emphatically "ruled the waves," and her post captains were the high constables of the deep. Against such a foe, and in the exultant hour of her unexampled triumph, our naval men sallied out upon the sea to strike for its freedom. They went out, as Mr. Rush has expressed it, with but a sling in their hands. And well did they demean themselves in the unequal struggle. In all latitudes, at all times and places they sought the enemy. Traversing the East and West Indies, the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, and even the British channel, they not only captured or destroyed thousands of her merchant tonnage, but some of her ablest captains in her finest ships, in equal combat, lowered to the stars and stripes of the untired Republic that banner which Britain proudly boasted had braved unconquered, for a thousand years, "the battle and the breeze."

It is difficult, as I have said, at this distant day, to comprehend fully the bearing of such a naval career upon our national character. While our own people, with one universal acclamation hailed it with surprised and exultant gratitude, Europe—that Europe whose cause we were also sustaining, and which had gazed with folded arms upon the unequal contest, anticipating our destruction—yielded its astonishment and admiration. Even Great Britain, when she found her merchants complaining of the countless tons of shipping destroyed or captured, her insurance policies commanding exorbitant premiums, her West India trade cut up, her wharves nearly annihilated, and her ships of war sunk in equal contest, no longer spoke, through her public prints, of our "boards nailed together for ships, sailing under a bit of striped bunting;" but with that noble instinct which ever impels the Briton's heart to do justice to the courage and conduct of a gallant foe who stands squarely up to the fight, she too confessed and admired the true character of our Navy, finding some balm for her wounded pride in the declaration that if she had sustained defeat, it took her own children to accomplish it.

From the war of 1812 to the present moment, there is no sea on the globe visited by our commerce, that has not witnessed the services of our naval officers in the protection of the life and property of our people. Educated and trained for war, still their noblest conquests are achieved in times of peace; and as pacificators, negotiators of treaties, and protectors of our citizens and commerce in distant seas, our naval men are constantly called upon to perform duties of national moment. Every American naval officer of rank who has performed his due routine of sea service, I will undertake to say, could furnish from his own experience, instances of the kind alluded to, many of which are of public notoriety, and others are only known to the files of the State or Navy Department. Commodore McCauley, at Valparaiso; in 1851; Commodore Downs, at Qualla Batou; Commodore Jones, at the Sandwich Islands; Commodore Reid, at Canton, in 1839, when the American and other foreign residents were barricaded in their houses, amidst a general popular tumult, and all intercourse and trade with the Chinese were suspended; and Commander Glynn, at Japan, in the recovery of fifteen American seamen from long and painful captivity—all rendered important services, which were acknowledged by the country at the time. And, sir, at this very moment, intelligence is reaching us that another energetic officer, in the execution of a most important and peaceful mission, has impressed our national character upon the rulers of Japan, and opened to American enterprise a trade for which the Old World has vainly struggled for two centuries.

I have deemed it but just to the Navy to advert, even though thus briefly, at its great public services, and its important agency in creating and maintaining our national character. But, sir, let me here state what must be evident to all who will look at its past history, that not only the maintenance of the character and esprit du corps of the Navy, but its mere existence has been due, not so much to our legislation as to the Navy itself. Though the war of 1812 was declared in June, so little confidence had Congress in the ability of the Navy to sustain itself, that nothing of moment was done for it throughout the year; and from that day to the present hour it has always been found necessary for naval men to demonstrate, from fact to fact, its ability to maintain the honor of the country, and to apply the means intrusted to it properly, before Congress would confide to it the necessary means.

Ready as we have been to legislate, and sometimes to legislate unduly, for all other important public interests, the Navy seems to have escaped our attention; and the consequence is, that, with a corps of officers greater in number and eminently superior in mental training and culture to those of the war of 1812, and fully equal to them in zealous devotion to the flag, our Navy is far less efficient at this moment, in comparison with those of Great Britain and France, than it was to the Navy of Great Britain at the close of that war.

In saying this, I do not refer to our ships, nor to officers or men as individuals, but to the corps as an organization. Our ships, our ordnance, and our naval officers, as individuals, are equal to any upon earth; but Congress has failed to array and organize these elements in the most judicious and efficient manner. I will now, sir, briefly state the provisions of the bill reported by the committee, and the objects which they are designed and expected to accomplish; and in doing so, I will frankly say, in the first place, that, though it reduces the aggregate number of officers now in the grades of captains and commanders by seven, the committee does not deem it expedient to reduce the higher grades beyond this.

Complaints, based, perhaps, upon a partial knowledge of the Navy, are frequently made, that a certain number of these officers is always to be found unemployed on shore; and it is contended that this number, be it what it may, is superfluous, and should be dispensed with. In reply to this, it may be said that a naval officer on a three years' cruise, not only does duty every day and night of those three years, but that throughout this period, he is separated from his country, his home and his family; and that it is not only just to the officer, but it is wise and just for the country, that at the termination of his cruise, he should have relaxation from duty. A military profession which implies constant absence from country, and precludes the holiest affections which cluster around the heart, must be unworthy the ambition of honorable minds.

The true interests of the Republic, looking alone at the greatest efficiency of the officer, require that he should, in common with her citizens, nourish the ties which cling around the family altar, and feel, upon whatever distant sea or service he may be, that his home and his affections are in his own loved land, and that like a fettered prisoner, however far he roams, he can but drag a greater length of chain. Teach your naval officer, sir, that he cannot wander so far but that sympathizing hearts and watchful eyes are tracing his track upon the deep; teach him that when he strikes, not only the honor of his flag and the interests of his country, but the welfare, nay, perhaps, the liberties, of wife, children, and friends are in every blow, and you will have done all that human wisdom can do to render him invincible. This I deem sufficient in refutation of a position which would result, if adopted, in reducing the naval officer to the condition of a wandering Arab.

The first section creates the grade of flag officer, and limits its number to twenty. The propriety of this measure is apparent to every Senator who has given much attention to the intercourse of our naval men with those of foreign services; and who will not hesitate to acknowledge that their usefulness must always be more or less modified by their ability to mingle with and meet them upon equal terms in all official intercourse. Foreign services have several grades, higher in official rank than our grade of captain, each of which has its appropriate flag, designation, rights, and privileges; and although an American captain, in command of a squadron, holds a position equivalent to that of a British, French, Russian, Dutch, or Spanish admiral—for it is the highest grade known to his service—still it is ever found difficult, and often impossible, to obtain a recognition of such equality in those particulars, which a military officer is not permitted to disregard; and painful embarrassments, really impairing the usefulness of the service, have been, and must continue to be, the frequent result.

We are all familiar with the nautical title of commodore; a title which is unrecognized by law, and which we have borrowed from the British service, where it is applied to temporary commands only, and never signifies more than a captain temporarily in command of more than his single ship.

The designation of flag officer, it is believed, will obviate all uncertainty and embarrassment, and convey to foreign services the idea of a grade equivalent to the highest of their own.

The second section of the bill, the one to which the honorable Senator from Virginia has adverted, provides for the appointment of midshipmen. I will say here, Mr. President, in explanation, that in 1842, if I remember correctly, midshipmen were regularly distributed among the congressional districts of the United States. That is, it was directed that they should be taken from each district, in rotation, as justly as possible, as appointees to the Academy might be wanted. This went on for sometime, until the members of the House of Representatives finding, as they supposed, or as I understood they supposed, that Congress, in giving the appointments of midshipmen to the districts, designed that they should be made upon the recommendation of the Representative from the district, tacked on to an appropriation bill, a provision that when a midshipman went to the Academy, he should go there upon the recommendation of the Representative of the district only.

I, among others, disapproved that provision at the time. I did not believe that the power of appointment to the Academy could rightfully be taken from the Executive. I do not believe it now. But it seems that a large majority in the House of Representatives favors this state of things; and upon reflection I have considered that, as the Representative of the district is the organ through which its people may best make their wishes known, we have a chance, perhaps, of getting a better class of youths in the service by permitting the Representatives to appoint them than we should have if the appointment were intrusted to the Executive patronage at large. It multiplies watchfulness and the means of getting a better cadet from each congressional district; and, sir, the rule has worked sometimes in this way: In some particular district the son of indigent parents displays peculiar precocity; he becomes distinguished by studious habits, and gives evidence of aptitude for sea service. A generous community comes forward and unanimously gives up its preference for others, and asks the appointment for that youth to the Naval Academy. Under ordinary circumstances such a youth would not be chosen. He would have scarcely a chance of going to the Academy when political interests constitute the only element by which he could approach the Executive power. Thus, under the working of this clause in the appropriation bill, I have no doubt the Academy is much better supplied with the requisite talent than it otherwise would be. This bill proposes an amendment to this manner of appointment. We find that, in the present condition of the Navy, there are too many midshipmen; the Academy is becoming crowded, and in a short time they will have to be reduced to perhaps half their present number.

This amendment does not, as the Senator from Virginia supposes, confer the appointment of the officers on Congress, but it gives to Senators a voice in the selection of some of the midshipmen from their respective States. It reduces the appointment of midshipmen from two in each congressional district to one, and then provides for the appointment of two from each State, upon the recommendation of the Senators from that State respectively. This was supposed by the committee to introduce a just modification of the present system of appointment. I have no expectation that the House will ever recede from its position, though I trust it may agree to this modification.

I will now, sir, reply to the objection made by my honorable friend from Virginia to the provision for two retired lists; and first let me say, sir, that I regard all legislation for the Navy, without a retired list, as radically wrong. All improvement in the service must date from this important feature; and in advancing this opinion, which is the result of some reflection and observation, I believe that I but express the convictions of the great majority of your efficient officers. In fact, I have never yet heard an officer express a dissenting opinion upon this point.

The naval services of Europe all provide and sustain retired lists; and the British Naval Register for February, 1854, gives, besides the two thousand one hundred sea officers, from admirals to lieutenants inclusive, the following list of inactive officers:

Reserved admirals.....	48
Retired admirals.....	119
Retired captains.....	226
Retired commanders.....	507
Retired lieutenants.....	737

Total.....1,727

The mighty ocean castles which our officers control, constructed as they are of variant materials, of unequal strength and durability, require frequent examination and repair to preserve them in the highest condition of efficiency; and thus the personnel of the Navy, composed as it is of every variety of mind, character, and qualification, modified by age, experience, length of service, and physical ability, requires thorough scrutiny to discriminate between the useful and the worthless; and this scrutiny must be instituted periodically, or as circumstances may dictate.

I am aware, sir, that there are those who oppose the retirement of naval or military officers upon pay, in all and every form; those who would tax the brains and the sinews of their fellows for a bare subsistence, just as long as the limited powers of nature would enable them to be worked, and, when worn out, and no longer able to labor for the country, or to sustain themselves, turn them adrift to beg or starve. I envy not the humanity, the justice, of any gentleman entertaining such views. If practiced upon, it is easy to foresee the effects upon the Navy, and to understand the class of men who would seek to wear its livery. The faithful devotion of youth, manhood, and all the useful years of life to his country's service for a mere support, deprived of the opportunity of providing for his declining years, imposes upon the country the duty of sustaining the old age of the naval servant.

But, sir, my friend from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] desires me to explain why the bill provides for the permanent furlough, as well as for the retirement of officers; and he fears that men placed upon the former may be regarded as having a slight cast upon them. The motive of the committee in framing this provision, was to draw a distinct line of demarcation between the gallant old seaman whose soul is still in his profession, whose heart beats but for his country, but who, by long, faithful, and honorable service, or by wounds or disease contracted in the active discharge of his duty, is disqualified for further service, and the man who has uniformly and ingeniously contrived to evade his sea duties, and devolved them upon others; who has succeeded by political influence, or other resorts to which his noble profession should be a stranger, in passing the best of his days upon shore; the man, in short, who has become unserviceable from his own unworthy conduct, or who never had any merit.

I concede to the Senator from Virginia that placing an officer upon permanent furlough would be a slight; and I maintain that the country should not place the two classes of men to which I have thus adverted upon the same level in her public estimation; and I trust that my friend will recognize the distinction, and the necessity of preserving it.

The necessity for retiring officers will appear with much force from an examination of our Naval Register, where so many of the older officers are shown to be unemployed on shore, receiving large pay, while their juniors are performing their appropriate duties afloat upon less pay. A principle which should never be lost sight of is, that as the importance, the hazard, and responsibilities of naval enterprises increase, the chances of obtaining the necessary talent, energy, character, and ability, should also increase. But our system produces results the very opposite; and the longer a man has been in the service, the more do his chances for such commands increase. I do not wish to be understood as indicating that inability to command is the necessary consequence of age; for I conscientiously believe that we have old post captains who would adorn any service, and who are equal to any naval emergency; and that we have lieutenants who could hardly put a ship in stays, or conduct her routine of duty twenty-four hours.

I regard seniority of rank as the only and the rightful element in naval promotion; and Heaven forbid that, under our institutions, I should ever see this principle surrendered; but, in saying this, I say, at the same time, that the Navy should be rigidly and frequently scrutinized, and that retirement and the Executive's power to furlough and dismiss must be promptly used, to the end that every commissioned officer shall be fully competent for all and every duty which the country may devolve upon him.

The services of Europe promote not alone by seniority; but family, rank, connection, wealth, or favoritism, are permitted to have their due influence; and a youth of small experience not unfrequently commands the veteran officer whose life has been passed upon the sea in all its perils and vicissitudes. Suppose we attempt to introduce "merit" as an element of promotion, who is to judge of merit? It must be dependent upon the judgment of those having the power to promote; and this judgment, in a Government like ours, will be too often guided by the character of the political microscope through which merit may be scanned. Why, sir, do we not profess to fill our multitudinous offices by the claims of merit? And do we not too often see dullness and stupidity, vice and imbecility, occupying public places? We are all meritorious men, sir, quite enough so for promotion. I am not aware that seniority of rank, as the sole element of promotion, has ever been departed from, except in the two instances of Decatur and Morris; and these, though in reward of the conspicuous gallantry of the men, have ever been considered of doubtful propriety.

Instances of personal gallantry, or conduct especially conspicuous in the face of an enemy or otherwise, where every member of the corps is equally ready and anxious to gain a laurel, are frequently rather the result of accident than of merit. I would reward an officer who thus renders himself conspicuous, and such has been the policy of the Government; but I would not promote him over the heads of his less fortunate peers, to whom the chances of war have denied a golden opportunity.

At this time we have sixty-eight captains, the youngest of whom is fifty-six years of age; ninety-seven commanders, seventy-four of whom are between fifty and fifty-five, and the youngest of whom is forty-six; three hundred and twenty-seven lieutenants, from thirty to fifty; one hundred and ninety-eight passed midshipmen, from twenty-one to thirty-seven years of age; and after carefully examining the rates of promotion in the several grades, and the average age of officers, we find that, under the present system, lieutenants, when promoted to commanders, will be fifty-three, and commanders, when promoted to captains, seventy-four years of age.

The second section secures an act of justice to the passed midshipmen by providing a commission and increased pay. Their present pay, which was barely sufficient for their support when established, is now, under the great increase of all the expenses of living, wholly inadequate; and many of them have families to maintain upon it. Among other means designed to promote the esprit du corps and efficiency of the Navy, a provision is introduced for rewarding naval seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys with extra pay, and the petty officers with extra pay and a medal, for good conduct; and the Academy is opened to the naval boy whose conduct and character may entitle him to the distinction.

I am anxious to conclude these remarks, sir, to enable my friend from Alabama, who has the floor, to proceed; but before doing so, I deem it but an act of justice to a young officer of the most distinguished merit, Lieutenant Dahlgren, to say, that under his zealous and scientific researches and attention, our naval ordnance at this time is unsurpassed by any in the world; a fact which gentlemen may satisfy themselves of by a visit to his station at this navy-yard.

I desire, sir, to append to these remarks a paper which I will not occupy your time by reading, but which is an official explanation, of the correctness of which I feel satisfied, of the circumstances under which the brig Perry sailed from the United States, the vessel alluded to in the first draft of the Naval Committee's report. It is due to the present chief of the Bureau of Ordnance to say that he was in no wise responsible for the circumstance, which occurred before he assumed charge of it. The account, as given in the committee's report, was from an officer of the Navy in every respect reliable, but whose subsequent account is modified by more detailed information.*

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the bill will be permitted to go over until to-morrow. We cannot dispose of it to-day. The hour has arrived at which the special order comes up, on which the Senator from Alabama [Mr. Clay] has the floor.

Mr. BADGER. I would suggest to the Senator from Florida, that I think it would be better to let the question be taken on the motion to reconsider the vote ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading. I make this suggestion the more readily because I am a friend of the bill, and wish it to pass.

Mr. MALLORY. I have no objection to that,

*The vessel referred to in the paragraph of the first draft of report of the Naval Committee of the Senate, as having been sent to sea with thirty-two pounder guns and forty-two pounder shot, was the brig Perry, carrying thirty-two pounder guns and carronades.

This vessel sailed from Norfolk for Chagres in May, 1846, (when Mr. Bancroft was Secretary of the Navy, and Commodore A. S. Wadsworth chief of the Bureau of Ordnance,) with a bearer of dispatches communicating to the squadron in the Pacific the existence of war with Mexico. She was fitted out under an order from the Navy Department to be ready to sail the day after the receipt of the order; and, in compliance with that order, did receive on board all her shot, powder, provisions, and other stores, and hauled into the stream the day after its receipt. She, however, received on board two thirty-two pounder carronades the day after. Immediately after getting to sea, all her guns were loaded, and in doing this a very few shot were found rather too large; but this fact was not considered sufficiently important to require any general examination of the shot, or any official report, and no difficulty occurred with the shot at any other time during the cruise.

After landing the bearer of dispatches at Chagres, the Perry visited Port Royal, in Jamaica, for the purpose of filling up her water before joining our squadron off Vera Cruz, and not with any reference whatever to the condition of her shot. During her stay there, the commander of the Perry availed himself of the offers liberally made, to obtain a small number of additional shot to meet any possible wants.

These appear to be all the material facts connected with this subject, and are derived from the files of the Department, the log of the Perry, and the recollections of the commander.

but I ask my friend from Virginia, whether his objection to the bill, in view of the explanation I have given in answer to it, still remains in his mind?

Mr. HUNTER. I am not satisfied in regard to it. I should like to have a chance to make some motion to amend the bill. I think it requires amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The question is on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

Mr. BADGER. Let that motion be agreed to by unanimous consent.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The further consideration of the bill was then postponed until to-morrow.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKEAN, Chief Clerk, stating that the House had passed a bill to change the day of the annual assembling of Congress.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed sundry enrolled bills.

INDIGENT INSANE BILL VETO.

On the motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of the indigent insane persons, which had been returned by the President of the United States with his objections.

Mr. CLAY addressed the Senate at considerable length upon the subject of the Presidential veto. [See Appendix for his speech.]

Mr. TOUCEY. I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I hope we shall go on to-day with this bill. If we are ever to dispose of this question we ought to spend more than an hour a day upon it.

Mr. HUNTER. It has been postponed for other gentlemen. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Toucey] desires to speak on it to-morrow, and I hope it will be postponed for him.

Mr. BELL. I hope this bill will be postponed. We are every day discussing, while it is under consideration, principles which relate to other bills behind this, as, for example, the 'homestead bill. I take it that whatever discussion is had now upon points involved in this question will apply to that; so that, in fact, by continuing this subject we are not materially postponing other measures. I trust the Senate will agree to the motion of the honorable Senator from Connecticut, and give him time to speak to-morrow.

Mr. STUART. I do not make objection because I wish to interfere with the courtesy due to a Senator. I simply wish to have this question proceeded with to-day. If the Senator from Connecticut is not ready to go on with his remarks now, some other gentleman undoubtedly is. I submit, too, that the question ought to be disposed of. It consumes the whole time of the Senate. We hear a speech of half an hour, or three quarters of an hour, or an hour upon it, and then adjourn from day to day. There is other business before the Senate that ought to be disposed of, and in order to reach it we should get rid of this.

Mr. TOUCEY. If any other gentleman desires to address the Senate now, I will yield.

Mr. CASS. It is rarely that the Senator from Connecticut makes known his sentiments to the Senate, and still more rarely that he asks a courtesy. I for one am not only willing but anxious, that he should have an opportunity of presenting his views upon this question, whilst at the same time I am as desirous as my colleague to bring the discussion to an end. If any Senator is ready to go on now, I trust he will be permitted to do so; but if not I hope we shall accede to the proposition of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. TOUCEY. If there is an indisposition on the part of any gentleman in the Senate to have the subject postponed, I will proceed to-day, and say now to the Senate what I wish to say.

Several SENATORS. I hope not.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the subject will be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. TOUCEY. I will not be involved in any question with any gentleman with regard to the propriety of postponing any business before the Senate. I regret, sir, that it has fallen to my lot to address the Senate at so late a period in this debate, and at so late an hour in the day; but I have to perform a duty—one that I regard as an urgent duty, and which I cannot permit myself to forego—

Mr. MASON. I submit to the honorable Senator that he had better not proceed now. It is against the usage of the Senate, and that usage ought to be preserved. There is now an abundance of other subjects before the Senate that can be brought up. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President, this is a very fit occasion to make a few observations in relation to the manner in which we dispose of the public time. The Senate of the United States is not a debating body, as we all know. Now, it seems we are to have the usage of the Senate established as the custom of the country. What is that usage? A separate day is taken for every gentleman in the Senate, who chooses to do so, to deliver his views upon a subject. When one is done, another rises and makes a motion to postpone the further consideration of the pending subject, and some other gentleman says, "I hope the subject will be postponed till to-morrow;" and so it goes on. Sir, I intend to vote for this postponement, because I think it would be unkind to my friend from Connecticut, under the circumstances, not to do so; but I fear we shall go on in this way, and we shall never hear any discussion on any single point, but shall have presented to us general views upon the Constitution of the country; and when the people read the whole of the arguments connected with the discussion of any question, they can come to no conclusion, for it will take them hours to read two speeches, between which there is scarcely any conflict. They are presented in such a manner that it is very difficult for the people to ascertain the points of difference between us. But if we had a running debate, the case would be different. Then a Senator, with the powerful mind of the Senator from Connecticut, could rise up at once and reply or add to the speech of the Senator from Alabama as he chose. The public mind would see what we were at; as soon as he got through, gentlemen anxious to meet him, on the points he wished to present to the country, would rise and go on. That is not the case now. As things are now conducted, speeches here are essays. I have had something like eighty essays upon the Nebraska and Kansas bill laid on my table. I can hardly find discussion between any two members of the House of Representatives, or the Senate, upon a single point involved in it. I have had to read through a number of pages to ascertain the character of the speeches, and I found they covered the whole subject of power over the Territories, the Constitution of the United States, and the nature of the Government generally.

Now, sir, for one, I know I have not the capacity to write these long speeches, and make these constitutional arguments, and quote from every speech delivered from the foundation of the Government to the present time. I want to be taught. I wish to see the Senate act from principle, and discuss the questions before them. I want to prevent, if I possibly can, this body being turned into a mere machine by which periodicals are to go out to the country. I know of six gentlemen, I think, who desire to express their views upon this subject. Each one of them will consider himself as not having occupied as full a share of the attention of the body, and as profound a position as others, if you do not give him a day. How many more may spring up I do not know. Then, when will you end the debate? Now, we are in the 20th day of the month of June, and we have passed, as yet very few bills of importance. What is the reason? It is because of the kind of discussion into which we have fallen. When we have heard a speech, a motion is instantly made to adjourn, or to postpone; and we have a very good way of getting out of the responsibility of an adjournment before the country, by moving to go into an Executive session, and then closing the doors, and very soon going out of Executive session into the Avenue.

I make these observations with no purpose in the world to complain, but merely for the purpose of bringing ourselves to the true grounds which we occupy, and which the country should understand. All the fault grows out of the fact that we do not debate the questions which are before us, but write essays upon them.

Mr. MASON. I will suggest to the Senator from Georgia, that there is a very attractive subject which is lying upon our tables, one upon which I am sure there will be a running debate and a running debate only. It is the interesting question as to when we shall meet hereafter. We received a short time ago a bill from the House of Representatives relating to that subject, and we have a bill of our own of a similar nature. I will therefore, with his permission, if the Senate will pass over the present subject, call up that bill, and we can have a running debate on it.

Mr. DAWSON. Very well; let us have a running debate.

Mr. RUSK. I think, Mr. President, that it is proper to pursue the usual course of the Senate; but it does not follow that we need waste time by doing so. I have had an experience of a few years here, and I believe nearly as much time has been consumed by gentlemen delivering their views as to how time was to be saved, and the business to be done promptly, as we have in the long discussions, which I admit are perhaps too long; but that is a matter of taste, and if it be an evil it is one which will correct itself. As soon as the people of the country are not satisfied with reading what the Senator from Georgia chooses to designate as essays, that soon they will pay no attention to them, and then the evil will correct itself, and we can go on with the running debates which he desires. It seems to me that we have spent just about as much time in debating propositions to save time and do business quickly, as we have in listening to long speeches.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, after having been indulged by the Senate with an opportunity of delivering my own views on this question, I certainly shall not insist upon compelling any gentleman to address the Senate when he is not entirely ready; but some of us feel an anxiety to have the homestead bill taken up, and I simply wish to say now to the Senate that, if there is a proposition to-morrow, or at any subsequent day to postpone the further consideration of this bill, I shall insist on taking up the homestead bill and discussing that. I know there are a number of gentlemen who desire to be heard upon that question. I wish to be heard myself; and I would as soon speak in the evening as at any other time. I would perhaps do so now, if I were prepared to go on to-day. To-morrow I will be prepared; and if the postponement of this question is then further insisted upon, I will call for the consideration of the homestead bill, and make my speech on that.

Mr. WALKER. Can we not now come to some understanding among ourselves as to when we shall take the vote on the bill under consideration? I feel very anxious that we should have some understanding on the subject, that we may know when it is to be decided. The custom of the Senate has been spoken of by the Senator from Virginia. I think it has become equally a custom in the Senate that we never do come to any determination upon an important matter without "sitting it out," as it is termed. Now, for one, I am prepared to fix any early period when we shall take the vote on this bill. I am willing, with others, to sit it out and obtain a vote. I am willing to do so to-day, if others are, or I should be willing to to-morrow or any other time.

Sir, like the Senator from Mississippi, I am anxious to take up the homestead bill, and have that discussed—to have either a running debate or set speeches upon it, I do not care which—and as soon as we get out a reasonable quantity of that commodity, I hope we shall sit that bill out and dispose of it. I trust an early day may be fixed when we may take a vote on this bill, and get it out of the way. I believe it is not anticipated that it will be passed. This discussion, therefore, is all unprofitable. It is to no practical end. We may take the vote sooner or later and not pass the bill. There cannot be found in the Senate a constitutional majority for it. The debate upon it is simply for the sake of debate, whilst the homestead bill, or the bill mentioned by the Senator from Virginia, has in it something practical.

I merely make these observations that we may, if we can, individually, and at last collectively, come to a conclusion that we shall end the debate upon this bill at some time, and at an early period, and that we may then take up something of practical utility and importance.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, this is a very interesting question. It is exactly of that class of questions which the honorable Senator from Georgia suggests as the most proper ones to exercise the talents and powers of the members of this House, and it is one upon which all members ought always to be ready, and I call him now into this race which he has got up. I call him up. I want to see him run. [Laughter.] I wonder why he holds back? The drum beats, but he does not appear at the race. I want to know his views on this subject.

Mr. DAWSON. I do not enter into a race among kept nags. [Laughter.] I should like to see a general race, and no doubt the Senator could enter into that. There are various terms on which we have to run. Perhaps the Senator is more qualified than myself to run a race of this sort. But what I meant to do when I was up before—and all that I said was in perfect good humor towards the body—was, to bring gentlemen's minds to the necessity of closing the argument at some time. I knew the suggestion would have to be made when some one was entitled to the floor, and I thought this was the most appropriate way in which I could do it, by calling the attention of the body to the propriety of debating, instead of regular essay writing or speech making. Now, sir, since I made the suggestion, the Senate have shown a wonderful capacity for a running debate, and have demonstrated that they can very well engage in it. I have thus shown all that I wanted, and I am now satisfied to let them go on in any way that they may desire.

Mr. STUART. I wish to say now what I tried to say some time ago to the honorable Senator from Connecticut, but I was then prevented by two or three Senators, that if he desires to speak to-morrow, and not to-day, I will waive any objection I might have had. If that is the Senator's desire, I will not object to a postponement of this question until to-morrow. But, sir, I will take this occasion to say something in respect to the method in which business has been treated.

A long time ago—almost so long as to have passed out of my memory—on a Monday, I moved to postpone the consideration of this bill to the following Wednesday. I was then told by several Senators that it would be out of all parliamentary custom and order to do so. I was told that this was a message coming from the President of the United States, and must be disposed of at once, to the exclusion of all other business. That was several weeks ago.

Now, when to-day I simply suggest that we ought to be able to devote more than one hour in a day to the consideration of this subject, which it was said five or six weeks ago was so important that it ought to be disposed of at once, it is said to be entirely out of all order that has ever been established in the Senate. Sir, I confess myself to be utterly unable to follow all these senatorial customs. We cannot consider the homestead bill, because the President's veto message must take precedence; and we cannot consider the President's veto message because it is not entirely convenient for us to do so! But no one Senator is to blame. No gentleman wishes to talk to empty benches, and yet I do not believe there is a gentleman in the Senate who, on this subject, can secure twenty-five senatorial hearers, although the best talent in the country is here in some individuals.

Having said thus much, let me add to what has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin that there are many Senators on this floor who are desirous to have this question disposed of, and who would be very glad if the Senate, by common consent, would set apart a day when we should take a vote and end the matter. Many of us are particularly anxious to do this, because we wish to consider the other subject which has been referred to, (the homestead bill,) which is a special order, and was made so before this veto message was brought here, and have that also disposed of.

Now, sir, what have we been doing? Just precisely what the honorable Senator from Virginia suggested. One day we spend an hour in considering the President's message; and then, on the next day we consider whether we shall take a recess, or whether we shall adjourn without day.

Every other day we devote to business, and the intermediate days we devote to considering whether we shall do anything or not.

Mr. ADAMS. Will my friend allow me to ask him what Senator has made all the motions for the various recesses which we have recently taken at this session?

Mr. STUART. I know what the Senator from Mississippi means, and I will reply to him. There was a common understanding a few weeks ago, that the Senate should take a recess for the purpose of cleaning out the Hall, taking up the carpets, and changing the winter for the summer arrangements; and it was the general understanding that there should be no business done during the succeeding week. Nobody objected to it but my friend from Mississippi, and he called for the yeas and nays; but the Senate agreed to take the recess. Senators all around me—the Senators from New York, the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and I think I can say half the Senate—applied to me personally, for what reason I know not, to ascertain whether I would be here, and whether the understanding that, during the following week there should be no business of importance done, would be really carried out? In obedience to that general understanding I made the two motions for adjourning over to which the Senator refers.

Mr. ATCHISON. And I seconded them.

Mr. STUART. As the honorable Senator from Missouri says, he seconded the motions. Now, I may fairly ask, if I am chargeable with neglect of duties in the Senate? I have made no visits to my home; I have not been out of the city during the session. I claim no particular credit for it. I only wish to justify myself against the inference that might be drawn from the remark of the Senator from Mississippi. I have been found always in my seat and never in a hurry to adjourn.

Mr. ATCHISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WALKER called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 23, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bell, Brodhead, Cass, Clay, Dawson, Dixon, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Hamlin, Johnson, Mason, Norris, Rockwell, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Toombs, and Wade—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Benjamin, Brown, Chase, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Evans, Geyer, Gillette, Houston, Hunter, James, Jones of Tennessee, Pettit, Pratt, Shields, Stuart, Sumner, Walker, and Williams—21.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, June 21, 1854.

Prayer by REV. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT signed the enrolled bills yesterday received from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Benjamin Rowe; and for the relief of Captain E. A. F. Lavalette, of the United States Navy.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Mr. EVANS presented the petition of Robert Mills, in relation to a central route to the Pacific ocean; which was referred to the Select Committee appointed on the subject of the Pacific railroad.

Mr. DODGE, of Wisconsin, presented the memorial of Mary Kinner and Mary E. McCoy, praying indemnity for losses sustained by them in the depreciation of their property, in consequence of delays interposed by the land officers in perfecting their titles; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. BELL presented the petition of Henry F. Ryan, and twenty-two others, citizens of Knox county, Tennessee, praying that the soldiers who served in the Creek war of 1814, may be placed on the same footing as to pensions and bounty land with the soldiers engaged in other wars of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of P. C. Miles, praying to be allowed an increase of pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Frederick Denio, an invalid pensioner, praying to be allowed back pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. TOOMBS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George Stealey, praying compensation for his services, and remuneration for his expenses in visiting the Indians in California, under the direction of the commissioner of Indian affairs for that State, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Sarah Harmon, formerly widow of Timothy Murray, who was killed in the military service of the United States during the last war with Great Britain, praying to be allowed half pay and bounty land, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of the children and heirs of Uriah Jones, a soldier in the Revolutionary war, praying a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was referred the petition of Cyrus H. McCormick, praying the extension of letters patent granted him on the 21st June, 1834, for improvements in the machine for reaping all kinds of small grain, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following petitions, &c., asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to:

Petition of steamboat officers and engineers at Cincinnati, praying that measures may be taken to make Evans's safety-guard against the explosion of boilers free to the public, by the purchase of his patent right, or otherwise;

Petition of steamboat inspectors, engine builders, and others, citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, representing the importance of Evans's safety-guard for preventing the explosion of steam-boilers, and praying the purchase of the patent right, or the adoption of some other means of making the same free to the public;

Memorial of owners of tug or towing steam-boats, employed in the revenue district of New York, praying that all such boats not carrying passengers may be exempt from the inspection required by the act of August 30, 1852;

Petition of citizens of Alabama and other southern States, praying that restrictions in regard to the transportation of turpentine and the various other products of the pine tree, on board of steam-boats, may be repealed;

Petition of Hammond Howe and others, praying that the late law providing for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, may be amended; and Petition of John Thomas, praying an appropriation to enable him to test certain improvements made by him in the inclined-plane ox mill.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the memorial of William Gunton and others, praying a further allowance for the bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac river, near the Navy-yard, sold to the Government, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

NOTICES OF BILLS.

Mr. SUMNER gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill making a grant of land warrants to the State of Massachusetts to aid in the construction of a tunnel under the Hoosac mountain, and providing for the conveyance of mails, troops, and munitions of war through the same free of toll.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to provide for the transportation of the mails.

FALLS OF NIAGARA.

Mr. SEWARD. The Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred sundry memorials from citizens of the United States, praying for an appropriation for the construction of a ship canal around the Falls of Niagara, or in aid of that object, have instructed me to state, that while they approve of the object and purpose of the memorials, and think the proposed work a very important one, yet that there is a division in the committee, in part as to the expediency of action at the present time, and in part on the ground of the constitutionality of the modes of action suggested, and therefore, they have not been able to agree on any bill, and have instructed me for these reasons to ask that they may be discharged from the further consideration of the memorials.

The motion was agreed to.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. SEWARD. In pursuance of notice given yesterday, I ask leave to introduce a bill to regulate navigation to the coast of Africa, in vessels owned by citizens of the United States in certain cases. It becomes necessary, in my judgment, that such a bill should be brought to the consideration of the Senate. After giving the notice yesterday, I learned that the honorable Senator from Delaware, [Mr. CLAYTON,] at some time during my absence, had expressed a purpose to introduce such a bill, and I learned also, informally, that he had been instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report a bill to that effect. I merely ask leave to introduce this bill, and have it laid on the table, as my object is not to embarrass him but to coöperate with him.

Leave to introduce the bill was granted, and it was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading.

AMENDMENTS OF THE STEAMBOAT LAW.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Commerce, reported a bill supplementary to an act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes,' approved August 30, 1852;" which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is desirable that this bill should receive an early passage; and as I apprehend it will meet with no objection I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to have it acted upon at this time.

There being no objection, the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the appointment of an additional supervising inspector, to comprehend that portion of the United States lying upon the Pacific ocean, who is to receive a compensation of $3,000 per annum, and a like allowance for expenses of travel, as is provided for the other supervising inspectors. It also provides for two local inspectors, for the collection district of Puget's Sound; one as the inspector of hulls, and the other as inspector of boilers—at an annual compensation of $500.

It further proposes to enact that the operation of so much of the ninth section of the original act of 1852, as requires the use of alloyed metals fusible by the heat of steam, shall be suspended until the 3d of March next; and that so much of the act of July 7, 1838, as authorizes the appointment of persons to make inspections of steam-boats and boilers, and receive compensation therefor, shall be repealed; and that the inspections required by that act shall be made by the inspectors provided for by this bill, and by the act to which it is a supplement.

Mr. HAMLIN. The first section of this bill provides that the State of California and the Territories of Oregon and Washington shall compose a district for the inspection of steamboat hulls and boilers. They now constitute a part of the same district with Louisiana and Arkansas. They are so remote, however, that it is found utterly impracticable for the supervising inspector who resides at New Orleans, to discharge the duties of that office. It therefore provides for a new district upon the Pacific coast. The second section of the bill provides for the suspension of the ninth section of the original act, which provided that a certain kind of alloy should be used in the construction of all steamboat boilers. The supervising inspectors are now making experiments by which it is believed greater security will be attained in the construction of steamboat boilers. The proposition is to suspend the absolute provision of that section until the 3d of March next. I think no further explanation is necessary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

JAMES DIXON.

Mr. DAWSON. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of James Dixon, praying compensation for extra work done on the court-house in the city of Alexandria, District of Columbia, have directed me to submit a report, accompanied by a bill making an appropriation to the petitioner. I will state to the Senate that Mr. Dixon is an old man. He did the work many years ago, and has never been paid for it. The subject has been referred to the committee for several years, and has been reported upon favorably. I will ask the Senate to take it up, and consider it at this time.

The bill was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to pay James Dixon $487 23 for the work done by him.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE NAVY.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the Senate now to take up the bill, which was under consideration yesterday, to improve the naval service, for the purpose of putting it upon its passage after making several amendments which have been agreed upon. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] has consulted the Secretary of the Navy, and some amendments have been agreed upon. I believe there is now no objection from any quarter upon the subject, and with the permission of the Senate I will read the several sections of the bill as they are proposed to be amended.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. In accordance with the suggestions of the honorable Senator from Virginia, I move to strike out of that part of the second section, which relates to midshipmen, the words "on the recommendation of the Representative thereof," and the words "on the recommendation of the Senators thereof, respectively." This obviates the objection made yesterday, which presupposed that it vested the power of appointing the officers in Congress instead of the Executive.

Mr. BADGER. I will ask the Senator what effect that amendment will have on the law already in force?

Mr. MALLORY. It will have no effect upon the law as it is.

Mr. BADGER. Then I am opposed to the amendment. I do not see why there should be one set of midshipmen appointed upon the nomination of the members of the House and another set not appointed upon their nomination. I was opposed to this system at first; but having adopted it, we ought either to carry it out and extend it to this body, as well as to the House, or abolish it altogether. I hope the Senate will not agree to that amendment.

Mr. MALLORY. The law as it is now explained here is an amendment to an appropriation bill, and gives the nomination of midshipmen to the Naval Academy to the Representatives from the particular congressional districts, and withdraws those nominations from the Senate. Now, the House when it adopted that amendment did not consider the midshipmen as officers, but as cadets only, and got rid of the constitutional objection by that means. The committee were not disposed, in this matter, to pronounce any opinion upon that at all. I hold that it is a mere matter of Executive regulation. The Executive may sanction that course or he may not. I propose, therefore, in this section, not to legislate upon that subject, but simply to say, that instead of there being two cadets from each congressional district, there shall be one, and that there shall be two at large from each State without saying upon whose recommendation they shall be appointed. I understand the Senator from North Carolina objects to that.

Mr. BADGER. I object to it for the reason I have given. I think the members of both Houses ought to be on an equal footing.

Mr. FISH. They are both placed upon the same footing by the bill. If the Senator from Florida will read the section as he proposes to amend it, the Senator from North Carolina will observe that both Senators and Representatives are put upon the same footing.

Mr. MALLORY. They are put upon precisely the same footing. It makes no difference.

Mr. BADGER. But they are not upon the same footing as to the midshipmen directed to be appointed.

Mr. FISH. They are as to all hereafter to be appointed.

Mr. MALLORY. I will read that part of the section as it will stand if amended:

"The number of midshipmen and acting midshipmen, including those of the Naval Academy, shall be determined as follows, to wit: one shall be appointed from each congressional district of the United States, two from each State, ten to be appointed by the President at large, and those authorized by this act to be selected from the boys of the Navy."

These will constitute the midshipmen of the Navy, and both Houses in this respect stand alike. This is the first amendment proposed.

The next amendment, suggested also by the honorable Senator from Virginia, contemplates the striking out of the bill the retired list, called the "permanent furlough list," and leaves but two modes of getting rid of officers; one to place them upon the retired list, and the other to drop them from the Navy entirely. The third section is made to conform thereto, by striking out the words "or permanently furlough," and the words "and of the officers so furloughed or retired, those on the retired list only shall be entitled to wear the naval uniform;" and the words relating to such a list wherever they occur.

The third and last amendment, which the honorable Senator from Virginia suggested—and I understand he suggests it now at the instance of the Secretary of the Navy—is to strike out all of the seventh section after the word "assigned," as follows:

"The duties of equipping the vessels, and of supervising, registering, and detailing the officers and men of the naval service, and such other duties pertaining to the service as the Secretary of the Navy may direct; and the orders of such bureau shall be considered as emanating from the Secretary of the Navy, and shall have full force and effect as such, and all the duties of said bureau shall be performed under his authority and supervision."

And to insert the words, —such duties as pertain to the equipment of vessels and detailing of officers and men as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy.

I think that is a mere verbal amendment, which is of no importance either way. These are all the amendments suggested by the Senator from Virginia yesterday. There was one which I desired to offer upon the subject of the assimilated rank of the Navy. It was agreed upon in a conference of the committees of the two Houses, but I was unable to obtain a copy of its details until this morning. I now propose it with a slight alteration. The assimilated rank, I will remark here, has been a subject of very considerable vexation in the Navy, and it is highly important that every officer in the service should have not only his rank and duties but his privileges all distinctly legislated upon and fixed. The amendment which I propose is to add the following:

SEC. 10. And he further enacted, That the assimilated rank between the line and staff officers of the Navy, shall hereafter be determined by the following provisions:

1. Surgeons, pursers, chaplains, professors of mathematics, and chief engineers of over twelve years standing in their respective grades, shall rank with commanders.
2. Surgeons, pursers, chaplains, professors of mathematics, and chief engineers, under twelve years' standing, shall rank with lieutenants.
3. Passed assistant surgeons shall rank with commissioned masters.
4. Assistant surgeons and first assistant engineers shall rank next after commissioned masters.
5. Second assistant engineers shall rank with midshipmen, and third assistant engineers next after midshipmen.
6. This assimilated rank shall in no case confer on a staff officer the right to command.
7. Commanding officers of whatever grade shall take precedence over all staff officers attached to their command while on military duty; under other circumstances, precedence shall be regulated by length of service, as heretofore set forth.

I will observe, in regard to the third provision, that the words "commissioned masters" are put in, because it is contemplated by the bill to confer a commission upon the rank of passed midshipmen. The Senator from Maine asks me if we have chaplains in the assimilated rank? The first provision reads:

Surgeons, pursers, chaplains, professors of mathematics, and chief engineers, of over twelve years standing in their respective grades, shall rank with commanders.

Mr. PRATT. I will inquire of the Senator, if the amendment which he has just proposed does not conform to the bill of the House which we have seen printed in some newspapers, with the single exception pointed out by him? I understand it does.

Mr. MALLORY. I understand distinctly that it does. My design was to make it so. The exception is this: There was found in the published report of the bill of the House a provision that on trials by court-martial, at least one third of the members composing the court should be of the grade of the officer arraigned for trial. I consider that an anomaly in military practice. I believe it does not exist in any military service.

Mr. PRATT. I will further inquire of the Senator, if I understood him correctly in our interview, that the privileges of staff officers in the Army are similar?

Mr. MALLORY. That is my understanding. The chairman of the Military Committee, perhaps, has better information than I have on the subject. By the unanimous consent of the Senate I propose that the question be taken on the first three amendments which I have offered, and separately upon that which relates to the assimilated rank.

The question was taken on the first three amendments, and they were agreed to; and then, on the last amendment, and it was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

It was read a third time; and passed by a vote, on a division—ayes 24, noes 11.

TEXAS DEBT.

Mr. GWIN. A bill was reported the other day from the Committee on Finance in regard to the Texas debt. It does not meet with my approbation. I am sure it does not meet with the approbation of that committee, and I therefore move to recommit it, because I believe we can so frame a bill and bring it before the Senate as to meet its approbation. I move to take up the bill so that I may submit the motion to recommit it.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to, and, On the motion of Mr. GWIN, it was recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

HALF PAY TO SURGEONS' MATES.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to offer the following joint resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the resolution of the 17th of January, 1781, regulating the allowance during life, in lieu of half pay to the officers of the hospital department and medical staff, shall be so construed as to extend to surgeons' mates, who shall be entitled to receive the same pay as by said resolution is allowed to hospital physicians and surgeons.

The resolution of the 17th January, 1781, provides as follows:

"Resolved, That all officers in the hospital department and medical staff hereinafter mentioned, who shall continue in service to the end of the war, or be reduced before that time as supernumeraries, shall be entitled to, and receive during life, in lieu of half pay the following allowance, viz:

"The director of the hospital equal to the half pay of a lieutenant colonel.

"Chief physicians and surgeons of the Army and hospital, and hospital physicians and surgeons, purveyor, apothecary, and regimental surgeons, each equal to the half pay of a captain."

Notwithstanding this broad language used in that resolution, I understand that the accounting officers of the Treasury, following the rule which was established shortly after its passage, have determined that it does not include surgeons' mates; so that all the surgeons' mates of the Revolutionary war have not received that compensation which it was the manifest design of Congress to allow them by this resolution of 1781.

I state further, that in every case in which application has been made to Congress by surgeons' mates, and where Congress has acted definitively upon them, they have had allowed the compensation which is here allowed to the hospital surgeons. The resolution, then, which I have the honor to propose, is merely to direct the Department so to construe the original resolution as to make it extend to surgeons' mates. I may say that I am sure there will be no difficulty as to it in the mind of any one here; and, therefore, I ask that the resolution may now be considered and passed.

Mr. BAYARD. I must move the reference of the resolution to the appropriate committee.

The PRESIDENT. That motion is not now in order. The resolution cannot be introduced except by unanimous consent. After it has been introduced and read twice, that motion can be made.

Mr. BAYARD. I object to its consideration, unless for the purpose of reference.

Mr. PRATT. I ask for the reference of the resolution, if one objection be sufficient to prevent the consideration.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the joint resolution will have its second reading.

Mr. BAYARD. I object, unless the second reading is for the purpose of reference.

Mr. PRATT. That is the object.

Mr. BAYARD. Then I withdraw my objection.

The joint resolution was read a second time, and, on motion by Mr. PRATT, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKEAN, Chief Clerk, announcing that they had passed a bill to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad therein.

INDIGENT INSANE BILL VETO.

Mr. STUART. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the special order—the bill making a grant of land to the several States of the Union for the benefit of indigent insane persons, which has been returned by the President of the United States, with his objections. I think we can dispose of that question to-day.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to reconsider the bill.

Mr. TOUCEY delivered his views in opposition to the bill, and in defense of the President's veto message.

Mr. BELL followed in support of the bill and in opposition to the veto.

[These speeches will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. MASON. If the Senator will give way, I desire to move for an Executive session. With his permission, I will move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. BELL. I intended to conclude my remarks to-day, but if the Senator desires it, I will yield.

The further consideration of the subject was postponed until to-morrow.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. MASON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business, and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 21, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. WILLIAM H. MILBURN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HOUSTON. I beg leave to report back to the House the amendments of the Senate to the Indian appropriation bill, that they may be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

BOOKS FOR MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

CLERK'S OFFICE, June 21, 1854.

Sir: The action of the House of Representatives yesterday, reported from Library Committee, explanatory of the joint resolution voting books, &c., approved 24th February, 1851, makes it obligatory upon the Clerk to construe the latter so as to furnish to the new members of the present House, in addition to the books estimated for in my communication of the 14th instant, the same number and description of books as were voted to the members of the Senate in the last Congress, and not heretofore voted to the members of the House. These books, and the numbers of them so voted in the Senate, are as follows: Hickey's Constitution, one hundred and sixty-one copies; Mayo & Moulton's Pension and Bounty Land Laws, eight copies; Mayo's Treasury Regulations, two copies.

The last proviso to the resolution of the House of the 30th instant, votes these books in the same numbers to the old members as well as to the new members of the House.

There will, therefore, be needed for the purchase of books, in addition to the estimates transmitted to the House on the 14th instant, $45,171.

The details of the above amount are as follows:

For Hickey's Constitution.

239 members and delegates.

161 copies to each.

38,479 copies at $1 per copy.....$38,479

For Mayo & Moulton's Pension and Bounty Land

Laws.

239 members and delegates.

8 copies to each.

1,912 copies at $3 50..... 6,692

I therefore beg leave to recall my estimate for books transmitted on the 14th instant, and to substitute the following:

For books to the members of the House of the Thirty-Third Congress, by the joint resolution, approved on the 24th of February, 1854, and by the resolution of the House of 30th June, 1854, $199,510 87.

There will also be needed to comply with the resolution of the House of the 28th of September, 1850, the following: For Congressional Globe and Appendix of the Thirty-Third Congress, for the House library, one hundred sets, at nine dollars per set for the Congress, $900; and for binding the same, 600 volumes, at sixty cents per volume, $360. Respectfully,

J. W. FORNEY, Clerk Ho. Rep. U. S.

Hon. LINN BOYD, Speaker House of Representatives.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, the communication was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

PER DIEM AND MILEAGE TO MR. SNODGRASS.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker be authorized to direct the payment to the widow of the Hon. John F. Snodgrass, deceased, late a member of this House from the State of Virginia, the per diem and mileage due to him at the time of his death.

The resolution was received by unanimous consent.

Mr. ELIOT, of Massachusetts. I desire to present a resolution of the same character in relation to my predecessor, the Hon. Zeno Scudder.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to pay out of the contingent fund to the Hon. Zeno Scudder his per diem and mileage as a member of the Thirty-Third Congress, to the day of his resignation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Why, the gentleman [Mr. Scudder] never performed the travel, and I suppose is not entitled to mileage.

Mr. WHEELER. He never was able to come here.

Mr. JONES. I believe it is the custom of this body—

Mr. PRATT, (interrupting.) I was about to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether Mr. Scudder ever took his seat in this House? If not, I doubt whether he is entitled to mileage; not that I have any doubt of his being entitled to receive compensation for his time.

Mr. JONES. It is the custom, I believe, and perhaps the law, that a member who has been detained from his seat in consequence of sickness, shall receive his per diem allowance. That, I think, is the law. But it certainly is not the law, nor the practice of the House, to pay mileage when a member elect never comes here, never makes his appearance in the House, and never performs the travel. This will be a new precedent, if the resolution be agreed to, and it will be one which I think ought not to be set.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope that the gentleman from Massachusetts will not encumber my resolution with his, which is leading to debate. It is a distinct matter altogether, and I hope the House will proceed to take a vote upon my resolution.

Mr. CAMPBELL. There may be a separate vote taken by division, I suppose.

The SPEAKER. Then the vote will be first taken on the amendment.

Mr. ELIOT. I shall be glad to have an opportunity to reply to the inquiry proposed by the gentleman from Connecticut. [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. ELIOT. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS. The inquiry I wish to make is this: Whether Mr. Scudder was not detained from his seat by an injury received in coming here?

Mr. ELIOT. Yes, sir; he was.

Mr. STEPHENS. I understand that Mr. Scudder was coming to take his seat here, but was prevented by injury received on the way. He was thus detained at home for some time, and finally concluded to resign his seat in Congress. I trust, therefore, that the House will pass the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts. Whether it will or not encumber the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia, is another question.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. ELIOT. I wish to say to the Chair that I did not offer my resolution as an amendment to that of the gentleman from Virginia, but as an independent resolution.

The SPEAKER. Then the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts is not in order at this time; and is not before the body.

Mr. ELIOT. I withdraw my resolution with pleasure, until that offered by the gentleman from Virginia is acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair first understood that the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts was proposed as an amendment to that of the gentleman from Virginia. That is the only form in which it can be considered at this time. The question, then, is on the resolution offered by the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was put; and the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ELIOT. I now ask leave to offer my resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FULLER] was on the floor, and yielded it through courtesy to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.] The gentleman from Maine is still entitled to the floor.

Mr. FULLER. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

PER DIEM AND MILEAGE TO MR. SCUDDER.

Mr. ELIOT. I now ask leave to offer the resolution which has been read a few moments since from the Clerk's table.

Mr. LETCHER, (suggesting.) Strike out the words "contingent fund."

Mr. ELIOT. I have no objection to adopt the suggestion made to me by the gentleman from Virginia, who is better acquainted than myself with the form in which the resolution should be proposed.

The SPEAKER. In what form is the modification proposed?

Mr. ELIOT. It is to make my resolution the same as the other; that is, to strike out the words "contingent fund."

The SPEAKER. The resolution, as amended, will read as follows:

Resolved, That there be paid to the Hon. Zeno Scudder his per diem and mileage as member of the Thirty-Third Congress, to the day of his resignation.

Mr. HILLYER. I desire to make an inquiry of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ELIOT.]

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow the Chair to interrupt him for a moment? The Chair would inquire out of what fund he is to order this money to be paid?

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Out of the fund appropriated to pay the mileage and per diem of the members of this Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. In the same way as the present members are paid.

Mr. STEPHENS. The fund is already appropriated; and if Mr. Scudder had come here, he would have drawn his pay from that fund. It should be paid in the same manner as if he had been here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair doubted, at the moment, whether the fund could be drawn from in that way.

Mr. STEPHENS. I do not think there is any doubt about it.

Mr. HILLYER. I did not hear, and I am sure that many others on this side of the House did not hear, the response made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ELIOT] to the inquiry of my colleague, as to the reasons why Mr. Scudder never appeared here to take his seat? My colleague inquired if Mr. Scudder was hurt, or was taken sick upon the road. I heard no response to that interrogatory, and I think it is important.

Mr. ELIOT. I will reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Georgia, by saying to the House that after Mr. Scudder had left his home, on his way to Washington, he stopped at a town in Barnstable county, where he met with an accident which has detained him there in a public house from last December until this moment. He is still there.

[Cries, "That is enough!" and "Question!" "Question!"]

The question was then taken on the resolution; and it was agreed to.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. FULLER. I ask the permission of the House for a moment to permit me to call up bill No. 242, relating to revenue cutters. I wish to state to the House—and I invite the particular attention of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] to my apology for calling the attention of the House to this matter now—that, at a very early day of the session, the Committee on Commerce reported a bill—which is the bill in question—authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to purchase or contract for four additional revenue cutters; one for the Charleston station, to supply the place of the Hamilton, which was unfortunately lost; one for the Texas coast, and two for the Pacific coast. The committee are in possession of information which they regard it their duty to lay before the House, and which shows that the public interests of the country are suffering now for the want of these cutters. It will necessarily take a good deal of time to prepare them before the commencement of the fall season, and for these reasons I desire to have the attention of the House to the bill at this time. The public service requires it.

Mr. COBB. I should have no objection to it, if its consideration did not come out of the morning hour. The committees want to report, and they have reports in which the public is as much interested as they are in those revenue cutters.

Mr. FULLER. I wish to say to the gentleman, that for three months I have been making ineffectual efforts to get the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill cannot be taken up.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

On motion by Mr. CRAIG, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds be discharged from the further consideration of the petition and papers of Charles Wilkes and others for damages to certain lands; and also from the petition and papers of certain citizens of Indianapolis, in reference to a court-house in which to hold the United States courts, &c.; and that the same be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. OLDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to report back Senate bill (No. 344) for the relief of James Jeffries and Jeremiah M. Smith, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COBB. I will withdraw my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. FULLER. I am glad the gentleman from Alabama has become satisfied of the importance of this matter.

Mr. COBB. I do not withdraw the objection for any such reason, but as a matter of courtesy to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. OLDS. I object to the gentleman's proposition.

Mr. O. then, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported back Senate bill (No. 365) for the relief of John W. Kelly; which was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EWING. The bill for the relief of James Jeffries and Jeremiah M. Smith, which has, on motion of the gentleman from Ohio, been referred to a Committee of the Whole House, is one which was before the House some months ago, and upon which there is a necessity of immediate action.

Mr. OLDS. I would suggest to the gentleman that the course I have given to the bill will accomplish his object. Next Friday is objection day; and as it is a plain case, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. EWING. I do not agree with the gentleman as to this being the best disposition of the bill. I move to reconsider the vote by which it was referred to a Committee of the Whole House. I do not propose to call up the motion at this time, but to have it entered. It will be recollected, that when the bill was before the House, many of the members were for its immediate passage. The question then came up whether it should go to a Committee of the Whole House, or to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and it was decided in favor of the bill that it should not go to a Committee of the Whole. But, sir, by the direction which has now been given it, it will be placed in a still worse position than if it had then been referred to a Committee of the Whole. After having gone through an investigation by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and by their direction referred to a Committee of the Whole, it will be placed lower down on the Calendar, and, therefore, in a worse position than if it had been so referred when it was, on a former occasion, before the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this debate is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky has the right to submit the motion to reconsider, and have it entered; but not the right to take the floor from the gentleman from Ohio to speak upon the motion. The Chair desires to know whether the gentleman from Ohio gives up the floor for that purpose?

Mr. OLDS. No, sir; I prefer to finish the reports I have to make. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report back Senate resolution (No. 19) for the relief of Rebecca Birdsell.

The resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OLDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be allowed a clerk from the 6th day of May last, at the usual compensation allowed to clerks of Committees.

I wish to state to the House that, from the date mentioned in the resolution, I have not had an opportunity to offer the resolution. Upon consultation at the Post Office Department—and I think it will strike the good sense of the House in the same way—our committee have determined to bring up the existing post routes which are scattered through the laws from the time of the establishment of the Post Office Department down to the present time, and to reenact them all in one bill, so that when an application for the establishment of a new route is presented, we shall not be compelled to go over all the laws to find out whether it has been before established. We propose to have them arranged in alphabetical order, and a clerk from the Post Office Department is now employed upon that work. Such things are continually occurring. Why, sir, a single route in the State of Indiana has been at least seven times enacted.

Well, now, we propose, for the convenience of the Post Office Department and that of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads,—and it will be but little trouble,—to have them enacted in one bill in alphabetical order for each State. We should need the clerk even were we not to do this; but having the clerk, we can do it also.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. With the gentleman's permission, I will make an inquiry. I understand him to say that there is one route which has been enacted seven times. Did they put a mail on that route for every time a law was passed?

Mr. OLDS. No, sir; your law requires the Postmaster General to advertise every time these routes are made; and, as a matter of course, before he put on the service, it was ascertained that service was already on the route, but there was expense of advertisement every time the route was enacted. If there was some such plan as that now proposed by the committee, and recommended by the Department, all that trouble and expense would be saved. In addition, I wish to say that if we did not propose this new arrangement, still we would have need for the clerk.

Mr. COBB. I wish to suggest a modification of the gentleman's resolution. I am, and always have been, opposed to giving these clerks to committees. If it were necessary, I could give the House satisfactory reasons for that opposition. Let me only ask why committees of this House should have clerks when the condition of business is such that these committees are standing here for months, waiting opportunity to report? While thus waiting, the clerks can have nothing to do.

The point to which I rose is, to suggest that the gentleman should fix in his resolution the time at which the clerk is to be dismissed. I think it highly improper to allow standing committees of this House clerks from the beginning to the termination of Congress. Many of them do not perform one hour's service during a month. I say that such a system is wrong. It is growing into a system, and unless we put a stop to it by the limitation of time for which clerks shall be allowed, and let committees discharge their duties and then their clerks, we shall, in less than five years, have a clerk for each and every committee of this House. I was opposed to the system from the beginning. I believe that it is wrong. In my judgment, the country is suffering from the wrong. I am here now, and always, to oppose it.

Mr. OLDS. I call the gentleman to order. I do not permit the gentleman to ask me a question, and then to answer it himself. Now, as I claim to be a Yankee by birth, I will answer the question of the honorable gentleman of the Committee on the Public Lands, by asking him when that committee proposes to discharge its clerk?

Mr. COBB. I would do to-day. I am ready to answer all such questions.

Mr. OLDS. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that it is not out of the usual course to ask for a clerk for the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. In the last three preceding Congresses, the committee had a clerk. Indeed, sir, I might have come here at the commencement of this session and been justified by precedent in asking for this clerk; but I have delayed to do so for five months, because we did not need him. It is only at this late day when we so need his services, that we come forward and ask for him; and are we, because we have not asked for the clerk until we need his services, to be met with opposition from the gentleman of a committee which now has a clerk, but which never had one before this session of Congress—a committee which has not one fourth the business for a clerk that our committee has.

The gentleman asks when is our clerk to be discharged? Why, when are clerks for committees generally discharged? When our post route bill is completed we shall have no further use for a clerk, and I am willing then to discharge him.

Mr. COBB. I think that I can settle the difficulty between us. I believe that the gentleman's committee ought to have a clerk to make up this post route bill. It will not require longer than a week to do so, and for that time I am willing to allow a clerk.

This alphabetical matter is all humbug, the whole of it.

Mr. OLDS. The gentleman may have some spiritual clairvoyance which I have not. His information may come to him in that way. I am not supposed to have such spiritual manifestations. I act from sober reality, and say that this matter is no humbug. We need a clerk. If the House give it us, we shall be grateful; and if it does not, I shall employ one at my own expense. I now demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. OLDS. The matter has been sufficiently discussed, and I think that I had better adhere to the demand for the previous question.

Mr. JONES. I move that the resolution be laid upon the table.

The question was taken upon Mr. Jones's motion, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

The question now being upon the demand for the previous question,

Mr. OLDS demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and GREENWOOD were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Mr. OLDS. It would be better, perhaps, to have a recount, than to have a call of the House.

Mr. WHEELER. I object to a recount.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask that there be a call of the House?

A call was not ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

After a count, the Speaker announced that there were one hundred and fifty-eight members in their seats; and the tellers resumed their places.

The question was again taken; and the tellers reported—yes 92, noes not counted.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

Mr. WHEELER. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. COBB. I call for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PERKINS, of New York, and MATTESON, were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported twenty-nine in the affirmative, (a sufficient number.)

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

THE OCCURRENCE OF YESTERDAY.

Mr. CHURCHWELL. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to offer to this House an apology for a breach of decorum, and of its rules, yesterday. I believe, sir, that those with whom I have been associated for the last three years as a member of this body, will bear testimony that I have, at least, tried to be respectful in all my intercourse with its members, and to have a proper regard for the rules of this House; and I hope I shall always be found among those who desire, and make an effort to preserve, the order and decorum of this body.

Mr. CULLOM. I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the unexpected and unprovoked attack made upon me yesterday may have precipitated me into any violation of the rules and order of this House.

I have endeavored, during my service here, to maintain kindly relations with the members of the House, and to observe punctiliously the rights of all, and the honor and integrity of the body of which I am a member.

Circumstances yesterday, over which I had no control, and which I had contributed nothing to provoke by word or deed, elicited from me language which, perhaps, I should not have uttered. If I have violated the rules of this body, I ask the House to be assured that it was out of no disrespect to this high forum. But, Mr. Speaker, the ebullition which I displayed upon that occasion was elicited by the exhibition of a deadly instrument, which was exhibited in connection with the remarks that were made, and I felt constrained to pursue the course which I did.

Mr. McMULLIN. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman from Tennessee, but I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has resumed his seat.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I withdraw my question of order.

Mr. MILLSON. The announcement which has just been made by the two gentlemen from Tennessee was somewhat unexpected to me; though I do not mean to say that I had not indulged the hope and expectation that both these gentlemen would see that it was due, as well to their own character and honor, as to that of the House, that they should tender to the House the apologies which they have just made for the disorder of yesterday. But, as I have given notice of my purpose to call the attention of the House to a question of privilege in connection with this matter, it is due to myself that I should indicate the course I had intended to pursue; and that my remarks may be perfectly in order, I beg leave to present the following resolution:

Resolved, That a select committee of—be appointed to investigate the disorder which occurred yesterday in the House, in the use of warm words and threatening gestures, between Mr. CHURCHWELL and Mr. CULLOM, members of this House, and to report thereon to the House.

No one, Mr. Speaker, can regret more than I do the scenes of yesterday. No one would feel more than I the unpleasantness of the necessity for bringing the subject to the notice of the House. But, sir, holding, as I do, very friendly relations towards both these gentlemen, I feel that I could do so without subjecting myself to the suspicion of being moved by any unworthy considerations.

That the use of warm words and threatening gestures is a breach of the privileges of the House cannot be doubted. Sir, it is of the greatest importance, not merely to this body, but to the country at large, that debate here should be perfectly free, and that all those gentlemen who are capable of shedding light upon our deliberations—and there are many such here—should be encouraged to offer their views. There are, doubtless, occasions when gentlemen of sensitive minds would be restrained from an expression of their judgment upon matters before us from an apprehension that they may be involved in heated debate, and subjected to contumely.

It was well said by a member of the British Parliament, that a blow struck in the House of Commons was a blow struck at the whole Commons of England, and everything that is at all calculated to prevent freedom of debate, to destroy the consciousness, the assurance, that discussion may be full and free, without subjecting the member engaging in it to personal risk, or to reproachful epithets, is a wrong done to the whole people of the country.

While, then, sir, it is clear that the use of such language as was employed yesterday is a breach of the privileges of the House, and ought not to be passed without notice, there is more embarrassment, perhaps, in determining as to the precise manner in which these violations of order and privilege should be treated by the body. I find, on a very cursory examination made this morning, some cases in the British Parliament, occurring nearly two centuries ago, where disorderly conduct upon the floor of the House was brought to the notice of the body, and the parties offending required to make atonement. In the parliamentary debates I find that where hot and provoking discourses and gestures occurred between Lord Cavendish and Sir John Hanmer, the matter was ended by requiring every member to proceed no further in anything that had happened in the unfortunate disorder in the Grand Committee.

In another case, it appears that Lord O'Brien and Sir Thomas Chickley were ordered into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms for a quarrel that had happened between them, on a division of the House, in which blows were given. In another case, in the year 1678, blows passed between Sir Jonathan Trelawney and Mr. Ash. The Speaker having observed the blows, promptly called the attention of the House to the matter. After discussion, in which propositions were made to send the offending parties to the Tower, and to expel them from the House, Sir John said: "I humbly ask the pardon of the House for it." Mr. Ash said: "I do acknowledge that I have done a great fault, and I humbly ask the pardon of the House." Another case occurred in 1690. Sir Thomas Mompesson, in his place, asked pardon of the House for assaulting Mr. Okedon, in the lobby; an account thereof being given by Mr. Piper and Colonel Trelawney, members of the House, and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper; and the Speaker acquainted Sir Thomas Mompesson "that the House had considered that he was an ancient member, and therefore were very indulgent to him by their resolution, which he acquainted him with, and required him to ask pardon accordingly, which he did do."

It will be observed, then, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the diatribes of our transatlantic friends against the American Congress, and other legislative bodies in the United States, on account of these disorderly occurrences, that they would not look in vain for such precedents of disorder in their own parliamentary history. In these cases it will be observed that the House was satisfied with the tender of apology by the offending members. In our own Congress, too, I observe that there are several similar cases in which no further proceeding was had after the tender of apology by the parties charged with the offense. A case of the kind referred to occurred between two members from Tennessee in the year 1838, and a resolution was introduced that these gentlemen do apologize to the House for violating its privileges and offending its dignity. After the introduction of the resolution requiring the tender of this apology, both gentlemen rose in their places and made ample acknowledgments.

A case of like character occurred between a member from Virginia and a member from North Carolina, in the year 1841. Finding then that, in similar cases, the House has forborne to take any further action after the tender by the offending members of ample and satisfactory apologies, for the violation of its order and rules, I had, after deliberation and consultation with friends around me, come to the conclusion to withdraw the resolution upon the tender of apologies. I am not unaware of the importance of preventing the recurrence of these disorderly scenes. I do not know that any alteration or amendment of the rules of the House is necessary to secure this desirable end. If it be, I trust it will be soon made. I observe that the Manual—

Mr. ORR, (interrupting.) Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to suggest an additional rule, which I hold in my hand, as necessary to be adopted by the House? It will settle a controverted question, and will be the means hereafter, in collisions between members upon this floor, if they should unfortunately occur, of bringing the question directly before the House, and investing the Speaker, beyond a doubt, with sufficient power to suppress the difficulty upon the floor. The Speaker does not possess that power, certainly, now. I ask the Clerk to read the rule which I suggest for the adoption of the House.

The rule was then read, as follows:

If any member, in violation of the rules of the House, shall refuse to obey the order of the Speaker, made in conformity therewith, it shall be the duty of the Speaker to order the member so offending into the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, to be dealt with as the House may direct.

Mr. ORR. I would suggest a modification of the rule which I have offered. It is, that the Speaker shall be "authorized," instead of that "it shall be his duty."

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Will my colleague allow me to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a question? Can it be possible that there is any doubt that that is the law now?

Several MEMBERS. None at all.

Mr. BAYLY repeated his question.

Mr. ORR. There is a very serious doubt on the subject; so much so, that the present, and, I believe, the former Speakers, have not felt themselves authorized to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest a member violating the rules of order and decorum. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House certainly has no such power, and it is extremely doubtful whether the Speaker has. When there is disorder of this sort, and the member refuses to obey the order of the Presiding Officer, it is the duty of the House to take the power of ordering his arrest into its hands; but there should be a more summary remedy.

Mr. BAYLY. I do not think so.

Mr. MILLSON. I was on the point of stating to the House that I do not know that any amendment to the present rules is necessary. According to the Manual, which, by one of our rules, is made the law of the House in all cases in which it does not come in conflict with the standing rules and orders,

"Whenever warm words or an assault have passed between Members, the House, for the protection of their members, requires them to declare, in their places, not to prosecute any quarrel; or orders them to attend the Speaker, who is to accommodate their differences, and report to the House, and they are put under restraint if they refuse, or until they do."

I am inclined to think, then, that under the existing rules, and under the law of the Manual, the Speaker and the House may now exercise this authority.

But, however this may be, I have a reason, which the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Orr] will appreciate without my indicating it, why I prefer that the resolution which he has just now introduced should not be considered to-day.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to understand whether or not the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] yielded the floor to the gentleman from South Carolina, for the purpose of allowing him to introduce his resolution, and whether, therefore, the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina is now to be considered before the body?

Mr. MILLSON. No, sir; I stated that I yielded to have the resolution read for information.

The SPEAKER. Then the proposition of the gentleman from South Carolina is not before the body.

Mr. BOCK. The gentleman from South Carolina could not, even with the consent of the gentleman from Virginia, present a proposition to amend the rules of the House.

Mr. MILLSON. I gave notice to the House yesterday that I would call its attention to this subject to-day. It was my purpose, however, after conferring with gentlemen of ability and experience, to withdraw the resolution which I intended to offer, if the two gentlemen should do what they have done—tender suitable apologies to this House.

I have not thought it necessary to say anything in reference to the merits of the original controversy between the two gentlemen. I know nothing about it, and the House has nothing to do with it. We should confine ourselves to what occurred in our presence, and not inquire into the merits of any controversy which may unfortunately exist between these gentlemen.

Considering, then, Mr. Speaker, that heretofore legislative bodies in this country and in England have seemed to be satisfied with the atonement offered by the members offending; in view of the fact that similar cases of disregard of the rules and order of this House have occurred even in the present Congress, and have been passed by altogether unnoticed by this House; in the hope, too, that some means may be soon devised by which these occurrences may be prevented in future, and by which members may be apprised of the responsibilities they may incur, and in consideration of the fact that both these gentlemen have tendered apologies, which I must regard—

Mr. WHEELER, (interrupting.) I wish to ask the gentleman a question. I understand from one of those gentlemen that deadly weapons were drawn yesterday. Has that ever been done before?

Mr. MILLSON. I know nothing personally of the fact. I will, however, state, as the gentleman asks me the question whether it was ever done before, that—

Mr. WHEELER, (interrupting.) Have you found any precedent of that kind?

Mr. MILLSON. In some of the cases which I have already alluded to, some of the parties drew their swords on the floor of the House of Commons.

I beg leave to withdraw my resolution.

Mr. McMULLIN. I object to the withdrawal of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the right to withdraw it.

Mr. McMULLIN. Then I beg leave to renew it.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I rise to a question of order. I desire to inquire of the Chair how this resolution got before the House? I understand the resolution has been withdrawn by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON;] and if it is not in order for the gentleman [Mr. McMULLIN] to introduce it again, I object to the introduction of it, and insist upon the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The resolution itself involves a question of privilege, and it is in order.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I rise for the purpose of inquiring whether the resolution was presented to the House, or whether it was only read at the Clerk's desk for information? I did not understand that it was presented to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia presented the resolution, and withdrew it, as he had the right to do.

Mr. MILLSON. My own purpose in offering it was to enable me to address to the House, in order, my remarks, which would otherwise have been out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia stated that his purpose, in offering it, was that he might address the House in order. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] has the floor.

Mr. ORR. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me, I would say that I hope he will not renew the resolution. The scene of yesterday was a painful one; but the gentlemen have come forward this morning and tendered an apology to the House, and I think, looking to the precedents set many years ago, that the House would perhaps be chargeable with treating those gentlemen harshly, if it were to carry this investigation any further.

I think the House is disposed to let the matter rest at the point at which it has now arrived. I shall on Monday make an attempt to introduce a rule, which, if adopted, I think will operate, to a certain extent, as a corrective in future in reference to the occurrence of such difficulties. I hope my friend from Virginia will not press his resolution at this time.

Mr. McMULLIN. I am not clear as to the correctness of my views upon this question. I am free to confess that I did not hear—although, perhaps, I did not hear what the gentleman said very distinctly—that explanation which was sufficient to satisfy my mind in reference to this matter. I think it was due to both these gentlemen that the matter should have been referred to a committee for investigation. I confess, very frankly, sir, that I am not entirely satisfied with the explanations which have been made by these gentlemen. I am the last member in this House who would desire to see the rules of this House violated.

I am free to admit that I am liable, from the impulsiveness of my nature, to become involved in such difficulties as much as any other member of the House; but, sir, if I violate the rules of the House, I desire to be dealt with by the House in the same manner that I wish to see any other members dealt with.

But, sir, I find there is a difference of opinion among the members around me in reference to the policy of withdrawing the resolution first offered by my colleague from the Norfolk district, and now renewed by me. Many gentlemen concur with me in the opinion that the matter between the gentlemen from Tennessee ought to go to a committee. But I will not consume the time of the House longer by any further remarks. Having expressed to the House my views upon the subject, I will relinquish my purpose of pressing a consideration of the resolution, and, at the instance of the gentleman from South Carolina, withdraw it.

Mr. BROOKS. I ask the House to allow me a single moment. I wish to give notice that if the resolution which my colleague [Mr. ORR] has indicated, is introduced, I shall offer the following as an amendment:

Resolved, That any member who brings into the House a concealed weapon shall be expelled by a two-third vote.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms shall cause to be erected a rack in the rotunda, where members who are addicted to the carrying of concealed weapons shall be required to place them before entering this Hall, and that they shall be exposed to the inspection of the curious as long as the men are employed in legislation.

The reading of the resolutions was greeted with much applause and laughter.

ANOTHER PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the attention of the House for a single moment to a matter of personal explanation.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to any further personal explanations.

Mr. WASHBURNE. Just one word.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE. I trust the gentleman will do me the justice to withdraw his objection.

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; I do not withdraw my objection.

[Cries of "Oh! withdraw it!"]

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw my objection, if the House seems curious to hear the personal explanation.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I renew the objection.

Mr. WASHBURNE. By whom is objection made?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to put such an interrogatory to the Chair.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I make the objection, sir; and for good reasons.

SUPERINTENDENCE NATIONAL ARMORIES.

Mr. KEITT, by unanimous consent, from the special committee on the superintendence of the national armories, submitted a minority report on the subject; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

CLERK FOR POST OFFICE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER. On the resolution allowing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a clerk, the main question has been ordered to be now put. The yeas and nays have also been ordered on its adoption.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 51; as follows:

Taylor, Tracy, Trout, Vassant, Tappan Wentworth, and Wheeler—51.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BENTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill, which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, made the order of the day for to-morrow, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Don Juan Vigil, of New Mexico.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the rules be suspended; and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

[Here several messages were received from the President of the United States, by Mr. SIDNEY WEBSTER, his Private Secretary.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose these messages ought to be disposed of at once, and I therefore withdraw the motion to go into committee.

THE GADEEN TREATY.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, then laid the following message before the House:

To the House of Representatives:

I have received information that the Government of Mexico has agreed to the several amendments proposed by the Senate to the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Mexico, signed on the 30th of December last, and has authorized its Envoy Extraordinary to this Government to exchange the ratifications thereof. The time within which the ratifications can be exchanged, will expire on the 30th instant.

There is a provision in the treaty for the payment by the United States to Mexico of the sum of $7,000,000 on the exchange of ratifications, and the further sum of $3,000,000 when the boundaries of the ceded territories shall be settled. To be enabled to comply with the stipulation, according to the terms of the treaty relative to the payments therein mentioned, it will be necessary that Congress should make an appropriation of $7,000,000 for that purpose, before the 30th instant, and also the further sum of $3,000,000, to be paid when the boundaries shall be established. I therefore respectfully request that these sums may be put at the disposal of the Executive.

I herewith transmit to the House of Representatives a copy of the said treaty.

FRANKLIN PIERCE.

WASHINGTON, June 20, 1854.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to refer the communication to the Committee of Ways and Means, and that it be printed; and upon that motion I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's motion; and it was agreed to.

EXPULSION OF THE GREEKS FROM CONSTANTINOPLE.

The SPEAKER then laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of State, with accompanying documents, in compliance with a resolution of the House introduced the 30th ultimo, and containing the speech of the American Minister at Constantinople upon his presentation to the Grand Turk, and the correspondence of the Minister touching the expulsion of the Greeks at Constantinople.

The communication, on motion, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

FOREIGN INTERVENTION.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report and accompanying papers, from the Secretary of State, in answer to a resolution of the House introduced the 24th of April last, requesting the President to communicate to the House, if, in his judgment, not incompatible with the public interests, the instructions referred to by President Monroe in his annual message, as to the right of foreign nations to interfere in the affairs of this continent.

The communication, on motion, was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now renew my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORR in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 48, "making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855."

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is upon the following amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON:]

For completing the custom-house at St. Louis, Missouri, $100,000.

For completing the custom-house at Mobile, Alabama, $65,000.

For completing the custom house at Cincinnati, Ohio, $40,000.

For completing the custom-house at Louisville, Kentucky, $40,000.

For completing the custom-house at Bangor, Maine, $20,000.

For completing the custom-house at Bath, Maine, $20,000.

For completing the custom-house at Wilmington, Delaware, $12,000.

To purchase a site for the custom-house at Providence, Rhode Island, $24,000.

Debate on the amendment having been exhausted when the committee was last in session,

Mr. BENTON moved a pro forma amendment to increase the appropriation one dollar, and said:

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, containing these various items of appropriation, has been before the House several times; and I think the objects of the appropriations are well understood by the House. They come recommended by as many titles as have ever been given in favor of any appropriations put into any bill. In the first place, they come recommended by the Government, in the annual message to Congress. In the next place, they have received the sanction of the House in separate and distinct votes. They have also received the sanction and the vote of the Senate; and they have likewise received the approbation of the Committee of Ways and Means. But we have been very unfortunate in not finding a suitable place in which to put this amendment. We are like the guest whom every one is willing to see brought to the feast, only that there is no chair for him. Let him sit down in whatever chair he may, he finds that the place is preëngaged.

At last we have got now to the civil and diplomatic bill; and that is precisely the place where the original appropriations were made, and is also the place in which they have been sometimes continued. We wish, then, to save this chance of putting the appropriations into this bill where they originated; and if we lose this chance, we are defeated altogether. We can hardly expect to get a separate bill through for this purpose at this late period of the session. I have only to say, Mr. Chairman, that it requires almost forty-one pages of printed matter to comprise these appropriations for all parts of our America, except the great valley of the Mississippi—except the Mississippi river itself—with these custom-houses which are now yielding more revenue than is collected in some of the custom-houses of the Atlantic board, for which large appropriations are made without the slightest hesitation.

We hope, Mr. Chairman, that we will not lose this last chance of doing a little for this great Mississippi river, which, in the present improved state of navigation, is actually a prolongation of the sea; actually a communication with all parts of the world, in carrying our foreign commerce, as well as our domestic commerce. We hope that that consideration will be sufficient to induce the committee to legislate these appropriations, which have so often received the deliberate judgment of the House and of the Senate.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the gentleman's amendment read, nor do I know what it is. I am, however, opposed to any amendment putting in these custom-houses. The matter has been discussed so thoroughly here, that I presume the House understands the merits of it as completely as it is possible for it to do. I am exceedingly anxious to get along with this bill, and therefore I hope the House will come to a vote on this matter as soon as possible.

Mr. BENTON, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

The question recurring on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON,]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PRATT and CASKIE were appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers made reports by installments, understood to be—ayes 68, noes 66.

Mr. HAMILTON. I call for a recount, if there is any doubt as to how the vote stands.

Mr. PRATT, (one of the tellers.) There were sixty-eight in the affirmative and sixty-six in the negative, as near as I can make it out.

Mr. PECK. I understand the tellers do not report positively.

Mr. PRATT. I will say to the House that it is impossible for tellers to keep a correct account, so long as members, after the votes in the affirmative and negative are announced, continue to come up and vote, one in the affirmative, another in the negative, and a dozen at a time; some on one side, and some on the other. No man can keep an account under such circumstances.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to inquire of the tellers if they are able to report?

Mr. PRATT. I say that, as far as I can make it out, there were sixty-eight in the affirmative, and sixty-six in the negative; but I cannot swear to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRESTON. I ask the Chair if the tellers have not reported?

The CHAIRMAN. They have made an equivocal report. [Laughter.]

Mr. CASKIE, (one of the tellers.) I will state to the Chair that we did agree in our count; but that, in consequence of the confusion, we were not so absolutely certain as we should otherwise have been.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the vote stands sixty-eight in the affirmative, and sixty-six in the negative.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LATHAM. I offer the following amendment:

For purchasing a lot on which to build a custom-house in San Francisco, California, $150,000.

Mr. Chairman, I will say, in advance, that it is a matter of great economy for the General Government to buy a lot on which to build a custom-house in San Francisco. The Government is now paying $117,600 per annum for rent of the custom-house in San Francisco—as follows: for custom-house proper, we pay $2,000 per month rent, for appraiser's office, $1,800 per month, and for three warehouses we pay $6,000 per month, amounting in all to $9,800 per month, or $117,600 per annum in the way of rent, to collect the revenue in San Francisco.

Now, then, Mr. Chairman, there has been some difficulty connected with the title to the lot in San Francisco on which it was proposed to build the custom-house. I am pleased to say that such difficulty is now removed, and the General Government can secure a valid title to it by paying $150,000 to the State. The State set up a title to it, and I think there is no doubt entertained by any one that she had a large interest in it. The Legislature of California have recently passed an act ceding its interest to the General Government, upon the payment of the one half of its assessed value. Well, sir, the United States appraiser general, and the president of the board of State land commissioners, have fixed the value of the entire block proposed to be ceded as follows: The value of entire block at $500,000; the value of the leasehold interest of the United States at $200,000; and the interest of California at $300,000. Upon this question of the value of this block, let me call the attention of the House to the following message of the Governor of California, and two assessments inclosed to me by the Governor:

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
BENICIA, January 16, 1854. }

To the Senate and Assembly of California:
I have the honor herewith to transmit a copy of a communication from the Board of California Land Commissioners, in relation to the present actual value of certain property in the city of San Francisco, known as the "Custom House Block."

The commissioners, it will be seen, estimate the value of the property, on which the General Government desire to erect a custom-house, at $500,000.

It is proper here to state that this estimate is deemed by many well informed citizens as very reasonable, and that the property at any time would command a greater amount in cash at public sale.

Five hundred thousand dollars is certainly a large amount to be at this time diverted from the means relied upon to liquidate the debt of the State, and relieve our people from burdensome taxation, and I therefore hope that the State's interest in this valuable property will not be released by her agents, until it can be done without prejudice to the credit of the State of California and welfare of the people.

In view, also, of the fact that this property, by solemn acts of the Legislature, stands pledged for existing State indebtedness, it is at least questionable whether, in justice to the creditors of the State, it can be donated to the General Government until the debt for which it has been pledged shall have been paid.

A large amount of the existing debt, as is well known, was incurred by the State in defending her people in the years 1850 and 1851 against hostile Indians, the annual interest upon which now amounts to the sum of $67,495 69.

This debt, principal and interest, it is maintained, should, in justice to California, be assumed, in some form, during the present session of Congress.

The assumption of the war debt and the restoration of the "civil fund" would, it is believed, place the finances of the State in a condition to justify the donation of this property to the General Government, and still preserve inviolate the pledged faith of the State.

But should Congress fail or refuse to sanction the just claims of the State, the agents of California, although anxious in this matter to favor the General Government, and facilitate the erection of public buildings, will be compelled to carefully husband and judiciously apply all her resources until her entire indebtedness shall have been paid.

It is true that other States of the Confederacy have unconditionally released to the General Government their title to property for similar purposes, but there is no evidence that the property so released, as in this case, was of great value, or that circumstances existed imperatively requiring the State to guard carefully her sources of revenue, and to apply the proceeds in payment of liabilities previously incurred.

The history and condition of California are, indeed, peculiar. Her exigencies have hitherto been without parallel; and in legislating for her wants, it is, therefore, clear that we cannot be guided, in all cases, by precedents established in the common course of events, in the other States of the Confederacy.

It is deemed proper, in this connection, to state that the correspondence from the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the property in question, addressed to the Executive, as stated in a communication presented to the Senate on the 13th instant, has never been received by me.

JOHN BIGLER.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA, January 18, 1854.

SIR: General Douver's favor, of date 16th January, is received, and we take pleasure in replying.

Judging from the prices offered for similar property to the block bounded by Washington, Jackson, Sansone, and Battery streets, in this city, we think that block, with title undisputed and the immediate possession, would be well worth from five hundred and fifty thousand ($550,000) to six hundred and fifty thousand ($650,000) dollars.

We are, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servants,
PALMER, COOK & CO.

Hon. JOHN BIGLER, Governor of State of California.

SAN FRANCISCO, January 16, 1854.

SIR: In answer to your inquiry as to the value of the block in this city bounded by Jackson street on the north, Battery street on the east, Washington street on the south, and Sansone street on the west, we have to say, that, from actual sales, with perfect titles, around this property, it is worth at present, in round numbers, six hundred thousand dollars. Of course, if sold now, it would not bring the State that amount, in consequence of the lease of Palmer, Cook & Co. Remove all conflicting claims, and it will readily bring the above-mentioned sum.

Very respectfully,
SELOVER & SINTON,
Real Estate Auctioneers.

From these communications, it will appear that the assessment of the appraiser general of the United States, and president of California land commission, is not at all large or extravagant. A more liberal donation has not been made by any State of the Union to the General Government for building a custom-house. Why, sir, in 1832 the General Government paid $19 35 per square foot for a lot on which to build a custom-house, in the city of New York; in Boston $17 85 per square foot was paid, in 1837; and in Charleston, for the same purpose, in 1839, there was paid $6 68 per square foot. But in this instance the State of California gives to the General Government a valid title to a lot for building a custom-house, at the rate of less than two dollars per square foot. Why, but recently, for purchasing an assay office in New York city, we paid $535,000 for a lot but thirty-five feet on Wall street by eighty-five feet deep, or at the rate of $118 per square foot. Now, then, here is a lot in the very heart of the metropolis of the Pacific, amounting to an entire block, and facing on four important streets, and in the very midst of the business portion of that city, for which the Government will have to pay less than two dollars per square foot. In a few years it will be worth to the Government $3,000,000 or $4,000,000. Will this House refuse to pay this small, beggarly sum to the State of California, for its interest in this lot, so generously conceded by the terms of its legislative act to the Government? Why, we pay now a larger revenue in the Treasury than any State of the Union, excepting only New York. It is probable that Massachusetts may exceed us, but I doubt it. Is the Pacific coast, then, to be denied this custom-house, because California will not give all its interest to the General Government, after the lucid statement made of the case by the Governor in his message. You have already expended near $100,000 in piling this block; and, in addition to this loss, the General Government must continue to pay $117,600 per annum rent to collect the customs in San Francisco. Let us see if even this sum will be denied us.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It seems to me that it would be better for the gentleman to modify his amendment so as to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to ascertain whether a lot in San Francisco can be purchased or not. The difficulty, I understand, in erecting a custom-house there, has been in procuring a site for it. Until we do know what it is we can do, it seems to me that we are acting in the dark in making this appropriation for a site. The information, I suppose, could be obtained by the next session of Congress, which is now very close at hand. When we receive it, we can act understandingly. It is important that there should be a custom-house there, and there will be one there, no doubt, on a pretty large scale.

Mr. LATHAM. We can act advisedly now, because the Legislature of California has passed a law ceding all interest in the lot to the General Government on payment of $150,000. That law has been signed by the Governor, and is now in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. Therefore it was I made this motion of amendment. The interest in the lot can only belong to the General Government, or the State, because it is below high water mark. It comes within purview of the law of Congress ceding overflowed lands to the State. There is no doubt of title in the world.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to reduce the appropriation five dollars.

Mr. Chairman, I know something of this subject. This particular lot is one about which there is not the slightest difficulty, so far as the title is concerned. It was recently appraised, by persons appointed for the purpose, at $300,000. The committee will understand that the State government of California has had some little difficulty about the title to this site. It was claimed by some that that State ought to give the General Government a site for the erection of this edifice. California could not see any justice in that claim; nor do I; but the Legislature, after fixing the title to the lot selected, agreed that the Federal Government should have it. It was appraised, as I have said; and to show the liberality of that State, the Legislature agreed that the General Government should have the lot for half its appraised valuation.

Is California to have no custom-house? Already an attempt to purchase a lot for the purpose of building a custom-house there has resulted in heavy loss, in consequence of defective title. Now, when everything is perfect and complete; when the sum is half the valuation of the property; when it is indispensable to public uses that there should be an establishment of this description there above all other places in the country, will this committee refuse to appropriate the sum requisite to secure the site?

I will state, further, that the Federal Government at this particular time is paying for buildings for its necessary uses an amount of rent which would in two years complete this establishment. As a matter of economy and finance—I speak advisedly, as having been there, and as having daily knowledge of what was passing there—it is important that we should make disposition of this matter. I do trust that this committee will not hesitate to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from California; and I desire to withdraw the amendment which I have submitted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from California if the Secretary of the Treasury desires the purchase of this lot, or that this appropriation should be made? Has he, in any communication made to the House, expressed such a desire?

Mr. LATHAM. I will state, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] that I am not authorized by the Secretary of the Treasury to make any statement in regard to the matter. I have had several conversations with the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to this subject, and it was in pursuance of my understanding of these conversations that I have offered this amendment. In a conversation which I had about two months since, in connection with my colleague, with the Secretary of the Treasury, upon this subject, he expressed the desire at that time that the State should relinquish her interest, in order that we might go on with the building of a custom-house at San Francisco, if Congress would make the appropriation. Since that time the Legislature of California has passed a law ceding its interest to the General Government, upon condition that she receives $150,000. The law has been approved by the Governor, and I received an official communication by the last steamer that such is the fact.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not choose myself to throw any obstacles in the way of the erection of a suitable custom-house at San Francisco. But I do think, that we should proceed upon some recommendation, some data furnished to us by the Treasury Department, as to what they can do, and what it is desirable they shall do. It is desirable at least that we should have something by way of data from the Secretary, upon which to base our action, that might go into the documents of the country.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I now withdraw my amendment.

The question recurring upon Mr. LATHAM's amendment,

Mr. LATHAM demanded tellers; which were ordered; and Messrs. DAVIS, of Indiana, and PERKINS, of New York, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes forty-eight; not a majority of a quorum. [Cries of "Count the other side!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, pursuing the precedent set him, will ascertain whether there is a quorum in the Hall or not.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That is not the legitimate way of doing so. The roll should be called.

[Cries of "Count the other side!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places, and take the vote.

The tellers proceeded with the count, and reported—ayes 59, noes 46; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was called; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. JONES, of Tennessee) having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and having found itself without a quorum, had ordered the roll to be called, and directed him to report the following list of absentees:

Messrs. James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Ball, Banks, Bissell, Bockock, Boyce, Brooks, Bugg, Carpenter, Caskie, Chase, Clingman, Craig, Cullom, Cutting, Dean, Dent, Dick, Disney, Dowdell, Drum, Dunbar, Dunham, Edgerton, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Etheridge, Franklin, Fuller, Gamble, Green, Grey, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hendricks, Hubbard, Hiestler, Howe, Johnson, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kidwell, Kittredge, Lamb, Lane, Leitcher, Lilly, Lyon, Macdonald, McNair, McQueen, Maurice, Maxwell, Meacham, Morgan, Morrison, Nichols, Olds, Packer, John Perkins, Phillips, Richardson, Robbins, Rogers, Sage, Seymour, Shannon, Simmons, Samuel A. Smith, Sollers, Alexander H. Stephens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, Tweed, Vail, Wade, Walbridge, Walsh, Warren, Israel Washburn, Wells, John Wentworth, Yates, and Zollicoffer.

One hundred and forty-eight members having answered to their names, the committee resumed its session.

Mr. LATHAM. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to alter the verbiage in the amendment which I offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. LATHAM. I also ask leave of the House to have the letter of the Secretary read, which I send up to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the better plan will be to allow the amendment to go in, and let it be voted upon in the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Here is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Finance Committee of the Senate which I ask may be read.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will allow the amendment to go in, and have it acted upon in the House.

The amendment proposed by Mr. LATHAM was then read, as follows:

For purchasing a site for the custom-house at San Francisco, California, a sum not exceeding $150,000.

The letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was then read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 12, 1854.
SIR: I have the honor to inclose, for the information of the Committee on Finance, copies

1. Of a letter from Governor Bigler, of California, with a certified copy of an act of that State, providing for the relinquishment to the United States, on certain conditions, of the title of the State to the square of ground in San Francisco which had been selected for the site of the new custom-house, and on which a large sum has been expended by the United States to prepare the ground for said building.

2. A letter from R. P. Hammond, collector of the district of San Francisco, on the subject of the expediency of the Government's taking the property on the terms demanded by the State, and paying the sums necessary to quiet the title and obtain immediate possession.

3. A letter from S. J. Bridge, general appraiser for the Pacific coast, and also one of the arbitrators named in the act of the State, giving his opinion of the value of the square, and of its adaptation to the uses of the Government.

In this connection I must ask your attention to my letter to you of the 22d March last, in which I alluded to the large outlay already made on this ground; the doubt existing as to the title, under which the work was directed to be suspended; the delay which thereby results to the contractor, for which he may claim compensation, and the annual rents now paid in San Francisco, for Government purposes. Under the impression, at the date of that letter, that California would not release her title to this property, I suggested the propriety of an appropriation sufficient to enable the Department to purchase another property, with buildings already upon it, for the accommodation of the custom-house, and other public establishments. The two propositions are now before the committee, and they will be able to determine which it will be most judicious to adopt.

The condition in the act of California which subjects the ground to perpetual appropriation as the site of the custom-house and other Government buildings, and forfeits it to the State if otherwise disposed of, or sold, is a grave objection to the terms prescribed, and would, moreover, prevent the Department, under the joint resolution of 11th September, 1841, from making the purchase unless special authority be given for such purchase. Looking, however, at the subject in every point of view—the delay which has already taken place, the need of the accommodation proposed, and the perhaps larger expenditure which must be incurred if the Government abandon the contract, and goes elsewhere, I feel bound to say that I think it will be for the public advantage, notwithstanding the objectionable restriction referred to, to accede to the terms demanded, and go on with the custom-house as it has been commenced.

I must refer, also, to my letter to you of the 29th December last, which inclosed a letter from Messrs. Hammond and Bridge, recommending an appropriation of $75,000 for building an appraiser's store on the custom-house lot.

It will be perceived that Mr. Hammond recommends an appropriation for the purpose of compromising with certain persons who claim title to or occupy portions of the lot, and thereby quieting the title and obtaining present possession. But I cannot think—as these claimants are merely leasees, and the terms of the lease will expire in November next—that anything more is necessary than to pay for the improvements of those who may have taken possession without claim to title.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,
JAMES GUTHRIE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER,
Chairman Committee on Finance, U. S. Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I withdraw all objection to the amendment.

The question was then taken upon Mr. LATHAM's amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. I offer the following amendment:

For building a marine hospital at Vicksburg, State of Mississippi, $55,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that amendment until we get through with the custom-houses. I believe there are three more items yet to be disposed of. Let us get through with them first.

Mr. SINGLETON. I withdraw the amendment for the present.

Mr. PRESTON. I desire to move an amendment, but before doing so I will, with the consent of the committee, state its substance. It is a proposition reported by the Committee of Ways and Means in their bill recommending appropriations for custom-houses, and placing guards around the expenditure of the money contained in the said appropriations, making certain rules and regulations to be observed in such expenditures. I have no desire to prevent these guards from being thrown around these appropriations; but, on the contrary, I desire to see the proviso reported by the Committee of Ways and Means added to the amendment which has just been adopted, by which these custom-house appropriations have been ingrafted on the bill. I presume this amendment will meet the views of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, because I understand he has been instructed to report such a proviso to the appropriation for the Richmond custom-house. I myself see nothing objectionable in this proviso, and I therefore offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, and ask to have read.

The amendment was read as follows:

Provided, That none of the moneys appropriated for any building in and by this act, or by any former act, and now remaining unexpended, shall be used or applied for the purposes mentioned in this act by the Secretary of the Treasury, until a valid title to the land for the site of such building, in each case, shall be vested in the United States, and until the State in which such building is to be completed shall in due form, and in a manner that shall bind such State, release and surrender to the United States jurisdiction over the site of such building; and shall also duly release and relinquish to the United States the right to tax or in any way assess said site, or the property of the United States that may be thereon, during the time that the said United States shall be or remain the owner thereof. And that none of the said moneys appropriated for any building by this act, or heretofore appropriated for the purposes mentioned, and now remaining unexpended, shall be used or applied for the purposes for which they are appropriated, unless the same shall be sufficient in each case to complete the building in such case fully, and entirely accomplish the object for which the appropriation in this act is made. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby prohibited from using or applying any of the moneys aforesaid in any one case, until he shall have made a contract with such security as he shall approve for the completion of the entire building and work in such case, at a sum not exceeding the sum of the moneys appropriated and unexpended in such case. And the said Secretary of the Treasury shall enter into no contract, either conditional or final, for the purposes mentioned in this act, which shall involve an expenditure in any one case beyond the sums appropriated and remaining unexpended for such case; and in all cases where such unexpended appropriations shall be insufficient to complete the entire work in such case, the said Secretary of the Treasury shall suspend all action in reference thereto, and shall report to Congress on the first day of its session, the condition of the work in such case, and shall at the same time lay before Congress such plans and estimates as, in his judgment, shall be proper for the completion of the building and work in such case.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the bill by adding as follows:

For improving and repairing the room in the custom-house at Savannah, used as the post office, $1,000.

Mr. S. said: In explanation of the amendment, I ask the reading of the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, June 19, 1854.

SIR: In answer to your note transmitting a letter from the postmaster of Savannah, Georgia, I have to state, that it has, as I am informed, been usual in fitting up buildings to serve the double purposes of custom-houses and post offices, to finish the interior portions designed for each purpose, and to place in them all the permanent fixtures suitable for each branch of business, including desks, counters, tables, and letter and paper cases. The part of the building assigned to the post office in Savannah, so far from having been furnished with the permanent fixtures above-mentioned, was not even floored, and it is now without a floor, although all the rooms occupied by the custom-house have been floored. This, the postmaster has justly complained of, and it has not been in the power of the Department to aid him.

The only fund provided by law for the administration of the respective post offices, is derived from commissions and box rents. At Savannah, these are insufficient to afford the maximum compensation to the postmaster which the law permits; and he could not, therefore, floor and fit up his office, without diminishing his compensation to the extent of his outlay. He estimates that one thousand dollars would be sufficient for the purpose, and I think it just and reasonable that that amount should be reappropriated out of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the Savannah custom-house, which passed into the surplus fund.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES CAMPBELL,

Postmaster General.

Hon. JAMES L. SEWARD, House of Representatives.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move, by instruction of the Committee of Ways and Means, to amend by inserting after the custom-house appropriations the following:

To complete the custom-house at Richmond, Virginia $150,000.

The balance of the amendment is similar to the amendment of my friend from Kentucky, which has been adopted by the committee.

Mr. PRESTON. I suggest to the gentleman that, by unanimous consent, his amendment might be inserted before the proviso just adopted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It is not necessary to repeat the conditions of this amendment with the other also in the bill, but let the same conditions apply to each.

Mr. HOUSTON. My friend from Tennessee will see that this is a distinct amendment, and requires a distinct vote in the House, and I have therefore reported it as the committee instructed me.

Mr. PRESTON. I think that we had better not repeat the amendments in the same language.

The question was then taken upon Mr. Houston's amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. RITCHIE, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following amendment:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to apply such sum as in his opinion may be necessary to complete the building for the custom-house, post office and court house in the city of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, to furnish such building in a manner appropriate to its uses, and to the improvement of the grounds attached to said building; and also to pay the two commissioners who superintended the construction of the said building such compensation as the said Secretary shall deem just, not to exceed three dollars a day each, provided that the sum as aforesaid to be so expended by the Secretary of the Treasury shall not exceed the sum now remaining unexpended of appropriations heretofore made on the said building.

This amendment has passed the committee every time it has been introduced hitherto. It asks no additional money whatever.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Does it give the Secretary of the Treasury power to expend as much money as he pleases?

Mr. RITCHIE. It confines the Secretary within the original appropriation; and after all this has been done, there will still be a large balance left in the Treasury unexpended.

The question was taken upon Mr. Ritchie's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The following clause was then read:

For the annual repairs and fixtures of custom-houses of the United States, $25,000.

Mr. PHELPS. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment: After the word "States," to strike out "$25,000," and insert in lieu thereof "$30,501 59;" and, at the end of the clause, to insert the following:

For alteration and repairs of the custom-house at Baltimore heretofore made, and for rent of rooms during the repairs on said building, such sum as may, by the Secretary of the Treasury, be deemed reasonable and proper, said amount not to exceed $5,501 59.

The amendment I have offered explains itself. It is to pay for repairs that were made upon the custom-house at Baltimore, and to pay for rent of a room used while repairs were being made upon that building.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAVEN. I propose to offer an amendment, for which, however, I have not the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means. All that I desire to say in regard to it is, that it is for the purchase of the assay office in the city of New York. I have no particular desire about it, but I think it right that it should be disposed of along with these custom-houses that are before the committee. I desire to offer my amendment now, without making any argument about it, one way or the other.

Mr. HENN. Before the gentleman from New York offers his amendment, I would ask him to yield me the floor, to enable me to offer an amendment, which it is proper should come in along with the custom-houses.

Mr. HAVEN. I withhold my amendment for a moment.

Mr. HENN. Then I propose the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, Ohio, $25,000;

To complete the marine hospital at St. Louis, Missouri, $10,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Chicago, Illinois, $8,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Louisville, Kentucky, $12,500;

To complete the marine hospital at Paducah, Kentucky, $5,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, Indiana, $2,000;

To complete the marine hospital at San Francisco, California, $40,000; and

To construct a marine hospital at Burlington, Iowa, $15,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I raise a question of order so far as this amendment is concerned. It is this: the latter part of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa applies to the commencement of a new marine hospital. Therefore, it is not in order in this bill, there not being authority of law to initiate such works.

The CHAIRMAN. That being the state of facts, the Chair decides that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is out of order. This committee has no right to originate the building of any new marine hospital.

Mr. HENN. I would reply that this is merely an amendment containing appropriations passed by the Senate in the deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Iowa state whether there is any new building provided for in his amendment?

Mr. HENN. I must confess there is.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire now to offer my amendment.

Mr. SINGLETON addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] has the floor. He only yielded it temporarily to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAVEN. If the amendment which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] desires to present has reference to custom-houses, it is proper that he should have the floor first.

Mr. SINGLETON. It relates to a marine hospital.

Mr. HAVEN. The gentleman's amendment does not relate to custom-houses. Therefore I desire to offer my amendment here.

Mr. HENN. I understand that the Chair has entertained a motion just now which provides for the purchase of a lot at San Francisco to build a custom-house thereon. There was no provision of law previously to this time for the purchase of that lot. Now, I want to know by what authority, under the rules, that amendment was presented and entertained, while that submitted by me is ruled out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is sufficient for the Chair to state in reply to the question of the gentleman from Iowa, that there was no question of order raised on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from California, [Mr. LATHAM,] but that there has been a question of order raised on that introduced by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HAVEN. I now submit my amendment.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

"For the purchase of the lots or parcels of land, with the appurtenances and the buildings thereon belonging, the one thereof to the Bank of Commerce, and the other thereof to the Bank of the State of New York, and particularly referred to and described in two contracts, one with each of said banks, for the leasing and right to purchase the same, bearing date the 19th of August, 1853, $530,000: Provided, That before the said purchase is completed, the State of New York shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over said land and property, and shall by law exonerate the same, and the property of the United States thereon, from all taxes, levies, and assessments thereon, whilst the same remains the property of the United States."

Mr. HAVEN. I think that the committee understands this matter sufficiently well, without any suggestions from me. It is, therefore, unnecessary that I should take up the time of the committee in relation to this matter. It is fully explained in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has asked for the appropriation. The committee has not forgotten what has taken place heretofore on the subject, nor has the committee, I presume, overlooked what is stated in the little book which is on the table called "Finances." I understand that the granting of this appropriation will be a clear gain to the Treasury of some two or three hundred thousand dollars. The rent we are now paying, $56,000 a year for the two houses, is more than the interest at six per cent. upon the amount here proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would ask the gentleman from New York if the Committee of Ways and Means have recommended this appropriation?

Mr. HAVEN. In answer to the question, I will say that I stated to the House when I first rose, that I was charged with the recommendation from no committee, although, when it was offered to the deficiency bill, I was instructed to do so.

Mr. CHANDLER. It does not belong to this part of the bill.

Mr. HAVEN. That is for this committee to judge. It is in order as an amendment to this bill, if it is in order to legislate upon the subject at all.

Mr. CHANDLER. I asked the honorable gentleman from New York whether the amendment was recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means? He answers that it was not. I think the matter had better be passed over, as no inconvenience will result from doing so.

Mr. HAVEN. I appreciate the advice of my friend from Pennsylvania, and have no doubt it is well intended, but I much prefer to follow the dictates of my own judgment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I was not advising the gentleman, but the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBBINS. I entirely concur with my colleague, [Mr. CHANDLER.]

Mr. FLORENCE. And I apprehend that this committee will do so too.

Mr. DE WITT. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the amount five dollars. I have listened to the debate upon this subject with a great deal of attention, but, thus far, in silence. Sir, I regret only the necessity of this debate, because I regret that there is a custom-house upon the face of the earth. But still, sir, while it is the policy of this Government to raise its revenues by imposts, I shall vote for the erection and maintenance of suitable custom-houses, wherever they are necessary. I have learned that when the act was passed at the last session of Congress for the establishment of an assay office in the city of New York, and which was approved by the President a year ago last March, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to carry that act into effect. I confess I have admired the skill, care, and economy which was manifested by that officer in carrying that act into effect, and, as a practical man, I am at a loss to understand why the appropriation is withheld. Certainly economy does not prompt it.

To what part of the city of New York can you go where you will find a location so well fitted for the purpose of an assay office as this which has been selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, and for so little money? If an assay office is to be established in the city of New York at all, the location chosen is a good one. I wish the assay office were to be located in this city. But Congress has thought proper to locate it elsewhere; and, therefore, I do hope, from motives of economy, and in view of the wants and condition of the great commercial city of New York, and in view of the benefit which is to accrue to the people who have so much to do with the assay office, that this appropriation will be made, and that the great work will be carried forward.

I admire the location; I admire the plan proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, because it saves money. Sir, we are paying much more than the interest upon the money it is proposed to expend in the purchase. The rent which you are paying would, in the fifteen years, amount to much more than the cost of the site. The property will sell at any time; it would sell to-day at a profit. I took the pains, the last time I was in the city of New York, to go and see this location; and I think the Secretary of the Treasury has done right in making the selection. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. HAVEN. Did I understand the gentleman from Massachusetts as being in favor of the adoption of my amendment?

Mr. DE WITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAVEN. Then I will not make any remarks in opposition to the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, because I do not see any necessity of reducing this appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must state to the gentleman from Virginia that the gentleman from New York has approved the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMITH. I think the Chair is mistaken. The gentleman from New York rose to oppose the amendment; but when he found the gentleman from Massachusetts was in favor of the original amendment, he did not oppose it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must decide that no further debate is in order. The gentleman from New York rose in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and it was not necessary that he should have spoken five minutes to have exhausted the privilege of debate under the rule.

Mr. SMITH. I understood the gentleman from New York as being in favor of the amendment.

Mr. HAVEN. The amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts was to reduce the appropriation, and certainly I was opposed to it.

Mr. DE WITT, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SMITH. I now move to amend, by increasing the appropriation one dollar.

Mr. Chairman, I have made up my mind to go for the amendment of the gentleman from New York; and as I shall probably have no opportunity to state why I have thus made up my mind in the House, because I suppose the matter will be disposed of there under the operation of the previous question, I take this opportunity of stating now the reasons why I shall go for it.

We have a very large amount of money on hand in the Treasury, which is lying unproductive—paying us no interest whatever. Now, sir, under the contract which I understand has been made, for the lease of this property for fifteen years, we shall pay annually interest equal to ten per cent. upon the money necessary to purchase the property. If this amount be appropriated, the property is purchased, and the interest is at once extinguished, instead of paying ten per cent., as we are now doing. As a financial measure, therefore, whatever may have been my opinion as to the propriety of the original contract, I hold it to be our duty to support the amendment. Looking at the matter in this light, I shall vote for the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. McMULLIN. I am not disposed to attack the Administration, or any member of it. I confess, however, that I am opposed to my colleague's amendment, as well as to the custom-house amendment which has been adopted by the committee. I am perfectly willing to vote legitimate appropriations to Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis; but I cannot yield my assent to appropriations for the construction of buildings merely to beautify and adorn those cities. Let me tell the committee a fact within my own knowledge. There was made an appropriation of $50,000 to purchase a site, and erect a custom-house at Norfolk, and that amount was amply sufficient for the purpose.

I am told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that the whole amount appropriated to the Norfolk custom-house, was $110,000. The last appropriation was $50,000. Perhaps I may be in error; but the argument is the same. If $110,000 be sufficient to purchase a site, and construct a custom-house at Norfolk, why is it necessary to appropriate $200,000 each to Cincinnati, Louisville, and St. Louis for custom-houses?

Gentlemen have the idea that it is necessary your custom-houses should be built fire-proof. Let them be fire-proof; but to make them so it is not necessary that they should be built of fine marble, at an enormous expense. Fire-proof buildings can be constructed of brick, and there is no necessity for the hauling from a great distance of marble, or granite, for their construction.

But I must say, in all candor, that I think the Secretary of the Treasury, in his estimates on these custom-houses, has far exceeded what was required for the completion of buildings. Go to the custom-house at St. Louis. The foundation has not been laid, and there is only an excavation there; yet Congress is called on to make most exorbitant appropriations, more extravagant than ever before made, in reference to this particular class of buildings. My word for it, that gentlemen on this side of the House, who support these appropriations, will perceive, when it is too late, that they are held responsible for them.

I hope when we are called to vote on these appropriations in the House, that they may be voted down. Their adoption will hazard the bill, and thus stop the wheels of the Government. I for one am willing to shoulder the responsibility of defeating the bill, if it is to be loaded down with these amendments. Gentlemen around me say that they are willing to do so also. This legislation does not suit me or my constituents. When gentlemen come to give a record vote, I think these appropriations will all be voted down. They defeated the deficiency bill; and they will jeopardize the passage of the one under consideration, if adopted. I hope on the record vote every gentleman may be in his place. With a full House we can vote them down, and with a full House I hope we may do so.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the committee rise.

[Cries of "Oh, no!"]

Mr. FLORENCE. I move then to reduce the appropriation one dollar.

I do not desire to make factious opposition to this large appropriation. The sentiment of this committee, and of the House itself, has been expressed already this session against this amendment. I made a motion that the committee rise, and I desire the committee to understand that my object in doing so was, that we might take up this subject to-morrow morning, when we may have a fuller expression by the committee upon this subject than we can get at this time. I would have greatly preferred that the appropriation had been submitted under a recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means. That is another reason, independently of the reasons before given, with which this House and committee are familiar, why this appropriation ought not to be made.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FLORENCE] will not submit the motion that the committee rise. If gentlemen do not take up the time in offering too many amendments, we may be able to get to a vote upon the bill by yeas and nays to-morrow morning. The Committee of Ways and Means at one time recommended the amendment now offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] and at that time I voted for it. I believe it is the best of the alternatives presented, but I do not intend to move it again in this bill.

The question was then taken upon Mr. FLORENCE's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. HUGHES. I propose to increase the appropriation one dollar.

It was not my intention to have made any remarks upon the subject of this appropriation. I should have left it for gentlemen representing the city of New York to speak upon this subject. Living, as I do, far in the interior, and in a remote district of that State—one of those districts in which residents of the city of New York say the citizens scarcely know enough to dodge the omnibuses that thread the streets of New York, I feel no immediate or particular interest in this appropriation. I am eminently national, so far as my feelings are concerned; and if gentlemen of the city of New York do not see fit to take care of their interests in this particular, I am willing to aid them in doing so.

I do not see the necessity of the overweening anxiety manifested upon the part of my friends from Pennsylvania upon this subject. I cannot understand it at all. Every time any one has spoken in favor of this assay office in New York, gentlemen from Pennsylvania have seen fit to object. Is there to be a monopoly in these matters? If there is, it is time the country knew it, and it is time that New York knew it, and acted accordingly. I, for one, am willing, in all the great interests of Pennsylvania, not to call upon the gods for assistance, but to put our own shoulders to the wheel and assist her in the matter, and extend to her the same kindness and courtesy which I would see exercised towards the State of New York.

It has been said that this amendment does not come as a recommendation from the Committee of Ways and Means. But this matter is not brought before the committee now for the first time. It was recommended to this committee by the Committee of Ways and Means. It was acted upon and received the indorsement of the House, as it has also received the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury. It has been called an eminently wise and just appropriation. Why, then, do the gentlemen of this committee hesitate in approving it? Is it because Pennsylvania puts in a protest against it? In whose name, and by what right, does Pennsylvania protest against this appropriation?

This building for the assay office in the city of New York is now held by lease. It is an object of wisdom and economy that the Government should own it; own it not only for the purposes of this assay office, but also for other purposes connected with the interests of the Federal Government. Economy points the way, and the question is, will this committee follow? Or will they use the misguided judgments of those who, I fear, for selfish ends, seek to have an assay office in Philadelphia, and in Philadelphia alone?

I call on this committee, then, to look upon this matter as one which has been recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, and which has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. Look upon it in the light of a wise economy, and pass this appropriation.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rejoice, Mr. Chairman, for the sake of his people, that the honorable gentleman on my right [Mr. HUGHES] has uttered, on this floor, the word "economy," "true economy." He says there seems to be a monopoly for Pennsylvania. A monopoly! Why, sir, the money which is spent by the National Government on the city of New York would have realized the promise of the Incas of Peru to the Spanish conqueror; it would have paved Broadway with gold ingots from the harbor up to its extreme point.

And while they talk of this monopoly, Pennsylvania has voted that the city of New York should have an assay office. Pennsylvania does not ask to recall the vote which the last Congress gave for the assay office; but she asks gentlemen of this House, she asks gentlemen who speak here as national Representatives—as my honorable friend [Mr. HUGHES] says he does—to look a little to economy.

We were told, on the floor of this House, that this building should not cost more than $100,000; and when it was stated that the Mint in Philadelphia—a large marble building—had cost $250,000, we were sneered at as a sort of spendthrifts. An appropriation of $100,000 was asked for this New York assay office; and the Secretary of the Treasury—whose economy has been lauded by my friend on my left, [Mr. DE WITT], and hinted at by my friend on my right, [Mr. HUGHES]—has gone and taken the ground—though he has not yet built the house—at an annual expense of the interest of more than two millions of dollars. And we are talked to of economy, of monopoly, of national feeling!

Sir, I say let them keep what they have got; let them keep their assay office, and all that pertains to it; but let the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States know that this Congress does not sit still without expressing one word of reproof, or what is more for a man of feeling—without a silence which condemns such an assumption of power; that they cannot sit still and thus appear not to rebuke him for his interference in behalf of a monopoly which should pour the treasures of the nation, as it does the influence and patronage of the nation, into the lap of one city. I come here to ask nothing for Philadelphia; I ask nothing for her; but I ask not to be sneered at, when millions of the public treasure are wasted on that city.

And we are told that the question of economy is involved in this measure. I should blush upon the floor of this House if I could stand here, or sit here, and hear such sentiments as those offered, and not denounce them in tones such as my feeble voice can give utterance to. We should let the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States know that Congress is not to be made the mere recorder of his will and contracts. Nothing can take away the establishment of the assay office from New York; and no one desires to do it. But men on this floor do desire to say to that public servant, "You have gone far beyond the law, far beyond the customs of the Department, far beyond what was spoken of by the friends of the measure, or denounced by its enemies, far beyond what you were authorized to do by Congress." And now, sir, I say let the matter rest for a time as it is; let the amendment be rejected; let things stand as they are; let the country see that a wrong has been done, and though we cannot stop it now, though we cannot undo the work, we can prevent an extension or repetition of the evil. There must be some limits to this extraordinary exercise of power. We can say, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no further."

The question was then taken on Mr. HUGHES's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. ROBBINS. I desire to offer an amendment in the shape of a proviso.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

Provided, however, That no part of this appropriation is to be used, until the Secretary of the Treasury has entered into a negotiation with the lessors of the lot in question to get rid of said lease, and also has ascertained upon what terms said lease can be disposed of, and has reported the result of said negotiation to the next session of Congress.

Mr. ROBBINS. I do not desire to discuss this question in an improper spirit. I will only state, what is well known to this body, that at the last session of Congress $100,000 was appropriated for the purpose of establishing an assay office in the city of New York. Not only has that sum been expended, but a contract was made to expend $560,000 more for the purpose of purchasing buildings and grounds.

The object proposed to be accomplished by my amendment is to require the Secretary to inquire and see if he cannot dispose of this contract, and purchase a site somewhere else at a much more reasonable rate. If that proviso is adopted, it will save some two or three hundred thousand dollars to the Government.

I wish to say that it is not from any selfish feeling in reference to New York that I have offered the amendment, but because I desire to save this money to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CUMMING. I do not consider this a subject for the display of eloquence upon either side; for gentlemen will have better opportunities for that purpose. For my own part, I do not uphold the Secretary of the Treasury in the lease which he took in New York. I think if we can get rid of it we ought to do so. But it is a mere matter of dollars and cents.

This lease, of which so much has been said, is for fifteen years, at an annual rent of $56,000. At the end of the fifteen years, according as the matter stands now, we would have neither the land nor the buildings we might put upon it. If we should purchase this property for $520,000, which, I believe, it is offered for, we shall not only have it for fifteen years, but we shall have it for all time to come. If the appropriation be not made, we shall not only pay more than we are asked to appropriate now, but at the end of fifteen years we shall have to pay hundreds of thousands of dollars more to secure the property. It is a mere matter of dollars and cents; and I do not see how any man who wishes to consult economy can object to the amendment.

Mr. DAWSON. But the Secretary had no authority to make the contract.

Mr. CUMMING. The Secretary of the Treasury had full authority to lease a lot of ground for the purpose of an assay office.

Mr. DAWSON. For how long?

Mr. CUMMING. For an unlimited time, or at least for fifteen years.

Mr. ROBBINS. I ask for tellers upon my amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAWSON and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 56.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. ORR) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

S. No. 376. An act to improve the naval service;

S. No. 408. An act supplementary to an act entitled an "Act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better security of the lives of passengers on board vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, and for other purposes,' approved August 30, 1852;" and

S. No. 410. An act for the relief of James Dixon. In which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

Mr. MURRAY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at half past three o'clock) adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 22, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the half and mixed breed Miami Indians, praying that their annuities, which have been discontinued, may be restored to them, with the arrearages which have accrued; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CLAY presented a petition of inhabitants of Huntsville, Alabama, praying a reduction of the rates of ocean postage; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. CLAYTON presented resolutions passed at a meeting of citizens of New Castle county, Delaware, remonstrating against the ratification of any treaty with Great Britain, by which the agricultural interests of the country would be sacrificed; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GWIN. I present the memorial of John Charles Frémont, representing that he furnished certain beef, in 1851, for the use of the Indians in California, for which he has never received any compensation, and praying that a law may be passed authorizing the settlement of his accounts therefor, upon principles of equity and justice. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and as it gives a very succinct account of a matter of great importance to him, and requires immediate attention, I move, also, that it be printed.

Both motions were agreed to.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred documents in support of the claim of Sarah Morey, late the wife of James Morey, a soldier in the revolutionary war, for a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred a bill to amend the act approved August 31, 1852, entitled "An act making further provision for the satisfaction of Virginia land warrants," reported it back without amendment, together with a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred five petitions of widows of officers of the Army who have died in the service since the war with Mexico, praying to be allowed half pay for five years, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, on the ground that a general bill had already been reported, which would embrace all their cases. It was so ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I am instructed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom were referred a bill to establish a line of steamships from San Francisco, via the Sandwich Islands, to Shanghai, in China, and also a bill to provide for the transportation of the United States mails, in steamships, between San Francisco, California, via the Sandwich Islands, and China, and for other purposes, to report them back with an amendment in the form of a substitute. I am also instructed by that committee to say that, on Monday next, during the morning hour, they will ask for the consideration of the bills.

Mr. RUSK. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred a bill to provide for the transportation of the mails of the United States upon railroads, to report it back with an amendment. As this is a very important bill, I desire to give notice that at an early day I intend, during the morning hour, if convenient at no other time, to ask for its consideration of the Senate.

Mr. FITZPATRICK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Jesse D. Carr, a sutler in the second regiment of Tennessee volunteers, in the war with Mexico, praying compensation for property destroyed by the enemy on the 24th of February, 1847, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, to provide for the construction of a military road from Great Salt Lake City, in the Territory of Utah, to the eastern boundary of the State of California, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, to provide for the continuation of the military road from Myrtle Creek to Scottsburg, in Oregon, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, for the payment of the civil officers employed in the Territory of New Mexico, while under military government, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives to authorize the Secretary of War to settle and adjust the expenses of the Rogue River Indian war, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, to refund to the Territory of Utah the expenses incurred by said Territory in suppressing Indian hostilities, reported it back without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate, directing them to inquire into the expediency of allowing the States to return the flint-lock guns distributed by the law of 1808, to the Government, and take others in their stead, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives providing for the distribution of arms to the several States and Territories, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Catharine Dickerson, widow of John Dickerson, a revolutionary soldier, praying a pension under the act of 1838, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for her relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Phineas M. Nightingale, legal representative of General Nathaniel Greene, praying indemnity for losses sustained by General Greene becoming security for an Army contractor in the Revolution, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

On motion by Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the bill to regulate navigation to the coast of Africa, in vessels owned by citizens of the United States, in certain cases, be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SUMNER, agreeably to previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill making a grant of land warrants to the State of Massachusetts to aid in the construction of a tunnel under the Hoosac mountain, and providing for the conveyance of mails, troops, and munitions of war through the same free of toll; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. President, I present the petition of two thousand nine hundred citizens of the State of Massachusetts, asking, in the most brief and direct terms possible, for the repeal of the law known as the fugitive slave law of 1850. This petition is signed by persons of all professions and occupations, principally from the city of Boston and its vicinity. It is subscribed also by a large number of persons who have been in favor of the compromise measures of 1850. By reason of the altered position of those questions, on account of the passage of the Nebraska and Kansas bill of the present session, they have come to Congress with this petition for the repeal of the fugitive slave law. I ask, sir, that it may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which, I believe, is the appropriate committee.

Mr. DIXON. I hope the vote will not be taken now on the proposition to refer the petition, which has just been presented by the Senator from Massachusetts, to the Committee on the Judiciary. I desire myself to make some remarks upon the proposition which is contained in it, and I know that there are some other Senators here who desire also to be heard upon it. I hope its further consideration will be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I have no objection.

The PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the further consideration of the petition will be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. I would suggest that the petition take the ordinary course, and be referred now.

Mr. SEWARD. Let it lie over until to-morrow. A Senator wishes to speak on it.

The PRESIDENT. If there be objection, the Chair will put the question on the motion of the Senator from Kentucky, to postpone the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very anxious to give the Senator from Kentucky every opportunity to discuss the question, but it seems to me the natural course with regard to this petition, is to refer it according to the motion of my colleague.

Mr. DIXON. I do not object to the reference; I merely wish to have the question on it postponed until to-morrow.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

ALEXANDRIA AND WASHINGTON RAILROAD.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia to report back the bill authorizing the extension of the Alexandria and Washington railroad into the District of Columbia. I am directed by the same committee to ask that the Senate will, by unanimous consent, consider and pass the bill now, the great object being to get legislation upon the subject at this session, in order that this road may be constructed.

I will say to the Senate, in a few words, that there is now, as is probably known to most gentlemen here, a continuous railroad communication between Alexandria, which lies six or seven miles below Washington, and the city of Richmond, in Virginia, and from Richmond to the extreme South. This interval of six or seven miles between Alexandria and Washington is the only part of the communication between the North and South that is now required to be filled up by a railroad. The Legislature of Virginia, at its last session, granted a charter to construct a road from the town of Alexandria to some point to be designated, opposite to the city of Washington; and I am informed that the company formed under that charter has obtained the means, and is prepared to construct a road. But to construct a road to terminate on the opposite side of the river, opposite to the city of Washington, would not be by any means to form an intercourse by railroad between the town of Alexandria and the northern cities, or between the extreme South and the extreme North. That company, therefore, asks permission, by this bill, to lay a temporary railroad across the Long Bridge, as it is called, and from the Long Bridge a like temporary railroad through the city of Washington to connect with the depot of the Baltimore and Washington railroad, in this city, to pass through such streets in the city, and to construct their depot in such a place as the authorities of the city of Washington may agree upon.

I am further informed, and believe, that if this bill is passed at this session of Congress, that road, which will be but six or seven miles long, will be completed by the close of the year. It is therefore desirable that the law should be passed.

I would further state to the Senate that, although this charter was granted at the last session of the Legislature of Virginia, during the last winter, the presentation of this bill has been delayed up to this time, because the Virginia company have been endeavoring to get some bill agreed upon in the House of Representatives, which would be satisfactory to the corporations of Georgetown and Washington. The town of Georgetown, it seems, is opposed even to laying a temporary track across the Long Bridge, or to bringing in the road to the city of Washington; but the committee of the House of Representatives at last agreed upon a bill which they are prepared to report to that House as soon as the rules of the House will permit the report to be made. The bill which I now report back to the Senate from the Committee on the District of Columbia is a copy of that House bill.

The bill proposes further that this, which is intended to be a temporary arrangement, shall not be understood to commit the action of Congress in any way as to any future structure that may be authorized across the Potomac river, by which a permanent communication can be had between the North and South. It is, so far as the passage of the river is concerned, strictly temporary in its character.

Now, with all my respect for the town of Georgetown, which is really very great, I cannot but consider it a little unreasonable in that town that it should object to this temporary arrangement under the apprehension—for it seems to be under that apprehension alone—that if this temporary track be laid upon the existing Long Bridge, it will give some air of durability to that bridge. The Long Bridge has been there for more than forty years. It has been a source of serious annoyance and of serious injury and loss to the town of Georgetown, and yet it remains. Whether it will ever be deemed wise, on the part of Congress, to remove it, I do not know; but I am sure the Senate will agree with me that it would be extremely unwise to defer this most important communication between the North and South until we can decide between the District cities as to whether that bridge shall remain or not.

This bill was read twice, and referred to the committee. I now report it back without amendment, and ask that it be put upon its passage. At the same time, at the request of the Mayor of Georgetown, I ask leave to present a memorial on the subject, and to have it read with the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to authorize the Alexandria and Washington Railroad Company, incorporated by the Legislature of Virginia, on the 27th of February, 1854, to construct a railroad from Alexandria to Washington, to extend their road from any point on the Virginia side of the Potomac river into the District of Columbia, and to lay their railroad track or tracks over the Potomac bridge, and up to such point or points in the city of Washington, connecting with the Baltimore and Washington railroad by the most direct and practicable route, through such streets or avenues as the corporate authorities may provide, with the understanding that the permission thus granted may be revoked by Congress at pleasure, and is not to be considered as an expression of opinion by Congress that the present location of the Potomac bridge is the proper one.

It further proposes to authorize the company to construct a bridge over the Potomac river, on or above or west of the aqueduct of the Alexandria Canal Company, but if it be built on or over the piers of that aqueduct, it must be done with the consent of the Alexandria Canal Company, and in constructing the bridge and crossing the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, the bridge and railroad shall be so constructed as not to injure or obstruct the use or navigation of the canal.

It also authorizes the company to extend their road from the point where it shall cross the Potomac river, to such point or points within the cities of Washington and Georgetown as may be respectively approved of by the corporate authorities of these cities, and makes other provisions which are usual for carrying on the business of railroad corporations.

Mr. MASON. At the request of the Mayor of Georgetown, I now ask that the memorial, to which I have referred, be read.

The memorial was accordingly read.

Mr. MASON. That memorial was put into my hands a few moments before I reported the bill. I looked into it, but did not read it through. I learn now for the first time its character, and I think that these gentlemen of Georgetown, who have signed it, when they come to reconsider what they have done, will find that they have done really an unfortunate act—an act unfortunate to the interests

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JUNE 23, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 93.

of their town. Sir, the statement in that memorial that this application is insidiously made, is one that ought not to have come from Georgetown. I do not know whether it is aimed at the Virginia company, which proposes to construct the road, or at the assumed rival of Georgetown, the city of Washington. But let it be aimed at either, it is uncandid, and unfortunate that it was made.

The foundation for the charge of insidiousness contained in the memorial is, that it is not to be expected—I think, in the language of the memorial—that men who knew the value of money, would expend the amount required to construct a railroad eight miles long for purposes only temporary. Now, sir, that is uncandid, because all who know the country, know that a railroad coming to Washington city across the Potomac, with a view to unite with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, must, for the far greater portion of its length, go in the same direction, whether it crosses the river opposite to the city of Washington, or whether it crosses it at Georgetown; so that it is uncandid to declare that the alleged purpose of this bill is to make a temporary road from the city of Alexandria to the city of Washington. What I stated was, that it was intended to make it temporary, to diverge from the main stem to connect with the Long Bridge, and then to come to the city of Washington. I am informed that a railroad passing from Alexandria across the Potomac will, whether it comes to Georgetown or comes into the city at the Long Bridge, go across some mile, or little more than a mile, of these cities.

I do not mean to be at all harsh in any strictures upon Georgetown; but this will not tend to conciliate opinion, when the question really pending between the two cities comes to be determined by Congress, whether the bridge shall be constructed where the water is broad, or where the water is narrow.

I suppose, upon the question of economy, that if it is for convenience and fitness to construct a road to pass through Georgetown, they will adopt it, because it would require a shorter bridge, the water there being narrower. They would be very unlikely to construct a bridge opposite the city of Washington, where the river is a mile or more wide, at a proportionate increase of expense. But the object to be attained by the present bill, is to enable this company to bring their road at once into connection with the Baltimore and Ohio railroad, and they can only do that by means of a bridge that is made; and the attempt on the part of Georgetown is to prevent that great public convenience being adopted at once, lest in doing so they should give an air of support to the existing bridge between the two sides of the river.

I am free to declare that my sympathies always have been with Georgetown in this matter; because the Long Bridge, erected at the expense of Government, as I stated, has been one of serious loss and injury to that city. It has obstructed the channel and filled the river with mud and flats, so that at low tide it is difficult to tell where the channel is, or whether there is any channel at all. I believe it is due to that city, in some way, that the nuisance to them should be removed; but I say again, that they have not come here with this memorial in a form likely to conciliate public opinion, when it charges insidious motives on the proposition.

Mr. PRATT. I understand the honorable Senator, in the speech which he has made, to state the fact that the bill is to give an air of permanence to the Potomac bridge.

Mr. MASON. The allegation of the memorial is that that is their apprehension.

Mr. PRATT. Well, sir, that is not an apprehension which they unreasonably indulge. The Senator has correctly said, that the existence of this bridge is of great detriment to the commerce of Georgetown; and we all know that to a great part of Washington it is also very detrimental, inasmuch as disease is produced in that part of the city, occupied by the President's House, and the vicinity, coming within reach of the miasma occasioned by some seventy acres of land being exposed to a hot sun, an exposure which is made consequent upon the existence of this bridge.

Mr. President, I understand the Mayor and the citizens of Georgetown have held, or intend to hold, a public meeting upon this subject, and their papers connected with it have been given in charge to the honorable Senator from North Carolina, who is not now in his seat; and it is the desire of the Mayor of Georgetown, if it meets with the approbation of the Senate, that the Senate should consent not to vote upon the bill to-day, so that their views upon the subject may be expressed intelligently to the body.

In reference to this matter, as a question of practical importance, I will ask the attention of the Senate, and the honorable Senator from Virginia, to what I state. There is a railroad, as we all know, from Baltimore city to within sight of the Capitol. The object is to make a railroad connecting the Virginia road with the Baltimore road at that point. How is that connection to be formed? Not by locomotives passing through the streets of Washington, but by simply substituting railroad cars drawn by horses, for the omnibuses which now carry the passengers from the depot to the Virginia road.

I cannot imagine that that is a question of great public convenience which should induce the Senate to pass the bill against the unanimous desire of the people of one of the cities of the District under our exclusive legislative jurisdiction. I do not suppose we will act upon this bill precipitately, when the convenience to be answered by it is the simple substitution of railroad cars, drawn by horses from one part to another, in the place of omnibuses or carriages which are now supplied for the convenience of the public. Indeed, I do not know but that it is just as convenient a way for the people, who are traveling from one point to another, to be transported from one depot to another in omnibuses, as in the way proposed by the bill. This does not present, then, that case of great public interest or importance which should induce the Senate, representing, as we do, the whole power of legislation over the part of the District which is unanimously opposed to it, to pass the bill to-day without permitting them to have their views presented to the Senate. I move, therefore, that the bill lie upon the table.

Mr. DAWSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. That motion is not debatable.

Mr. PRATT. I will withdraw the motion, if, after the remarks which I have made, the Senator desires to submit his views now. I have said that the Mayor of Georgetown sent his papers, with the information which that corporation desire to present to the Senate, to the honorable Senator from North Carolina who is not now in his seat; and my only object was to ask the postponement of the subject until that Senator should be present.

Mr. DAWSON. So I understand.

Mr. PRATT. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. DAWSON. As one of the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which this subject was referred, I desire to say that we have had it under consideration, and as far as the Mayor and Aldermen of Georgetown were concerned, they were before us yesterday, and we appointed to-day to hear them in relation to the passage of this bill. After the granting of that application the request has been withdrawn, and, instead of the papers necessary to communicate the information to this body being still in the hands of the committee appointed to take charge of the interests of the District, they have been submitted to a gentleman having nothing to do with the committee; and now, in consequence of his absence, they claim a postponement, and thus indirectly to prevent action upon the bill.

Now what is the proposition here? No man, Mr. President, can have a stronger desire to sustain the rights and interests, in every point of view, of Georgetown, than I have. What is the proposition now presented? It is whether the right of way shall be granted to connect the railroad from Washington city to Baltimore with Richmond, Virginia, and the entire South, by passing over the Long Bridge, and making a depot here, to connect with the Baltimore depot?

The objection presented by Georgetown is this, and no more: that they fear, if you suffer the railroad to be run over that bridge temporarily, it will be a reason why the bridge shall be made perpetual; and their object is to have that bridge removed, and one constructed at Georgetown. That is the object; and the question now presented is this: whether this great public convenience, this connecting link, shall be suspended so as to prevent its being executed before the winter shall come on? The railroad companies from Boston, round to New Orleans, are exceedingly anxious to have this link filled up; and the only reason which is given why it should not be filled up, is this argument against the Long Bridge.

I have proposed to the city of Georgetown and the city of Washington, that, at the proper time, a motion should be made to destroy the Long Bridge, and build another in a different place; but Georgetown says "No, notwithstanding that, we do not want the public to be benefited by filling up this link, for fear that the bridge will not be removed hereafter." Shall this apprehension of Georgetown postpone this great convenience to the public from one end of the Union to the other?

My friend from Maryland puts it upon this ground: Where is the difference between a connecting link across the bridge by omnibuses or by railroad cars? My friend well knows that the connecting link in the city of Baltimore and in the city of Philadelphia, is all by railroad cars drawn by horses. Now, he says, what is the difference? Why, sir, I pass through this place frequently as an individual coming to this city, and I land upon the other side of the water in a storm, when rain or snow is descending. I must get out there, find an omnibus, carry my baggage from place to place, and be exposed in every form and shape. If there was a railroad there, the baggage would be brought over according to the plan adopted at Baltimore and Philadelphia, and we should all get into the cars and come secure to the other depot, without getting into A, B, C or D's omnibus, at nine, ten, or twelve o'clock at night, or four in the morning.

I consider this attempt of Georgetown as a most extraordinary effort to go against public convenience, and not for the benefit of a single individual of the country. It is to suspend the public convenience merely to prevent an apprehension on the part of Georgetown that it may operate as a reason wherefor the bridge shall not hereafter be removed. Sir, the bill says that this is merely a temporary arrangement; and those who undertake to fill up this link say that it shall be done by the next session of Congress. Georgetown would consent to the bill for the railroad as soon as the bridge was removed. And what was the reply of the committee? I believe the reply was unanimous—my friend happened to be absent at the time—that we will have the road built now, not for the purpose of transporting produce, but as a mere temporary arrangement to test the practicability of this form of railroad going over hill and dale without grading. The bill says that when Congress says it shall be stopped, it shall be stopped. If this can be done by the time Congress meets again, and the railroad cars can be drawn by horses and pass through the city without obstructing anybody's rights, how can it injure Georgetown? It cannot do it. Georgetown contends for a new bridge above, and she says that, if one should be built below, it would destroy the channel. In reply to that, I say that I will move to remove the Long Bridge at the proper time. They say we cannot consent to this. I submit to Congress whether the North and South—whether the public convenience—the convenience of every man traveling from the North to the South, and from the South to the North, shall be suspended upon such a consideration, and whether the bill shall be postponed after the papers have been withdrawn from the Committee on the District of Columbia, and put into the hands of an individual Senator, who is to appear partially, in all probability, to argue the question as a lawyer?

In opposing this practical measure, which ought to be granted under the circumstances, Georgetown is going against her own interests. My friend from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] and myself, both, whenever we have had an opportunity, have declared that we should be willing to go for a bridge at the "Three Sisters." We have done all that men can do. But Georgetown is now going against her own interest in thus opposing the public convenience. I hope the bill will not be ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. PRATT. I was very unfortunate in the remarks which I made, or certainly my friend from Georgia did not correctly understand them, and has not replied to them. He distinctly admits, as does the Senator from Virginia, that he is in favor of removing the Long Bridge as a nuisance in point of health to the citizens of Washington, and as a great inconvenience and positive injury to the citizens of Georgetown. They are both in favor of removing the bridge. Now, their proposition is to authorize a railroad to be made over it. I apprehend, Mr. President, that it would be a better policy to suffer the present mode of communication to continue as it is, in view of their own opinion that the bridge ought to be removed. If it be a nuisance in point of health to the people of Washington, if it be an injury inflicted by the legislation of Congress upon the people of Georgetown, it ought to be removed at once, and we ought not to give to the public the idea that the bridge is to be continued, by authorizing a railroad to be made over it. My friend from Georgia, as well as my friend from Virginia, points to the great importance of having the road constructed. I ask the attention of the honorable Senator from Georgia, and I ask the attention of the Senate to what I stated before in reference to this question of convenience. Where is the public importance of this connection? My friend from Georgia says that in Baltimore they have, through the streets of the city, a connection by railroad cars, and that they have the same in Philadelphia. My friend is undoubtedly mistaken with reference to both those places. They go in omnibuses from the terminus where the passengers are carried in railroad cars, both in Philadelphia and Baltimore, a longer distance than they are now carried in omnibuses between the two points here.

Mr. MASON. I ask the Senator whether both in Baltimore and Philadelphia, for several years, the cars brought to the city by locomotives were not taken into the city by horse power, until they were enabled to perfect an arrangement to carry their locomotives into the city? That is the very thing which is proposed to be done here—that the company shall be allowed to bring the same cars across the bridge into the city of Washington, to connect with the Baltimore road, by horse power, until the two cities and Congress can agree where they will build a permanent bridge to bring the locomotive in.

Mr. PRATT. Prior to the recent change of the depot in Baltimore, the railroad cars were drawn by horse power down Pratt street from the intersection with Light street, in the center of the city. That depot was changed; and I say now, from all the business portion of the city, from that portion of it to which my friends from Georgia and Virginia go to their hotels, they are obliged to go in omnibuses or carriages just as far as passengers coming now from the North would be obliged to go to this bridge to connect with the southern railroad in Virginia. As I understand, it is the same at Philadelphia; it is certainly so in Baltimore to my own knowledge.

Mr. DAWSON. I would inquire whether passengers going to Philadelphia do not go through the city, from the Washington depot to the Philadelphia depot, in cars?

Mr. PRATT. Going to Philadelphia?

Mr. DAWSON. Certainly. I am speaking of the passengers going to Philadelphia.

Mr. PRATT. That may be so in going to Philadelphia; but I speak of going from this point here. My honorable friend from Georgia spoke of the delay and inconvenience which is caused to the traveling community here. I ask any gentleman whether he would not prefer, after riding for a day in a railroad car, the change from the cars into a carriage or omnibus, to travel a mile or half a mile. I certainly should. It is a matter of taste; but there is certainly no great public convenience involved in it. The use of the horse cars does not make the passengers go more rapidly from one depot to another. The cars are undoubtedly to be drawn by horse-power alone, and they will not go any faster from one depot to the other than the omnibuses or carriages drawn by the horses will go. Public convenience, therefore, whether on account of the mails or of the passengers, exists. I humbly apprehend, only in the taste or imagination of my honorable friend.

Mr. RUSK. I shall vote against ordering the bill to lie on the table, and shall vote for the bill very cheerfully. I shall do so on two grounds. One is, that it proposes to make an experiment, without any cost to the Government, of a new invention, by which great grades can be overcome with safety. There are many persons who believe this can be effected by the plan proposed by the gentleman who is to build this road. After investigation, I happen to be one of those who think it will be successful; and if it should turn out to be so on this experiment, without cost to us or damage to anybody, it will be a matter of vast importance to the public generally in reference to railroads.

There is another reason why I shall vote for the bill. It is for the benefit and convenience of the traveling public. I think that one of the greatest mistakes which railroad companies have made, and one of the greatest abuses to which travelers by railroads are subjected, is the influence that particular cities and towns have in being made stopping places. It is the cause of the loss of time and money. Every inducement is held out to the passengers for the purpose of inducing the spending of money.

The question, in my mind, presented by the bill, is between a great public benefit on the one side, and the interests of Georgetown on the other; and if you will accomplish only the great public benefit, and throw in not only the interests of Georgetown, but the interests of Washington, and the interests of Baltimore, and half a dozen other cities, I think we should look to that benefit which will result from it, in preference to a local benefit to a particular city.

Mr. WALKER. I do not think I shall be able to vote for this bill; and I wish to state the reasons why I shall not. I do not think that these railroad companies would have any great desire for the connection, unless it were a benefit to themselves. I feel entirely indisposed, in the first place, to extend a benefit to any such monopoly as that which constitutes the road from here to Baltimore. I think there is no greater imposition upon the community than that which it is enabled to practice. Until very recently, we had to pay for traveling from this city to Baltimore, on this railroad, the very highest rate of stage fare. For a long time, the fare was six and a fourth cents per mile, and more recently, we have had to pay four and a half cents a mile. The company then reduced the fare to $1 25; but, when one of the Senators from Delaware and myself had occasion to pass over the road, not long since, and when we made application for our tickets, we found, if not to our gratification, at least to our surprise, that the company had been so gracious as to pop the fare up to $1 50, making it three and three-fourths cents per mile to Baltimore. If there is any way to restrict that company in that species of oppression and imposition, and they can be brought to it, I shall be willing to give them favors; but I am not willing to extend to them favors for practicing such egregious impositions.

This road may not be the one particularly interested in this connection, but it is evidently interested to a considerable extent. When that corporation is willing to do right, it may then, with clean hands and with better grace, ask that Congress may extend favors to it. But let us look at this matter again. This road is to be permitted to pass through Washington city. It is to pass up the streets, across Pennsylvania avenue, and then to the Baltimore depot. Any person who is acquainted with the topography of the city in the vicinity of the Long Bridge, will know that to construct a railroad there, one street of the city at least must be ruined as a street, for there will have to be a deep cut made. They cannot overcome that grade in any way, unless it is by some new plan which has been discovered.

Mr. RUSK. A plan has been discovered.

Mr. WALKER. It has been discovered then by the person of whom the Senator speaks; but, in my opinion, the cut will have to be made there, and continued from that point until you reach the canal, thus utterly ruining that street. You will then have to cross Pennsylvania avenue. Any one who will take the least trouble, if he does not already know it, to inform himself of the topography of the city, will see that what I say must be the result.

But, sir, suppose the cars stop at the further end of the Long Bridge, the transportation by omnibus would not then, I believe, exceed one half the distance which the passengers in Philadelphia in the evening train at least, have to travel to go to the New York depot, as they take the omnibus at the Broad street or Schuylkill depot, and are taken clear up to Kensington, I believe, about six miles.

Mr. CHASE. Five miles.

Mr. WALKER. Five, the Senator from Ohio says. That is the way Philadelphia manages. When you get to Baltimore, you stop at the Washington depot, within sight of the city, to leave the cars and pass into horse cars which take you clear from the city limits to the Philadelphia depot, where you again take the cars. Either of them is a greater distance, I should think, certainly that at Philadelphia is nearly twice as great, than the distance from the Baltimore depot in this city to the further end of the Long Bridge. Then, taking into consideration these three points, the injury to the streets of the city, the gratification it will afford to an already turbulent and overbearing corporation, and the fact that the mode of conveyance through the city now subjects the passengers to no greater inconvenience than they experience anywhere else, I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. The question of maintaining the Long Bridge has been a subject of debate in this body for years past. I have uniformly voted against appropriations to maintain it, on the ground that I regard it as a public nuisance. I recollect that some two years ago we voted down a proposition to repair it, on the ground that it was a public nuisance, and that, in justice to the citizens of Georgetown and others interested, it ought not to be maintained. Subsequently, however, the vote was reconsidered, and an appropriation made, which prepared the bridge for travel for the time being. Sir, I am familiar with this question, for I speak as a member of the Committee on the District of Columbia. When we met yesterday morning four were present; three of whom were in favor of this proposition, and one against it. I opposed it on the ground that if this company should have the privilege proposed to be granted under the bill, it will, to a certain extent, exclude the ordinary travel of the country. That bridge is insecure now for the ordinary travel of the country. I submit it to the commissioner who lately repaired it, whether it is not an unsafe bridge, saying nothing about the additional wear and tear which will be put upon it by giving a railroad company the privilege of passing their cars across it. You cannot give that company the privilege without, as it were, excluding, to a certain extent, the travel which goes over it now. It is not wide enough, or strong enough, to admit both.

There is another insurmountable objection in my mind. Why give to this company privileges which we do not extend to others everywhere? Why should we, out of the public Treasury, furnish to this company a bridge? There is no reason for it. The practical view of this subject in my mind is this: A bridge may be built at a point above Georgetown, where the distance will not exceed three hundred or four hundred yards at the furthest, and the Long Bridge is something like a mile in length. By passing to a point three miles above this, a bridge can be had that will answer the wants of this road, and the wants of the company. If the company are willing to deal fairly, if they are anxious about a permanent bridge, I have no doubt that the public Treasury could be employed in defraying a portion of the expenses. The railroad would be accommodated, the ordinary travel of the country would be accommodated, and we could do what we ought to have done a long time ago—remove the Long Bridge which is, and has been for years, a nuisance.

The objection presented by the honorable Senator from Georgia, amounts, in my mind, to no objection. No greater inconvenience or embarrassment exists here than in Pittsburgh. There the western cars go to Alleghany City, cross a bridge nearly as long as this, penetrate to the heart of the city, or, indeed, go to the eastern limits of the city, before they reach the depot of the eastern roads. The case is similar in Philadelphia, and also in Baltimore. From the western depot, in Baltimore, the passengers are carried in omnibuses to the eastern depot, for New York.

A SENATOR. By cars.

Mr. BRIGHT. I say there are no cars from the western depot. I speak of the depot connecting with Pittsburgh, not the depot of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company. From the western depot, connecting with the Pittsburgh road, passengers are carried by omnibuses to the eastern part of the city, for the New York train. So it is in the cities all over the Union. No greater inconvenience exists or results here, than exists at various other points; and there is no reason, in my mind, why this nuisance should be kept up. One of the principal objections to the passage of the bill is, as I stated before, that it will be maintaining, for the time being, a bridge that ought to be removed; and in proportion as you give it consequence now, and throw around it railroad influence, which is generally potential, so far as regards legislation, in that proportion it will be maintained from time to time. For that reason I am against any further appropriation, saying nothing about my unwillingness to give up the streets of this city for railroad purposes.

Mr. MASON. There need be no hesitancy in passing the bill in its present shape. The honorable Senator who has just taken his seat says that he can do nothing which will give countenance, or even apparent countenance, on the part of Congress, to the continuing of the present bridge. Why, sir, at the present session, when that bridge was injured by fire, it was repaired, and cost some four or five thousand dollars, and I have no doubt the Senate is prepared to vote the appropriation necessary to defray that expense. Within the last two years it was broken down by a freshet, and both Houses voted an appropriation to repair it; and so they will continue to do until they shall determine to substitute some other bridge in place of it. The honorable Senator, and those who act with him, ask that we shall wait to form this connection between the North and South by means of the railroad, until this litigated question between the two cities, as to where a permanent bridge shall cross the river, shall be decided. I submit, most respectfully, it is a little unreasonable. I have said, and I repeat, I believe Georgetown has great cause of complaint because of the construction of that bridge; but I am not prepared to say, as the honorable Senator is, that I should vote to-morrow to remove it. Public convenience is too deeply interested in having a bridge communication across the river, to remove that bridge until another is substituted for it. I am satisfied that public opinion on both sides of the river will sustain me in that view. Although it be injurious to Georgetown, you must construct some other bridge before that is removed.

All that is asked by this bill is, that you will enable this company, which is about to construct a railroad between Alexandria and one or other of the District cities, to use that existing bridge as a temporary mode of crossing the river until you determine where you will make a permanent one. Suppose the policy of the Senator should be adopted, what would be the result? From year to year, for five, ten, or twenty years, the question would be debated between the two cities, as to where the permanent bridge should be constructed; and in the mean time, this gap, highly inconvenient and injurious to the community, would be left between the District cities and Alexandria. As to the experience of other cities, we know that they have been employed from year to year in endeavoring to overcome the inconvenience of having a gap between two roads that ought to connect. Take the city of Baltimore. Until within the last two years, I think, the cars went from the outside of the city limits into Baltimore by horse power; but they found the public convenience was implicated and would be promoted by changing the route of the railroad to carry it nearer the city. The honorable Senator said they go in omnibuses in passing from the North to the South. He is mistaken. They have adopted there what we ask the Senate to adopt here—from where the railroad stops with its locomotives, to allow a track to be made to bring the same cars, by means of horse power, to communicate with the other depot; and all that is asked in the world is that, until the important question to the two cities, as to where the permanent bridge shall be built, is decided, the railroad company may be allowed to use the existing bridge for temporary purposes. That is the whole of it.

As to what is said by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. WALKER] about interfering with the streets of Washington, I will not give an opinion. He has given an opinion. He says that anybody familiar with the topography of the place will find that, to carry out the purpose of the bill, it will be necessary to cut down and destroy one of the streets. I do not know that fact. I have been informed here by somebody, that Maryland avenue is already graded and cut down suitably for this road. How the fact is, I do not know. I do not aver it. It is said to be so. But I do know that the ingenuity of engineers, when it is important to make a railroad, will overcome any obstacle, and without serious injury to the adjacent country. The bill provides that the company shall bring their road through such streets as the city of Washington shall allow; and it provides the further safeguard that Congress may, at any time, revoke this legislation. I do not want to detain the Senate, but I trust the bill will not be ordered to lie upon the table, but will be acted upon at once.

Mr. BADGER. Mr. President, some years ago, when a portion of the Long Bridge was carried away by a freshet, and it was proposed to make an appropriation for its repair, I entertained and expressed the opinion which I have entertained since, for I have heard nothing as yet to change it, that so long as Congress should make appropriations to patch up that bridge, we never should be relieved from the nuisance which it now presents to the river, and the unjust encumbrance and obstruction which it offers to the commerce of the neighboring city; that so long as the bridge was patched up, we should get no other bridge; and I then expressed the wish, which I still entertain, that the freshet, instead of carrying away a part, had swept from the river the whole of the structure. So far, we have seen nothing done towards the erection of a new bridge. There stands the old structure; years have passed away; another accident has destroyed it partly, and it has been repaired without application to Congress, or without taking the judgment of Congress upon the question whether they were willing to make a further appropriation for its repair.

This bill, if I understand it—for I knew nothing about it until I came to the Senate this morning, some time after the discussion commenced—proposes to give to a railroad company the right to run its cars across the river on that bridge, and also to give to the company the right to run its cars through some of the streets of Washington.

Mr. MASON. By horse power.

Mr. BADGER. By horse power. Now, I am for conceding neither. I object to granting them the privilege of transporting their railroad cars across this bridge. I do not see any reason why it should be conferred; but I see, according to my view of the case, a strong reason why it ought not to be conferred. The more appliances that are employed to make that nuisance serviceable to anybody, or in any respect, will tend still more to perpetuate it—to put further and further off the time, which I hope to see, when it shall be removed, and a suitable bridge erected.

In the next place, I would not give my consent to authorize the running of railroad cars across that bridge, because it must be manifest that it was not made for such a purpose. It is not adapted for such a purpose. I cannot see how it could be otherwise than throwing out a trap, on the part of Congress, to railroad travelers, to trust their lives on a structure which was not designed for the end for which it is now urged to be used.

Then, Mr. President, I am not disposed to grant the privilege of running railroad cars, with horses, through the streets of Washington. I am not for conferring upon the corporation of the city the power to grant any such privilege. Sir, I recollect that when, some years ago, I was passing by railroad to the North, we used to be carried, at Baltimore, from the depot, a little way out of town, by horse power, to the interior of the city, and thence by horse power through the city; and the cars, after leaving the city, were attached to the locomotive. I find this changed. I find that, as soon as we reach the first depot in the city, we have to take a hack or carriage to bring us to the other depot. I find that neither in the city of Richmond nor in the town of Petersburg, on the railroad on which I am in the habit of traveling to and from this place, any such privilege is accorded. We have to pass through there in omnibuses. There must be some reason why this privilege is refused; and why, having been once granted in one place, it is withdrawn in another. I am not prepared to make such an experiment. I want to see introduced no additional dangers to the persons moving about the streets of Washington; and I am, therefore, not prepared to confer this privilege by an act of Congress directly, or to give the authority to the city of Washington to confer it.

I have seen nothing to satisfy me that the arrangements which we have made for the temporary patching of this bridge, from time to time, have done anything else than to retard the accomplishment of a great good for the sake of preventing a small, inconsiderable evil. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that I am not disposed to let this question rest until Georgetown and Washington settle it; not at all. I do not want ten years to pass away while they are settling the question where the permanent bridge shall be made. I wish to confer the power upon the President of the United States to select the location. I wish to make an appropriation to erect a bridge. I wish him to select the plan. I wish him to select the place, and have it constructed in such a manner as he shall deem best for the general good of the country. Certainly, Mr. President, under the present circumstances, I cannot feel disposed to vote for this bill.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire to move to postpone the further consideration of this subject until to-morrow, for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the special order, which is the indigent insane bill, and upon which the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BELL] has the floor. It is now past the usual hour for taking up the special order, and I therefore submit the motion to postpone.

Mr. BELL. I have no anxiety about having the subject postponed for my convenience.

Mr. STUART. I hope that will be done. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor on the indigent insane bill, and it is certainly desirable that we should dispose of that bill to-day. There is also another advantage which will result from postponing this subject. We shall have the bill printed, and can look at it and see what its provisions are. I hope, therefore, the Senate will agree to the postponement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PETTIT in the chair.) The question is on postponing the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. PRATT. And let the bill and memorial be printed.

The motion to postpone was agreed to; and the bill and memorial were ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill from the House of Representatives, to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad therein, was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

ANNUAL MEETING OF CONGRESS.

The bill from the House of Representatives to change the day for the annual assembling of Congress, was read a first time, and passed to a second reading.

PENSION LAWS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate take up the joint resolution relative to the administration of the pension laws, for the purpose of having it recommitted to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was recommitted.

SURGEONS' MATES OF THE REVOLUTIONARY ARMY.

Mr. DAWSON. The Committee on Military

Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution introduced yesterday by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PRATT,] "in relation to surgeons' mates of the Army of the Revolution," have unanimously directed me to report back the resolution, and request its immediate passage. It contains a principle which has been long established, and it merely seeks to destroy the distinction between a surgeon's mate and an assistant surgeon, which at present exists, according to the construction now placed on the law. I ask for the consideration of the resolution.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

No amendment being proposed, it was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

PORT OF DELIVERY AT MADISON, INDIANA.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred two memorials of citizens of Madison, Indiana, praying the establishment of a port of entry at that place, have directed me to report a bill "constituting Madison, in the State of Indiana, a port of delivery."

Mr. BRIGHT. I ask for the immediate consideration of that bill; it will take but a moment.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill is in the usual form of all the bills creating ports of delivery; and I move, therefore, to dispense with its reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

INDIGENT INSANE BILL VETO.

The Senate resumed the reconsideration of the bill making a grant of public lands to the several States of the Union for the benefit of the indigent insane persons which had been returned by the President of the United States with his objections.

Mr. BELL resumed and continued the speech which he commenced yesterday.

Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. President, it is now pretty late in the afternoon. The industrious Senators, I confess, are all here, and therefore, this would be a very proper time for me to make my speech on this subject, because I can now address my peers.

Mr. BADGER. I will suggest to my friend from Pennsylvania, that as those of us who are industrious are here, it is not worth while that the really useful men of the country should be broken down by too much labor. I wish, therefore, that he would allow me to move an adjournment. The country will have need of him hereafter.

Several SENATORS. Move a postponement.

Other SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I will yield to the wishes of the Senate. I understand that there are many Senators desirous to know what is contained in the Executive message, which has just been received from the President of the United States. Perhaps that will be more interesting than to hear my speech, but I confess I would rather proceed this afternoon. There are so few Senators present, and so few persons in the galleries, that I could proceed without interruption.

Mr. CASS. The Senator from Pennsylvania evinces so rare a feeling, that I think we ought to indulge him with going on now.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I understand that to-morrow is private bill day; and perhaps, therefore, I had better say now what little I have to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. PETTIT,) being about to put the question on the motion to postpone—

Mr. STUART. The Senator, I understand, is willing to go on.

Mr. ATCHISON. I think that is a very unreasonable proposition. Although the Senator may be willing to proceed, we are not willing, at this hour of the day, to listen to him. We prefer to listen to him at a more propitious time; and, therefore, I move an adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There are several Executive messages on the table.

Mr. ATCHISON. Then I hope the motion to postpone will be agreed to, and that we may have an Executive session.

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

SURVEYORS GENERAL IN OREGON AND WASHINGTON.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred House bill "to amend the act approved September 27, 1850, 'to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon,' &c., and also the act amendatory thereof, approved February 19, 1853," to report it back with an amendment, and recommend its passage. This bill is one of great interest to the people of Oregon and Washington Territories; and on that account, and because it will have to go back to the House if the amendment of the committee be adopted, I hope the Senate will now act upon it.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the bill as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STUART. The bill has been prepared at the General Land Office; and the Senator from Iowa can state the objects in a much shorter time than it will take to read it. I hope he will do so for the information of the Senate.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa. The most important provision, and that which requires the return of the bill to the House, is the amendment which the Senate committee report. It provides a surveyor general's office for the Territory of Washington, which was inadvertently omitted by the House. The provisions of the bill, as it comes from the House, make some amendments to the donation laws which were passed for the benefit of the Territory of Oregon, now composing the Territories of Washington and Oregon. The bill is long, but if there is any objection it can be read. Perhaps it would be better to have it read, as it is an important bill.

Mr. STUART. It certainly is not necessary to read the bill at length. I move to dispense with its reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands was to add the following additional section:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Territory of Washington shall be erected into a separate surveying district; and the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a surveyor general for the same, who shall hold his office at such place as the President may direct; and the location thereof may be changed from time to time, if, in the judgment of the President, the public interests require it; and the powers, duties, obligations, responsibilities, and emoluments of the said surveyor general shall be the same as are now prescribed by law for the surveyor general of Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to, the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time; and the bill was read a third time, and passed.

It provides that the donations hereafter to be surveyed in Oregon and Washington, claimed under the provisions of the act of September 27, 1850, shall, in no case, include a town site, or lands settled upon for purposes of business or trade, and not for agriculture; and that all town sites shall be subject to the operations of the act of May 23, 1844, "for the relief of the citizens of towns upon lands of the United States, under certain circumstances." It also proposes to extend the preemption privilege, granted by the act of September 4, 1841, to lands in Oregon and Washington, whether surveyed or unsurveyed, not rightfully claimed, entered, or reserved, under the provisions of the bill or the act to which it is amendatory. It further proposes to grant to each of the Territories of Oregon and Washington, two townships of land, in legal subdivisions for university purposes, in lieu of the two townships granted to Oregon by the act of 1850.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion by Mr. STUART, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and

The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 22, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the call of committees for reports.

MEXICAN TREATY.

Mr. HOUSTON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic of 30th December, 1853, as amended by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. FULLER obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. HOUSTON. By the gentleman's permission, I will submit a proposition to the House, and it is this: To-morrow is private bill day, and being objection day, as I understand, it will be proper for us to give that business some attention when we can do so much good work. If the civil and diplomatic bill is not concluded to-day, the presumption is that its consideration will go over to next week. If gentlemen would agree to it, I would like that the morning hour of to-day be devoted to the consideration of that bill in committee. If the proposition be agreed to, we may finish the bill before our adjournment.

Mr. OLDS. With the permission of the gentleman from Maine, I wish to say a word. I desire that committees should have the morning hour, during which they may submit reports regularly. When it has terminated, we can go into committee, and there remain until we can bring the civil and diplomatic bill out with us.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not ask more. I do not want to interfere with the regular business of the morning hour. All I desire is to have the civil and diplomatic bill finished to-day.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Speaker, I propose to bring forward a question as to the privilege of this House in reference to the bill which has been reported this morning from the Committee of Ways and Means. I want an opportunity to plead the privilege of this House before we vote on that bill. I am not ready this day. The matter comes all of a sudden and by surprise on me; and I want opportunity of pleading the privileges of the House, the Constitution of the United States, and the people of the United States, before we pass to that appropriation. I ask it, sir, in the name of the Constitution, of the House, and of the country.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman submit any distinct proposition for the action of the House?

Mr. BENTON. I propose that we do not consider that appropriation until we shall have an opportunity of inquiring whether the privileges of the House have been invaded in the negotiation of that treaty. This I will be ready for to-morrow.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman misunderstands the condition of the bill. It is a distinct bill to be taken up and considered in Committee of the Whole, and is there open to debate. There is no proposition to incorporate it with the civil and diplomatic bill. Indeed there is an express rule which requires all bills appropriating money to carry out treaties to be referred to and discussed in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I did not propose to take up the bill to-day.

ADDITIONAL REVENUE CUTTERS.

Mr. FULLER. I desire, before the House proceeds to the business of the morning hour, to ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up bill No. 242, relating to revenue cutters, which I brought up yesterday morning.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote by which the report of the minority of the select committee on the superintendence of national armories was yesterday referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed. I do not propose now to take it up, as the gentleman who presented it is absent; but I ask that it may be entered.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. Reports are in order from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. On motion by Mr. JAMES C. ALLEN, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be discharged from the further consideration of the petition for a mail route from Hudsonville, Illinois, and Bel-Air. Also, for a mail route from Marshall to Charlestown; and also from Greville to Charlestown, and also from Charlestown to Sullivan.

[The object of Mr. A. is to lay them before the Post Office Department.]

MODIFICATION OF THE POSTAGE LAWS.

Mr. OLDS. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report the following bill:

A bill further to amend the act entitled "An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage of the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1851.

The bill was read a first and second time by its title, and was then read by the Clerk in extenso.

Mr. OLDS. I desire merely to say to the House that this is the fifth section of the substitute for the postage bill, acted on by the House the other day. It makes the postage of letters for distances under three thousand miles three cents, and requires prepayment, and that that prepayment be by stamps. It puts ocean postage at five cents for distances under three thousand miles, and at ten cents for distances over three thousand miles. That postage is now ten and twenty cents.

Inasmuch as I do not propose to say a word myself in reference to this subject, supposing that the bill is perfectly understood by the House, I propose now to move the previous question on its passage; and let the bill be either lost or passed.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his motion, simply for the purpose of enabling me to ask him a question in reference to this bill, to which I have no hostility?

Mr. OLDS. Certainly.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to know if this is what was left of the substitute the other day after the House had stricken out the sections respecting the franking privilege, and that which proposed to increase the postage on newspapers?

Mr. OLDS. This is the fifth section of the substitute. It contains nothing about newspapers or the franking privilege. It is precisely the fifth section of that bill.

Mr. HAVEN. The gentleman from Ohio will excuse me for making another observation. To me this bill is entirely unexceptionable, as I think that the prepayment of postage at the rate of three cents is a desirable thing, and it will save a great deal of intricate machinery in the Post Office.

Mr. OLDS. I now move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that we may, if possible, get clear of the civil and diplomatic bill to-day; and on that motion I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and PARKER, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 54.

Mr. OLDS. I call for the yeas and nays. But if the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will withdraw his motion for a moment, to allow me to make a motion to recommit the bill, and that it be printed, I am willing that it should go over until to-morrow morning.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I cannot withdraw the motion.

Mr. OLDS. Otherwise the bill will go to the Speaker's table and be lost. I therefore ask the yeas and nays upon the motion.

Mr. HAMILTON. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will allow the motion to recommit to be entertained.

Mr. JONES. You have already voted it down. It was done the other day.

The yeas and nays were then ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Will the Chair allow me to make an inquiry? If the House resolve to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union now, what will be the condition of the bill of the gentleman from Ohio?

The SPEAKER. It will go upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. STEPHENS. If a motion is made now to recommit the bill, will it not come up to-morrow morning?

The SPEAKER. It will come up during the morning hour.

Mr. STEPHENS. Then I hope the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] will withdraw the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I have no objection to the gentleman's making the motion.

Mr. OLDS. Then I move to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a personal explanation in connection with the resolution which I offered yesterday; and I desire the consent of the House to do so before the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

No objection being made,

Mr. BROOKS proceeded. To guard against misapprehension, misrepresentation, and misreporting, I have put what I desired to say in writing. What I have to say is this:

It has been intimated to me that the resolutions of which I gave notice on yesterday might be fairly construed by some, and designedly so by others, into a censure upon my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL.] I now declare that to censure that gentleman, even by implication, was no part of my design. No one knows better than himself, that my sympathies were with him because of political association; and many with whom I am most familiar, know that, impressed as I was with the belief that there was a concerted plan by some of the opponents of the Nebraska bill to embarrass the gentleman, I had avowed my purpose to sustain him under every circumstance, and had made animated efforts to produce in them a like determination.

They also know that it was my intention to move to lay on the table the resolution of which notice was given by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] and which I, in common with others, fancied, at the time, to be a maneuver of a combination.

In regard to the action of the gentleman from Virginia, I have to say, I am now satisfied that I was in error, and did him injustice by the suspicions I entertained. I now know that they were unfounded.

In respect to my resolutions I have this to say. It had been openly asserted on the floor, in reply to a manly and tasteful apology for violating the decorum of this body, that a "deadly instrument" had been angrily exhibited in this House. This announcement would go to the country; and without intending to support or deny the assertion as to the exhibition of a weapon, it occurred to me that there was a manifest propriety in tempering so grave an announcement, by coupling with it an assurance to the public that this House would reprobate, whenever it might occur, conduct so at variance with its decorum, and detracting from the dignity of the American Congress.

The first of the resolutions I presented is founded in propriety, in honor, and in wisdom, and I shall insist upon its being added to the rules of the House.

The other was intended to ridicule an unmanly and pernicious habit, and to restore by a jest the harmony of the House, which was fast becoming excited and divided.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina to allow me a single word.

Mr. BROOKS. With pleasure.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to say, in connection with the remarks submitted by the honorable member from South Carolina, in relation to his impression that there was a preconcerted plan to embarrass the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL,] that it is due to others, and especially to those involved in the trouble, that I should say, as I do now, that there was nothing like a preconcerted plan on my part with others in bringing up the matter which I brought before the House connected with the explanation of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CHURCHWELL] on Monday. And, sir, I avail myself of the courtesy of my friend from South Carolina, because I have understood from other sources that it has been asserted that I had made a prearranged or premeditated combination for the purpose of putting him in a false position.

It is especially due to the colleague of the gentleman [Mr. CULLOM] now before me, that I should say, as I do now, to the House and the country, that he had nothing to do, directly or indirectly, with the personal explanation which I made before the House on that day, in relation to the use of my name in the speech of the honorable member [Mr. CHURCHWELL] on the Nebraska bill. He had no knowledge of my design to do so at that time. And let me say, that I had no intention of bringing the matter up at the time, when I entered the Hall on Monday morning. I did not think of such a thing until the gentleman from Tennessee himself brought the matters connected with his speech before the House.

It is certainly due, Mr. Speaker, to all parties, that I should here, in this open way, before the House, acquit all those who participated in the discussion of Monday last of anything like a combined or premeditated design to assail, in any way, the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CHURCHWELL.]

Mr. BROOKS. I am unwilling, sir, to hold to the belief expressed in my previous remarks, after the assurance of the gentleman from Ohio. When I am assured, as has been done by the gentleman on his honor, that no such combination existed, I am, as a gentleman, bound to believe that none existed. I do so believe, and am glad of having given the opportunity to the gentleman from Ohio for explanation. I knew that suspicion of combination was entertained. I knew that it was entertained generally; and gentlemen on that side must admit that there were circumstances of a suspicious nature connected with the matter.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to say a single word.

The SPEAKER. Is there unanimous consent to the gentleman's proceeding with his explanation?

Mr. RUSSELL. I object.

Mr. MILLSON. I have the floor by the consent of the gentleman from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was under the impression that the gentleman from South Carolina yielded up the floor altogether.

Mr. BROOKS. I yielded for explanation to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MILLSON. One word only. It is matter of surprise to me, sir, that any gentleman in this Hall would suppose that, in introducing the resolution yesterday, I could have been influenced by any other motive than to vindicate the dignity of the House. I wish only to say, that whatever have been the impressions of the gentleman from South Carolina, either in his original suspicion or his present belief, they have been derived from no word that I have uttered to him; for I have had no conversation with him on the subject.

Mr. HUNT. I desire to call the attention of the honorable member from South Carolina, whom I know to be a man of honor, to an expression of a general character made use of in his remarks. He said: "And many with whom I am most familiar know that, impressed as I was with the belief that there was a concerted plan by the opponents of the Nebraska bill to embarrass the gentleman," &c. As a gentleman, I am incapable of doing wrong to any man. When offended on just cause, I will hold the wrong-doer to an account. I knew that the gentleman never meant to apply such an observation to me. As the expression was general, however, I felt bound to bring it to his attention.

Mr. BROOKS. I have not the slightest objection, Mr. Speaker, to insert in my remarks the word "some." I acknowledge that I entertained suspicion; but I do not now. With the consent of the House, I shall insert the word "some."

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

On motion the House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORR in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN stated that when the committee last rose, they had under consideration the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN,] which is as follows:

For the purchase of the lots or parcels of land, with the appurtenances and the buildings thereon belonging, the one thereof to the Bank of Commerce, and the other thereof to the Bank of the State of New York, and particularly referred to and described in two contracts, one with each of said banks, for the leasing and right to purchase the same, bearing date the 19th of August, 1853, $530,000: Provided, That before the said purchase is completed, the State of New York shall cede to the United States jurisdiction over said land and property, and shall by law exonerate the same, and the property of the United States thereon, from all taxes, levies, and assessments thereon, whilst the same remains the property of the United States.

And that said amendment was, on motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. ROBBINS,] amended by the addition of the following proviso:

Provided, however, That no part of this appropriation is to be used, until the Secretary of the Treasury has entered into a negotiation with the lessors of the lot in question to get rid of said lease, and also has ascertained upon what terms said lease can be disposed of, and has reported the result of said negotiation to the next session of Congress.

Mr. PECKHAM. I wish to offer the following substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HAVEN:] to insert after the words "land and property" the following:

Reserving the right of the State to serve civil and criminal process.

Mr. HAVEN. Do I understand my colleague that he desires to offer my amendment precisely over again, with the addition of the words he suggests?

Mr. PECKHAM. I mean to offer what I have sent up to the Clerk's desk as a substitute for the whole amendment and the proviso.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Upon what ground does the Chair rule that the amendment is out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the ground that it is proposed to strike out and insert the very same matter already contained in the amendment.

Mr. JONES. I had supposed it to be different matter.

The CHAIRMAN. It is precisely the same matter. The change which the gentleman from New York desires to make he can make by proposing it in the form of an amendment to the amendment offered by his colleague, but not as a substitute.

The question was then taken upon Mr. HAVEN's amendment, as amended; and it was agreed to.

Mr. FARLEY. I offer the following amendment:

To complete the custom-house at Waldoboro', in the State of Maine, the sum of $13,000, which, in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated, shall constitute the entire cost of the purchase of the site, and the erection and completion of the building.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is that amendment in order in this place?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Has there been a site of a custom-house got there yet?

The CHAIRMAN. So far as the place in the bill is concerned at which this amendment comes in, it is in order. The Chair would inquire of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FARLEY] if any appropriation has yet been made for the erection of a custom-house at this place, or if there has been any law heretofore passed authorizing the construction of a custom-house there?

Mr. FARLEY. There has been. If I can have the attention of the committee for a few moments, I will endeavor to explain the matter to their satisfaction. In the general appropriation act of 1852, an appropriation was made in the following language:

"For purchasing a site, and the construction of a suitable building at Waldoboro', Maine, for custom-house, post office, and other offices of the United States, and furnishing the same, $12,000: Provided, That said lot and building shall be exempted from city and all other taxes whatever, by the act of the Legislature of Maine: And provided further, That before the Secretary of the Treasury shall erect the said building, it shall first be his duty to procure a proper site or lot of ground, and to make a contract or contracts for the erection of said building and furnishing the same, at a sum or sums which shall not, in the whole, exceed the sum of $12,000, inclusive of said lot, which said contract or contracts shall be secured by good and sufficient sureties, to the satisfaction of the said Secretary of the Treasury and President of the United States."

In pursuance of this appropriation, and under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, an agent of the Department selected a lot at Waldoboro', the title of which was secured. The cost of the lot and charges amounted to $2,247. That was in the fall of 1852. In May, 1853, the Secretary of the Treasury writes as follows to the commissioners appointed to superintend the erection of this custom-house:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 21, 1853.

GENTLEMEN: The supervising architect of this Department, after examining the proposals received for erecting the Waldoboro' custom-house, reports that after making such modifications in their amounts as they require, he finds the lowest bid to be $22,816 95, while the amount of the appropriation (to which by the law the whole building and furniture is restricted) now available, is only $9,753, consequently no contract can now be awarded on the proposals; but as the present design for the building is appropriate for the purpose, instead of resorting to an inferior one, which could be erected for the funds at the disposal of the Department, it has been decided to suspend action in the matter until the meeting of Congress, when the facts will be reported to it, and an appropriation recommended sufficient to meet the cost of construction.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES GUTHRIE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

MESSRS. JOHN G. BROWN and WILLIAM A. SCHENCK, Commissioners, Waldoboro' custom-house.

Under that letter from the Secretary of the Treasury proceedings on the building were suspended. This Congress assembled. The Secretary of the Treasury did not send in a report upon this subject, for the reason, which does not appear in the papers, that it had been suggested that it would be better to change the port of entry in that district; and that if the change should be made, it would appear, in the report of Judge Barrett, to be made under the law of the last session of Congress, for revising the revenue laws of the United States. The Department, however, has come to the conclusion to let the port of entry remain at Waldoboro', because it is a central point. That is the reason why no report was made of the facts by the Department at the commencement of this session. I to-day called upon the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the matter, and I have a letter from him, which I ask may be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 22, 1854.

SIR: In reply to your letter of this date, I have the honor to state that of the sum of $12,000 appropriated by the act of August 31, 1853, for building a custom-house at Waldoboro', $2,247 were expended in the purchase of a site, and other incidental charges, leaving a balance of $9,753 applicable to the erection. A suitable plan of the building was devised, and proposals invited, the lowest of which was for $22,816 95. The Department, under the law, was unable to proceed upon this bid, and is indisposed to put up such a building as can be constructed for the $9,753. The subject has, therefore, been suspended, until Congress shall determine upon the expediency of appropriating the further sum necessary, namely, $13,000.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

JAMES GUTHRIE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. E. W. FARLEY, House of Representatives.

Mr. FARLEY. I do not ask for this appropriation on the ground that a large amount of revenue is collected in the district of Waldoboro', an objection which I anticipate will be made; but for the reason that the business of the district, independent of foreign importations, requires the erection of a permanent fire-proof building. Gentlemen living remote from the sea-board districts, are, perhaps, not familiar with the duties imposed by law upon the officers of the customs, and which are yearly increasing, from the growing tonnage of this and other districts in Maine. All vessels built have to be measured and furnished with the papers required by law—those under license have a yearly renewal of their papers. The duties required by your hospital laws; the recording of bills of sales; the prevention of smuggling; the monthly returns to the Treasury Department, besides other duties, too numerous to mention, and entirely disconnected with the collection of revenue, require a force of officers sufficient to discharge them, and suitable buildings for the preservation of papers and records. The performance of these duties is attended with expense, it is true, but it is so trifling that it should not be mentioned in connection with the importance of the great commercial interests intended to be protected by our revenue laws.

I say, further, that the Government is interested in having suitable buildings erected at the ports of entry of the important collection districts in Maine, whether large amounts of revenue are collected at them or otherwise. The Secretary of the Treasury has taken an intelligent view of this subject, and recommends an application of the policy of the Department in this instance.

I present this subject as an independent measure, free from the objection of being connected with any schemes of a log-rolling character, and desire to have it decided upon its merits.

This district of Waldoboro' has a population of about forty-five thousand inhabitants. Within its limits were built, in 1853, forty thousand tons of shipping; during the present year there will be built fifty thousand tons of the first class. What is true of the Waldoboro' district, in this respect, is equally applicable to most of the other districts in Maine, in proportion to their population and capital. Of the total amount of tonnage owned within the several collection districts of the United States, Waldoboro' ranks as the ninth. During the year 1853, there were built in the State of Maine, as I ascertain from sources not official, yet of a reliable character, one hundred and seventy thousand tons of shipping, worth at least $10,000,000. A portion of the tonnage yearly built is retained by her. The remainder is sold to citizens of other States. She builds nearly one half of the tonnage of the sea-going vessels of the country. Every dollar the Government has expended for custom-houses in Maine, and aids to navigation along her coast, has been well invested, and has been returned over and over again. She is the great ship-building State of the Union; and our foreign commerce, to which Maine contributes so important an element, is doing more to spread a knowledge of our institutions and government throughout the world, and giving an influence to the American name in other lands, than perhaps any other great interest of our country.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would inquire if that letter is dated to-day?

Mr. FARLEY. It is.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is very singular, for there is no estimate for it at all.

Mr. LETCHER. If the House can stand this custom-house, I shall begin to despair; and I think they will then be ready to swallow anything which may be proposed here for the expenditure of the public money.

Now, sir, at this place called Waldoboro', in the State of Maine, there is collected revenue amounting to $1,740, and that at a cost to the Government of $4,871. Now, in that state of the case, the Secretary of the Treasury comes here with a letter, and states that he cannot build this custom-house with the $9,000, which is the balance of the appropriation; but that he must have $22,000 to expend upon that point, where the expense of collecting exceeds the revenue by $3,131.

Now, sir, I ask if this House is prepared to stand that? If they are willing to uphold, by their action, recommendations of this sort, and to make expenditures of money upon works of this kind, wherever and whenever people choose to come forward and ask for appropriations, there will probably be found a dozen other places where the Government collects revenue, and where the disparity between the amount collected and the cost of collecting it is not so great as it is at the place under consideration, where they could, with equal propriety, make an expenditure of $20,000 to build custom-houses, court-houses, and post offices. I hope the House will put a stop to this thing; and if the Secretary of the Treasury is disposed to make such expenditures, that they will give him to understand that he cannot get the money here to carry out the plan.

Mr. FARLEY. I would inquire if I can move to increase or reduce the amount of my amendment, in order to enable me to reply to the gentleman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot do that.

Mr. FARLEY. Cannot I withdraw it?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. FARLEY. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and Churchwell were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 64, noes 55.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I offer the following amendment:

To complete the marine hospital at Cleveland, in the State of Ohio, $25,000;

To complete the marine hospital at St. Louis, in the State of Missouri, $10,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Chicago, in the State of Illinois, $8,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Louisville, in the State of Kentucky, $13,500;

To complete the marine hospital at Paducah, in the said State of Kentucky, $5,000;

To complete the marine hospital at Evansville, in the State of Indiana, $2,000;

To complete the marine hospital at San Francisco, and to inclose the site and drain the same, and for the necessary out buildings, $44,000.

I offer the amendment at this point to expedite the progress of the bill. I find that the amendment was submitted some time since by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] from the Committee of Ways and Means. The committee will recollect that some weeks ago each of these items of the proposition was fully discussed here, and adopted by the House. Each and every one of these items has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. They have also obtained the sanction of the Committee of Ways and Means; and my only object in offering it now is to expedite the progress of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am opposed to the amendment. The subject has been so fully discussed, that it is hardly worth while to say anything now. We are now expending on these marine hospitals, in the purchase of sites, double what we collect from seamen. Besides appropriations for building these marine hospitals and keeping them up, our expenditures annually double the amount of our receipts from the tax on seamen's wages. If we are to continue the system of building these houses, it seems to me those places which have received appropriations of $50,000 and $100,000, ought to stop, and let those places which have received nothing at all get as much before they go further. The buildings are substantially completed now. All that is needed is fencing, or the fixing up of the lot. The appropriations are not for the substantial comforts of the hospitals, but for decoration; so I think that we had better vote them down. If we are to keep up the system, let those points for which no appropriations have been made, or, if any, small ones, get enough to build hospitals suitable for the care of sick seamen.

Mr. PRESTON. I move pro forma to reduce the appropriation five dollars.

Mr. Chairman, so far as the hospital lying in my district is concerned, and which is included in the amendments submitted by the gentleman from Ohio, I have a letter from the resident physician there, which goes to show the remarks of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means have no application to it. He said these appropriations were only for ornamental work. In this case the appropriation is to furnish necessary furniture for the establishment. The resident physician writes as follows:

UNITED STATES MARINE HOSPITAL,
LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY, April 2, 1854.

DEAR SIR: You are, perhaps, aware that the Government hospital and grounds at this point are in a condition that calls loudly for an appropriation by Congress, and I respectfully ask of you the favor to interest yourself, as I doubt not it will be your pleasure to do, in getting the requisite sum allowed, if possible, at the present session. The honorable Secretary of the Treasury, some time since, called for estimates for the improvements judged to be necessary, which were duly made out and forwarded. The amount called for was about $12,000. A less sum, I am sure, would be altogether inadequate upon the most economical figures, if it be desirable to have things appear at all decent.

With your permission I will state what is the condition of things, and leave you to form your own opinion as to what may be needful to be done in the premises. The house itself will do, save that the supply of furniture is very inadequate, both as regards amount and quality, the beds, and bedding excepted. For instance, on coming here, I was under the necessity, as my worthy predecessor had been, of furnishing, in principal part at my private cost, the apartments assigned to, or set apart for, the resident medical officer, which was never contemplated by the laws regulating our hospitals. Not only so; I have to some extent supplied tables, chairs, &c., for the public part of the house, rather than do without. There is not, I may say, a dozen good chairs, or seats of any kind, in all the wards of the hospital. The number of chairs originally furnished was very limited, and the quality very inferior, indeed, inasmuch that, with ordinary usage, nearly the whole of them are now fallen to pieces. I could go on thus to particularize, but must come to the main point, which is the state of the grounds. We have a nine acre lot; and, if we except the hospital building, with the indifferent pavement about it, a cistern, a couple of dry wells, and a crazy board fence that furnishes no protection against the hogs and cattle that graze on the common around, the lot is wholly without improvement. The grounds are ungraded; no walks of any kind; no shade trees, except an old locust or two; no shrubbery; no gateway or entrance of any kind, in front or rear—in short, nothing but heaps of unworked stone, and abundance of mud in winter, and a luxuriant growth of unsightly weeds in summer. Every one who visits the premises has something to say about the sad lack of useful improvement, and all agree that the state of things is disgraceful to the Government that allows it, and a perpetual eye-sore to all passers-by. I hope, then, Colonel, that you will give your efficient aid in procuring the necessary appropriation to put things in something like a decent fix. Of the amount originally appropriated for supplying this hospital with furniture, as I learn from Mr. Taunehill, the steward, some $1,000 or upwards were returned to the Treasury. I imagined that the like allowance for other hospitals was not found too large. It is very certain that there was need here for the whole of it. If there was not at first, there is great need of it now, I assure you. Personally, of course, I can have little interest in this matter; but really, for the credit of the Government and of our town, I should like to see things here wear a less repulsive aspect. I see there is a bill pending in Congress concerning custom-houses and hospitals, which, I suppose, provides for our institution. I hope it will not fail to pass; and it certainly cannot, if all the items embraced are as defensible as this of ours.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. N. HUGHES,
Resident Physician United States Hospital.
Hon. W. C. PRESTON.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I rise not so much to reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. PRESTON,] as I do to answer some of the arguments urged by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON.] I do not pretend to say that I am in favor of the general amendment that has been offered to this bill. When the time comes for voting upon the distinct proposition, I shall then choose the position which I wish to occupy. The gentleman from Alabama urges as an argument against these appropriations, that the number of persons in the hospitals is very little proportionate to the amount of money invested in them; or in other words, that the expenditure upon these hospitals is very largely in advance of the money received from the seamen. Suppose it is, what shall we do? What does the gentleman from Alabama propose to do? Shall we break down all our marine hospitals, because the money expended upon them is so greatly disproportionate to the amount received from seamen, and which I might say is wrong from them? What are we to do with them? Shall we turn these seamen adrift upon the cold charities of the world? Does the gentleman from Alabama propose to repeal the tax levied upon seamen?

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Louisiana will allow me I will tell him; and if he had paid attention to my speech, he certainly would have discovered that I was in favor—and I expressly said I was—of stopping the appropriations upon these buildings, upon which enough already had been expended, and to apply them to those buildings upon which very little money had been expended.

Mr. JONES. How are we to determine in regard to this matter except upon estimates from the proper officers, or from individuals acquainted with the facts, whether these points have received sufficient appropriations or not? Shall we apply to the gentleman from Alabama, or to the Secretary of the Treasury, or the gentlemen who represent the particular localities where these hospitals are situated? Are we to leave them in a dilapidated condition, and only half built, because the expenditures upon them have been heretofore extravagant? Shall we permit them to go to decay? And are these seamen who may be left at these points, to be thrown on the charity of the community because these hospitals, which have cost so much money, are not in a condition to receive them?

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Red river, the district watered by which I have the honor to represent, almost entirely, from the point at which it enters into the State of Louisiana, to the point at which it enters into the Mississippi river—the Red river, with a magnificent navigation of twelve hundred miles—the Red river, through whose mouth nearly one fourth of the whole cotton crop of the United States passes to market, has not a single marine hospital from its mouth to its source. And these seamen, who have to pay this tax, are deprived of all the advantages which should result to them from that tax. I have introduced a bill here this session to supply this want. It is now before the Committee on Commerce, but as yet the committee have not reported it, and I fear they may not report it. But it is nothing but simple justice to my section of the country that they should do so. But because this bill has not been reported, and because there is no law establishing a marine hospital on the Red river, I am debarred by the rules of the House from offering an amendment which I should offer to this bill, were I not so prevented; giving $25,000 or $30,000 for the establishment of a single marine hospital for the whole coast of the Red river.

Mr. PRESTON, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment.

Mr. WADE. I propose to amend the amendment by adding to the appropriation for the marine hospital, at Cleveland, five dollars.

I offer that amendment for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee for a single moment to the condition of this hospital, which I had the honor, at an early part of the session, to bring before the notice of the House. I want to say only that I have got here a letter from the Register of the Treasury, showing the amount of money that has been collected from seamen at the port of Cleveland, and the amount of revenue and imports collected at the port of Cleveland. I have also the statement of the collector of the port of Cleveland, showing the number of seamen who entered into that port during the last season. There were forty-six thousand seamen who entered the port of Cleveland during the last season, and an equal number who sailed from that port in the same time, making the number of seamen who entered and cleared ninety-two thousand. The amount of money which has been collected—hospital money as it is called—from seamen entering the port of Cleveland for the last four years, as appears from the Register's letter, was upwards of $1,200 per annum.

It has been said here that we are paying away much larger sums for this purpose than we are receiving. But there will be an end to these appropriations after a little time, when these hospitals shall have been finished, while the collections for seamen will continue through all time; and as the numbers of these seamen increase, as they are yearly increasing on the lakes, it will be found that there will have been collected from the seamen at that port more, immeasurably more, than the buildings will have cost. And now the Government of the United States possesses a plot of ground in Cleveland, lying in one of the most beautiful parts of that beautiful city on the lake shore, which, by the increase in the value of property, is worth more than all that has been expended on the hospital. That hospital is in a condition which is absolutely a disgrace to the Government of the United States. It is reared up, and some portions of the gables have been left open; some portion of the roof is tinned, and some portion is left untinned; the cornices are left open in some parts, allowing the storms to drive in, and some portions of the wards are left unfinished.

There has been an average of seamen in this hospital of twenty-eight during the year before this; and there has been an average of more than forty-eight during the last season. That is the average of every day. And yet, Mr. Chairman, at this season, indicating, as it does, a season of great sickness and calamity to seamen, there is no opportunity at all to receive the number that apply there for reception; and there are little advantages, therefore, to the seamen, and no chances of sustaining them in comfort at that point.

Now, it seems to me, that if this House is not disposed to take the position of the gentleman from Alabama, the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, which is to leave these works in a state of dilapidation, and allow them to go to decay, as a monument of the folly of this Government in throwing away its money in this manner, then we have nothing to do but simply to make these appropriations and finish all these buildings, thereby giving to the poor seaman the opportunity for some little comfort in the course of a life which, at best, is one of discomfort, adventure, and much suffering on his part.

Mr. WADE, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio; and it was agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. I offer the amendment which I send up to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For the construction of a marine hospital at Vicksburg, in the State of Mississippi, the sum of $55,000.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, the appropriation asked for by this amendment commends itself to the favorable consideration of the House for several important reasons, which I will endeavor to state briefly. In the first place, the last Congress, after due consideration, determined that Vicksburg, from its position and commercial importance, was a proper point at which, for public convenience, a marine hospital should be located; and with a view to carry out that opinion, an appropriation of $10,000 was made, by way of beginning the work. Of that amount, $4,000 has been expended in the purchase of a lot as a site for said hospital, the remaining $6,000 still being on hand. The managers of the work thought it better to await the further action of Congress upon the subject, in making suitable appropriation to carry it on, than to commence it upon a magnificent scale, and attempt to force Congress afterwards into heavy appropriations for its completion. In this course I think they have acted with prudence and good sense, and with an eye to the interest of the public.

In the next place, the amount asked by this amendment is precisely the amount estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter to the Committee of Ways and Means, of the 4th of January last. I do not desire to transcend the estimate made by that officer, whose peculiar province it is to investigate the situation of these several works, and the amounts necessary to carry them on. I suppose him to have had correct information on the subject, and therefore think his opinions entitled to consideration. In the third place, Mississippi, under the operations of the present tariff, is one of the largest tax-paying States of this Union; and but few, and very small favors, have been dispensed to her in the way of appropriations by the General Government. If money is to be appropriated for objects of this kind, there can be no good reason why a part of it should not be expended in her borders. Did this appropriation redound alone to the interest of the citizens of Vicksburg, or even of the State, I doubt whether she would have ever made application to Congress for any amount; for our people feel fully able to take care of themselves without gratuities from Government. But, sir, Vicksburg is a place of vast commercial importance upon the great thoroughfare of the southern and southwestern States, where boats are ascending and descending the Mississippi; continually land their sick and dying, who never fail to meet with proper attention at the hands of the generous and humane citizens of Vicksburg.

New Orleans, and all the cities below Vicksburg, are annually, I may say, visited by destructive epidemics; and at such times the citizens, as well as Government employees, officers of the Navy, sailors and others, seek a higher latitude. Many of them land at Vicksburg, and become a charge to its citizens, bringing with them diseases which spread and carry off many of her most valuable citizens. See with what violence the yellow fever prevailed there last year, and witness with what liberality her citizens, and the surrounding country, met the wants of the afflicted who were attacked in their midst. See with what personal hazard, and, in many cases, with the loss of estimable citizens, unremitting attention was given to the sick. Is it right, because they would not see the stranger and the poverty-stricken suffer and die for want of attention; because their hearts were touched with sympathy, and their purses open to relieve, that the whole burden of this thing should fall upon their shoulders? I think not. There is certainly no paramount obligations upon them to do so. Build a marine hospital for the stranger, for our sailors, and others who may be in the employment of the Government, as you have done elsewhere. Again, I see, in looking over the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury above referred to, that he enumerates the appropriations already made to eight different marine hospitals, besides Vicksburg, as follows, viz: to Cleveland, Ohio, $71,909 38; to St. Louis, Missouri, $82,274; to Chicago, Illinois, $49,712; to Louisville, Kentucky, $50,000 33; to Paducah, Kentucky, $51,625; to Evansville, Indiana, $45,000; to San Francisco, California, $180,000; to Portland, Maine, $30,000; to Vicksburg, $10,000. I do not intend to find fault with the appropriations made to those different works; for if I had ever supposed any objections could be made to the action of Congress in these matters, it is new too late.

But what I wish to say is this: there can be no good reason offered why Congress should give liberally to others, and dole it out with such a miserly hand to Vicksburg. I hope a spirit of liberality will prompt the House to make this appropriation, and thus place Vicksburg upon the same footing with other places having no larger claims upon Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi is one which I had in my mind in the remarks I made some little time since. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, agreed to strike it out, with others, from the appropriations. My own impression is—and I so voted in committee—that the marine hospital at Vicksburg ought to be built. The committee, however, concluded to strike it out of the appropriation; and one of these reasons was, I recollect, that there are already a large number of marine hospitals upon the Mississippi and Ohio rivers; perhaps enough to accommodate all the sick seamen upon those rivers. I will also state that we have made a general appropriation for taking care of sick seamen at places where there are no marine hospitals. These are the reasons why the committee refused to recommend the appropriations.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. DISNEY. I offer the following amendment:

To provide accommodations for sick and disabled seamen at Cincinnati, $60,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I rise to a question of order. I ask if that amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that it is not in order.

Mr. DISNEY. Upon what ground?

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the ground that it is not embraced in the class of cases indicated in the 81st rule, with which the gentleman is, no doubt, familiar.

Mr. HOUSTON. There is no law authorizing the appropriation. There is a general appropriation in this bill, providing for taking care of sick seamen where there are no marine hospitals. But there is no law authorizing this appropriation.

Mr. DISNEY. I still do not understand the point upon which the Chair rules this amendment out of order. I desire to be advised upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair referred the gentleman to the 81st rule, and remarked, as he now remarks, that it is not embraced in any one of the three classes of business indicated by that rule.

Mr. DISNEY. I would like to have that rule read.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I would like to present, for the consideration of the Chair, the fact that this appropriation has been recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. It will be found upon page 11, Ex. Doc. No. 5. He there proposes to establish a marine hospital at Cincinnati.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the rule of the Senate to be to incorporate into a general appropriation bill any item which has been recommended by any Department of the Government, whether there is a previous law authorizing it or not. Such, however, is not the rule of the House. The 81st rule says:

"No appropriation shall be reported in such general appropriation bills, or be in order as an amendment thereto for any expenditure by law, unless in continuation of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress, and for the contingencies for carrying on the several departments of the Government."

Under this rule the Chair decides the amendment to be out of order. Does the gentleman from Ohio appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. DISNEY. I appeal from that decision, and I desire to submit one word.

The CHAIRMAN. The appeal is not debatable. The gentleman can only state the grounds upon which he takes it.

Mr. DISNEY. Why is it not debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. Because general debate is closed under the order of the House.

Mr. DISNEY. Debate, then, is limited.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate at all can be allowed on the appeal.

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to state a fact. There is no law on the statute-book specially authorizing the construction of any marine hospital in this Union; nor is there any law on the statute-book specially authorizing the construction of any custom-house within the limits of the Republic; yet everything has been constructed by appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not in order. He is making an argument on the appeal. If the gentleman will consult the legislation on the subject, he will find that all these appropriations have been inserted in the other end of the Capitol, and not here. That is so at least since the present occupant of the chair has been in Congress.

Mr. DISNEY. My recollection of the facts is as I have stated it.

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SKELTON. I move to amend by inserting the following after the seven hundred and forty-ninth line:

For the better protection of life and property from shipwreck on the New Jersey coast by the establishment of station houses, life-boats, and other apparatus, and to employ suitable persons to take charge of such property, and to see that the object named is faithfully executed, $10,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. I present the same question of order in reference to that amendment.

Mr. SKELTON. The Chair will perceive that the amendment is proposed to be inserted after appropriations for similar objects.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any law authorizing such an appropriation?

Mr. SKELTON. There have been appropriations heretofore made for this object; and life-boats are on that coast now rotting for want of some person to take charge of them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment in its present shape is not in order.

Mr. SKELTON. I must take an appeal from that decision, for humanity demands this appropriation. My constituents and the country demand that I should appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. SKELTON. I would like to ask the Chair one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman that debate is not in order.

Mr. SKELTON. I do not want to debate, but merely to ask a question of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. That is debate.

The question was then taken on it; and the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. BRIDGES. I offer the following amendment:

At the end of line eight hundred and fourteen insert the following words:

For office rent for the consul at Zurich, Switzerland, $100.

The amendment is merely for office rent for the United States consul at Zurich, Switzerland. I hope there will be no objection to it.

Mr. HAVEN. I submit to the Chair that that amendment is out of order here. It should come from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BRIDGES. I will say to the gentleman that this consulate was established in 1852. The present incumbent was appointed in 1853; and I presume that the Committee of Ways and Means were not aware of the existence of that consulate. The sum of $100 has been appropriated for office rent in Basle, and the amendment only asks the same appropriation for Zurich, which is a more important consulate than that at Basle. There is more business transacted at Zurich than there is at Basle, and I therefore hope that the committee will not refuse to appropriate this sum of $100. I may also add that the consulate at Basle will soon be abolished by the President, as it is considered to be altogether unnecessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is in order under the last clause of the 81st rule, as it is "for continuing and carrying on the several departments of the Government."

Mr. BRIDGES. It is as much in order as the appropriation of $100 for office rent for the consulate at Basle.

Mr. HAVEN. I would, however, submit to the Chair, that I do not know why custom-houses should not be considered in the same category. They are certainly for carrying on the revenue department of the Government. If appropriations for them are in order, I would like to take a hand at them. [A laugh.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order, on the ground that he has stated.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

After line eight hundred and twenty-nine, insert the following words:

To defray the expenses incurred, and to be incurred, in complying with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 14th December, 1853, calling for a statement of the privileges and restrictions of the commercial intercourse of the United States with all foreign nations, and a table exhibiting a comparative statement between the tariff of other nations and that of the United States, $10,000.

To enable the Secretary of State to pay to the persons employed to protect the property and persons of citizens of the United States at San Juan de Nicaragua, $12,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary to defray the expenses so incurred.

Here is a detailed statement of these expenses, if the House desire to have it read. The necessity for the appropriation of the first $10,000 arises in pursuance of a resolution of the House; and the expenditure could not be avoided. The appropriation of $12,000 is for an amount contracted by the Minister to Central America, the necessity for which is explained by the papers which I send to the Clerk's desk. If the House desire to know further about it, they can permit the papers to be read.

[Cries of "It is not necessary!"]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer several amendments to this part of the bill. I send the first amendment to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read as follows:

For the payment to James B. Hollmans, for services rendered as secretary of legation in Santiago, in the discharge of clerical duties left unperformed by his predecessors, $500.

Mr. BAYLY. The facts of this case are these. There were two secretaries of legation appointed before Mr. Hollmans, and there was an accumulation of business upon the hands of the minister. When this gentleman went there as secretary of legation, he had to do more than to keep up the current business of the legation. He had to bring up the arrears of business, and we have appropriated to him a sum less than those who had preceded him would have received, had they arrived at their places and performed their duties. The Committee on Foreign Affairs were unanimous in the recommendation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BAYLY. I have another amendment, which I will send to the Clerk.

The amendment was reported as follows:

For the payment to Henry Savage, at the rate of $1,500 per annum, for diplomatic services rendered to the United States during the several periods he has been in actual correspondence with the Government of Guatemala and with the Department of State of the United States, $15,750, or so much thereof as may be necessary for that purpose.

Mr. BAYLY. The Committee on Foreign Affairs did not undertake to ascertain the precise amount which ought to be appropriated to this gentleman; but we recommend to appropriate an amount that will certainly cover the recommendation of the Secretary of State. Mr. Marcy addressed a letter to the committee, in which he inclosed a letter of Mr. Buchanan, showing that this gentleman had rendered most meritorious services to the country, and recommending, in the strongest terms, the remuneration named in the amendment. We have put in a sum which will certainly cover it, and we leave it to the State Department to adjust the precise time during which he was acting in a diplomatic character. It is recommended by the Department of State.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to inquire of my colleague, if this proposed compensation is in addition to that which is allowed to him as a foreign representative? It is a subject, which I confess I do not understand.

Mr. BAYLY. This gentleman, Mr. Savage, was not officially in the employment of the Government. That is, he had no commission from the President, and confirmed by the Senate. But he was in constant correspondence with the State Department, from Mr. Buchanan's time down to the present time. The Secretary of State recommended an allowance of $2,000 per annum; but the Committee on Foreign Affairs placed it at $1,500. If I could read the letter which I have before me from the Secretary of State, which I have not time to do under the five minutes rule, I could show, upon the authority of the Secretary of State, that this gentleman performed the most meritorious services, and that both Mr. Buchanan and Mr. Marcy recommended in the strongest terms that he should be remunerated. I said he was not in the official employ of the Government; but he was an intelligent, enlightened American citizen, who performed important diplomatic service, for which he ought to be paid. That is not only the opinion of the Executive, but it is the unanimous opinion of the committee of this House over which I am proud to preside.

Mr. McMULLIN. I have the utmost confidence in the judgment of the committee over which my colleague presides. But, sir, it seems to me that this is rather a novel proposition. This gentleman was not officially employed by the Government; and how do we know that he was not there upon his own private business, and, at the same time, carrying on a correspondence with the Government, thus "killing two birds with one stone." I am not disposed to make opposition to this amendment; but it seems to me that it is setting a bad precedent. I think we had better not sanction any Secretary of State, whether Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Marcy, or anybody else, in clothing any individual with diplomatic authority in violation of law; and, therefore, notwithstanding the confidence which I have in the judgment of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, I hope this amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BAYLY. I hope my colleague will allow me to have the letter of the Secretary of State read.

Mr. SEWARD. I object.

Mr. McMULLIN. I will give my time to my colleague for that purpose, certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] had concluded his remarks, and yielded the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I want the five minutes rule to be strictly enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the letter cannot be read.

Mr. BAYLY. Oh, I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. JONES. If there is any gentleman on this floor whom I would accommodate, it is the gentleman, but I do not want the rule to be violated.

Mr. BAYLY. I then move to increase the appropriation one dollar.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot move to amend his own amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move to increase the appropriation five dollars.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of giving me an opportunity of asking the gentleman from Virginia a question. I ask the gentleman what is the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. BAYLY. Fifteen thousand dollars. I now ask for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of State.

The Clerk read the letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, }
WASHINGTON, February 13, 1854. }

SIR: I have the honor to reply to that portion of your letter of the 8th instant, which refers to Mr. Henry Savage's claim for compensation for diplomatic services in Guatemala, since 1830, by the following statement:

From early in 1830 until toward the close of 1833, Mr. Henry Savage corresponded with this Department, in a diplomatic character, and as, during that period, there was no chargé d'affaires of the United States to that Republic, he assumed the functions of that agent.

It also appears, that from the spring of 1842, say April or May, until the 17th November, 1848, Mr. Savage acted as chargé, in the absence of any accredited agent, to Central America.

He has also corresponded with this Department from the 10th May, 1850, until the present time, during which period there has been no accredited representation of the United States to the Republic of Guatemala, and the archives and property of the former legation in Guatemala have been almost constantly in his care. The only communication on record addressed to him in relation to his diplomatic correspondence, is by Mr. Buchanan, under date of June 3d, 1848, which acknowledges the receipt of letters from 18th June, 1842, to 20th March, 1848, and adds: "These letters have furnished the Department with most acceptable information upon the subject of Central American affairs, within the periods mentioned, for which I offer you my hearty thanks."

It may be proper to state further, that the information communicated to the Department by Mr. Savage, has always been interesting and important. In view of these facts, and of the services rendered by Mr. Savage to the interests of the United States, and of their citizens, the Department, though not prepared to recommend that these services should be remunerated at the rate of a chargé's salary, is still of the opinion that an allowance, at the rate of $1,500 or $2,000 per annum, might, with entire propriety, be made for Mr. Savage's diplomatic services during the several periods he has been in actual correspondence with the Government of Guatemala, and with this Department.

The memorial of Mr. Savage's representative is herewith returned.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. L. MARCY.

HON. THOMAS H. BAYLY,
Chairman Committee Foreign Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. BAYLY. It will be perceived, Mr. Chairman, that, although the Secretary recommends that this gentleman be paid during the time he was actually employed, from $1,500 or $2,000 a year, the Committee on Foreign Affairs have taken the smallest sum. They have taken $1,500, and leave to the State Department to adjust the time he was actually employed in the diplomatic service of the country. Here are two Secretaries in succession approving his services and recommending this compensation. I cannot conceive how there can be a doubt about the propriety of the amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. It seems to me that the amendment is a most extraordinary one. Here is a gentleman who assumes the authority of our Minister abroad, representing the sovereignty of this Union, and corresponds with the Secretary of State; and we are now called on to compensate him for so doing. If he were entitled to pay at all, I think the amount named is a little too much for this Congress to appropriate.

I am opposed to the principle recognized by this Congress of making the Representatives of the people the mere machines of the heads of Departments. It is becoming a fixed fact in the legislation of this country, that no money can be appropriated unless a man dwarfs himself into a sycophant, and makes appeals to the heads of Departments to recommend appropriations. It is an outrage on the rights of the people, and I want to see it arrested.

This claim goes back to 1833. I do not know that it is dishonorable sometimes to plead the statute of limitations against these claims.

Mr. McMULLIN. With the gentleman's permission, I would inquire whether, this being a first claim, it ought not to have gone for consideration to the Committee of Claims?

Mr. SEWARD. I did not yield the floor to the gentleman to make a speech. It is no claim at all. This man was not in the employ of the Government. The Secretary of State had no right to make the employment. If he did so we should repudiate all such contracts.

When public functionaries overleap their powers, and act in violation of the Constitution of the country, by recognizing those as foreign ministers who have not been appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, we ought to repudiate their acts.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I renew it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I make the point of order, if it is not too late, that this is a private and individual claim. The party to whom the money is to be paid, was not in the employment of the Government and was not a public officer, and in no respect then can this claim be considered other than as a private claim.

Mr. BAYLY. Upon that point of order I beg leave to say, that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means assumes what the papers show to be an error. The gentleman for whom this appropriation is asked was in the employment of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the point of order raised by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] does not come too late, and the Chair decides that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] is not in order, upon the ground that it is a private claim. The Chair will state this, that wherever amendments are recommended by committees of the House, it is his practice, if he has any doubts upon the subject, to rule them in order; but he applies the rule more strictly when amendments are offered by individual members. The Chair, in this case, has no doubt that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia is a private claim, and therefore rules it out of order.

Mr. BAYLY. It has been the universal rule here that one committee cannot overrule another.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs recommended the adoption of this amendment, and the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union cannot rule an amendment out of order which another committee has recommended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. BAYLY. With all respect to the Chair, I must appeal from that decision; because one committee cannot overrule another upon a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question of appeal is not debatable. If the Chair had any doubts about the matter, he would decide that the amendment was in order. Any claim which had undergone an investigation by a committee of this House comes with more to recommend it to the consideration of the House than any claim offered by an individual member. The Chair has no doubt that the amendment embraces a private claim, and therefore rules it out of order. From this decision the gentleman from Virginia appeals; and the question now is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. PRESTON. Can I be indulged in making a single statement to the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. PRESTON. I would refer the Chair to the case of John Bosman Kerr, where money was superadded in the deficiency bill.

Several MEMBERS. The question is not debatable.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to this statement.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

The question was taken, and the decision was sustained.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer the following amendment:

To Peter Parker for services as chargé d'affaires in China, from May 24, 1853, to January 24, 1854, the day of the arrival at Canton of the Hon. H. Marshall—eight months and seven days—$1,370 78.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Parker is in China as secretary of legation, and in the absence of the commissioner, who is the minister there, he assumed diplomatic relations, as he had done frequently before.

Mr. LETCHER. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether that is not a private claim? Is there any law authorizing that appropriation?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a claim which has been frequently admitted in this kind of bill, and it comes to us sanctioned by the State Department. I was only induced by the request of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to withdraw this amendment when I offered it to the deficiency bill. He said it belonged to this bill, and there is no doubt that it does.

Mr. LETCHER, [to Mr. CHANDLER.] Was Peter Parker ever appointed chargé d'affaires by the United States Government?

Mr. CHANDLER. He was.

Mr. LETCHER. Then why did he not get payment before this time?

Mr. CHANDLER. He comes here now for him. There has been no appropriation made for him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if this individual was appointed minister? Is there any law appointing him?

Mr. CHANDLER. It is the custom of the country, and it has always been so, for secretaries of legation to discharge the duties of ministers, in their absence. This gentleman was appointed secretary of legation in China, and the minister went away and left him in charge of the legation. I am instructed by the State Department that this is the invariable custom. I believe that this gentleman has been so left in charge several times; and he has been invariably paid in this way, by a special appropriation.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Will the Chair allow me a remark at this point, because it will refer to other amendments. It is in relation to these things being authorized by law. We have not only a law, a statute on the subject, but we have the Constitution, which authorizes the President to institute missions, to appoint commercial agents, to appoint every description of foreign representatives. That is the law. And the only necessity for coming to Congress at all, in relation to foreign missions, is for an appropriation to pay them.

There are many other amendments here involving the same principle. The law authorizes the appointment of ministers by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the only thing that the House has to do with the question at all, is to provide the appropriation to pay for their services. The question does not pertain to the House at all.

The CHAIRMAN. In the case before the committee for consideration—the one brought forward by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER]—the services have been rendered. No appropriation had been made up to the time of the execution of those services. The case, therefore, in the judgment of the Chair, cannot be otherwise than one of a private claim against the Government, and on that ground the Chair rules it to be out of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Chair will allow me to take an appeal from that most strange decision. I wish to say that—

The CHAIRMAN. Remarks are not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. Before the question on the appeal is taken, I desire to have a clause in the appropriation bill of the last Congress read. It relates to Peter Parker.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not propose to debate the matter, but only desire a clause of a former appropriation bill read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair looks upon that as debate.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to the reading.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I have no objection to hearing the clause read, if the gentleman from Virginia will allow me to make a suggestion.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate is in order.

The question then being, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. INGERSOLL called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MIDDLESWORTH, and HARRIS of Alabama, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 74, noes 46.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in addition to what he has already stated, that this amendment would properly come in as an amendment to a deficiency bill, but not as an amendment to the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I have another amendment, which I am instructed by the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer. It is as follows:

For compensation to Joseph Graham, while acting as chargé d'affaires at Buenos Ayres.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise the same question of order in reference to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that the amendment is not in order for the same reason as the last.

Mr. BAYLY. Is not the question of order debatable?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, sir, will the Chair allow me, who have had some experience in this House, to make a single explanation in reference to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very happy to hear the gentleman, if there be no objection.

Mr. SKELTON. I object, as the same privilege was denied me just now.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, sir, I am exceedingly embarrassed by these proceedings—

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must interrupt the gentleman. The question of order is not debatable, and objection has been made to his proceeding.

Mr. PRATT. I appeal to the gentleman to withdraw his objection to the explanation of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SEWARD. I want to know whether it will throw this question open for all of us to discuss?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This question of order, as I understand it, is not debatable under the five-minute rule. I must object.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, sir, I shall offer no more amendments from the committee over which I have the honor to preside, though there are a good many which I have been instructed to offer. This decision is in violation of the whole course of proceeding in this House—

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia is not in order.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, sir, I appeal to the gentleman to allow me to say a single word upon the question of order.

Mr. JONES. If there is any one in this House I would do it for, it is the gentleman from Virginia; but, sir, if we commence this discussion where is it to stop? I think we had better adhere to the rules, and confine ourselves to debate upon questions on which it can legitimately take place.

Mr. BAYLY. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Tennessee has been permitted to make remarks upon this question, I presume the Chair will not rule me out of order in replying to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee as debating the question of order; he only stated the reasons why he would not withdraw his objection.

Mr. BAYLY. Well, sir, I shall offer, as it is my duty to do, the amendments which have been intrusted to my care by the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and let them be ruled out of order, if that is the decision of the Chair. I offer the following amendment:

For the payment to Anna S. P. Chew, executrix of William W. Chew, for his outfit as chargé d'affaires to Russia, $4,000.

Mr. LETCHER. I make the same point there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair makes the same decision.

Mr. BAYLY. I offer the following amendment:

For the payment to Charles D. Aspendson, while he acted as chargé d'affaires at Stockholm, $1,681 25.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise the same point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair makes the same decision.

Mr. BAYLY. I offer the following amendment:

For the payment to Ferdinand Coxe, for his services as chargé d'affaires at Brazil, $672 95.

Mr. LETCHER. I raise the same point of order there.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair makes the same decision.

Mr. PRESTON. I appeal from that decision.

The question was put on sustaining the decision of the Chair; and, on a division, there were—ayes 61, noes 39.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WHEELER and ASKE were appointed.

The question was taken; and the decision of the Chair was sustained, the tellers having reported—ayes 67, noes 54.

Mr. BAYLY. I have one more amendment to offer:

For compensation to Francis Daines for the discharge of the United States consular duties at Constantinople, from the 16th of May, 1849, to the 20th December, 1852, in conformity to the act of Congress approved the 11th August, 1848, $3,794 50.

I desire to say, in respect to this amendment, that I hold in my hand the Congressional Globe, from which it appears that this was offered as an amendment to the deficiency bill, and entertained by the then Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It was passed by this House, and stricken out of the bill in the Senate solely upon the ground that it did not belong to the deficiency bill, but to the civil and diplomatic bill. I say, after an examination of the subject, that the law provides for the payment of this sum to this man, and the only reason upon the face of the earth why it has not been paid, is, that there is no appropriation provided for that purpose. In that respect it stands precisely upon the same footing with the other amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. If this money is actually due to this man, and Congress ought to pay it, why does not the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs introduce a bill here, accompanied by a report, showing the fact, and let that bill be considered upon its merits?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] as raising a point of order upon the amendment?

Mr. LETCHER. I do make the point of order, that it is a private claim.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will answer the question of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER] It is the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill making appropriation for all that is due under existing laws. If they omit anything, as in this case, it is necessary that some other committee should offer an amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. This is a case which originated in the year 1839.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say to my friend from Georgia that this is not in pursuance of law as I understand it, at least it is not an estimate that was ever before the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. BAYLY. I undertake to say, after an examination of the case, that it is made in pursuance of law and of a recommendation of the Department of State. There is no difficulty about the payment, except that we want the appropriation necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. In deciding the question of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia, the Chair adheres to the decision which he made, and which has been twice affirmed by the committee, that the bill which is now under consideration is a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1855, and that these amendments are not in order to it. The Chair states that if he had been presiding over the committee at the time when the deficiency bill was under consideration, he would have entertained these amendments, believing them to belong to the deficiency bill; but he cannot do so to the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following resolution:

For books voted to the members of the Thirty-Third Congress by the joint resolution of 24th February, 1854, and by the resolution of the House of 20th June, 1854, $199,510 87.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have an amendment to offer, which is connected with the paragraph preceding that to which the gentleman from Georgia proposes his.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to hearing the gentleman's amendment read.

Mr. HOUSTON. My amendment comes in after line eight hundred and ninety-seven.

Mr. SEWARD. I object, then, to his amendment being offered now.

The object of my amendment, as the House will perceive, is to provide the necessary amount of money to pay for the books we have ordered for the new members, in addition to the one hundred and sixty copies of Hickey's Constitution. It is not necessary for me to make any remarks upon the subject, as the House is familiar with the question. The amount I proposed to appropriate covers the entire cost of the books for the new members, and the one hundred and sixty copies for the old members. The amendment is drawn up in conformity to the resolution which has been passed by this House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I offer the following as an amendment to the amendment:

And it shall be the duty of the Clerk of the House to purchase of any person offering the same at publishers' prices, any of the works herein appropriated for, which cannot be furnished by the respective publishers.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish the gentleman from Georgia would withdraw his amendment, and allow it to come in under the next head—miscellaneous. It properly comes in under the head "miscellaneous." I have an amendment which I desire to offer, and which is connected with the survey of the public lands.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia comes in after the first clause, under the head "miscellaneous."

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not so understand it. If that is so, I have an amendment which I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer before the head "miscellaneous" is taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was misled as to the place where the gentleman desired to have his amendment come in, from the fact that he indorsed it to come in at line eight hundred and ninety-eight instead of line eight hundred and ninety-seven. The amendment is properly in order before the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The amendment of Mr. HOUSTON was then read, as follows:

For the salaries and incidental expenses of the commission appointed under the act of March 30, 1851, for settling land claims in California, $105,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] to the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. SEWARD.]

Mr. DISNEY. I desire to offer an amendment before that amendment is acted upon, to come in before the head "miscellaneous." It is in pursuance of the estimates made by the Commissioner of the Land Office, to carry out the provisions passed a few days since for extending the surveys of the public lands.

The amendment was read, as follows:

For surveying the necessary base, meridian, standard, parallels, township and section lines, in New Mexico, $30,000.

For surveying the necessary base, meridian, standard, parallels, township and section lines, in Kansas and Nebraska, $50,000.

For the salary of the surveyor general of New Mexico, and clerks in his office, $7,500.

For salary of the surveyor general of Kansas and Nebraska, and clerks in his office, $2,000.

For office rent, fuel, and incidental expenses, in New Mexico, $3,000.

For clerk hire, office rent, fuel, and incidental expenses, in Kansas and Nebraska, ($6,000 being allowed for office rent, fuel, and incidental expenses,) $14,300.

Mr. DISNEY. I simply desire to say that this amendment is offered by direction of the Committee on Public Lands. It has been prepared in accordance with estimates furnished by the General Land Office. It is necessary to carry out the provisions in the various territorial bills providing for the survey of the public lands in these Territories.

The amendment was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon Mr. JONES's amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. SEWARD.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if adopted, will have no influence and no effect upon the books that members are to receive; but it is merely applicable to the Clerk, who is charged with the duty of purchasing these books. If the publishers have these books, he will take them at the publishers' prices; but if they do not have them on hand, and cannot furnish them, the Clerk then, under the present arrangement, may procure them of other persons, at any price he can get them for, and furnish them to us at the publishers' price. The sole object which I have in offering this amendment, is to prevent the Clerk from purchasing these books of other persons at less than the publishers' price, and thus making the Government pay for them at the publishers' price.

Mr. SEWARD. I am somewhat surprised that the gentleman from Tennessee should undertake to provide for such an emergency as he speaks of, and which he seems to contemplate. Sir, if the gentleman from Tennessee were to have the management of the matter himself, I imagine the members would be deprived of their books altogether; for I understand him to be opposed in toto to this whole appropriation.

Mr. JONES. I am.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman from Tennessee believes the whole system to be wrong. Well, sir, I am not disposed to argue that question with him at this time. I might do it, if the original proposition were now before the committee. I will simply say that the furnishing of these one hundred and sixty copies of the Constitution to each member is a matter of no personal concern to the members themselves. They are furnished for distribution, and not for the members themselves. But, sir, I think the gentleman has some ulterior object in offering his amendment which he has not disclosed. I hold that the Clerk of this House is not compelled to go into the market and purchase the books at any given price. He is to purchase them for whatever they are worth, and furnish them to the Government at the price he pays for them. But I do not believe this is what the gentleman from Tennessee desires to accomplish. He has some ulterior purpose, that does not appear upon the face of the amendment, which he has not the frankness to disclose.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Georgia is mistaken in toto. No such purpose exists, except in the imagination of the gentleman. The amendment is plain and simple. It speaks for itself.

Mr. SEWARD. Then why is it that the gentleman insists upon this amendment? Is it because he thinks the Clerk of the House will purchase these books at one price, and sell them to the Government at another price?

Mr. JONES. I want the Clerk to procure them at the publishers' prices, and the Government to pay for them at the publishers' prices.

Mr. SEWARD. Certainly. It is to prevent the Clerk from practising a fraud upon the Government. Under the resolution, as it now stands, it is the duty of the Clerk to purchase the books upon the best possible terms, and subvert the interests of the Government as best he can. I think the amendment unnecessary, and I hope the committee will vote it down. I ask for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected; there being, on a division—ayes 47, nays 80.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to reduce the amount of the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia, $99,000. I have no hope of the adoption of the motion for reduction; but I move it simply for the purpose of making a brief explanation.

The gentleman from Georgia said that members were not interested in the copies of Hickey's Constitution, ordered yesterday. I concede that they are not, beyond a very slight electioneering distribution of them.

Mr. SEWARD. Has not the gentleman been in the habit of electioneering in that way ever since he has been in Congress?

Mr. JONES. I have distributed what books were voted me among my constituents.

I was going to remark, that there is one individual who is peculiarly interested in this matter, and he is the compiler of Hickey's Constitution. There have been furnished the Senate heretofore, with those now ordered, thirty-nine thousand eight hundred and sixty-six copies of that book, at a cost of $40,366. The first two thousand were at $1 25 per copy, the rest at $1 each.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. I think that the gentleman ought to confine his remarks to the character of his amendment. He is discussing the general question.

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir; I have moved to reduce the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee will be in order, if he proposes to apply them by showing that the appropriation should be less than that contemplated, because the books can be purchased cheaper.

Mr. JONES. The House has had furnished it heretofore four hundred and ninety-six copies, which it is reported to me from the Clerk's office cost two dollars each. The first of them did cost two dollars; but I ask the House—

Mr. SEWARD. I call the gentleman to order. He is not in order in talking of the past transactions of the Clerk of the House in reference to the purchase of these books.

Mr. JONES. I am going on to show, Mr. Chairman, that these books ought not to cost as much as is proposed.

Mr. SEWARD. Let the gentleman confine his remarks to the present cost.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman's object be as he states, the Chair is of the opinion that he is in order.

Mr. JONES. The four hundred and ninety-six copies heretofore furnished the House, at two dollars each, would amount to $992. The number ordered for the present House is thirty-eight thousand six hundred and twenty-two, which, at one dollar, will cost $38,622; making, with what the Senate have taken, $79,970. It is estimated, I believe, by those who know something about what the cost of this work is, that it can be published at a cost of forty cents a volume, leaving some sixty cents clear profit upon each volume. If that estimate is right, the whole amount paid to Mr. Hickey will be $79,970; the profit derived by him from the sale of the work will be $47,982; and he is all the time in the employment of the Government as one of the officers of the Senate, and his salary has been increased within the last year to $1,800 or $2,000. If we strike out the amount named in the amendment, and have these books printed by the public printer, they would cost us about forty cents per copy, and it would save some $25,000 to the Government.

Mr. SEWARD. I would inquire of the gentleman whether Mr. Hickey has not secured the copy-right of this work?

Mr. JONES. I do not know, indeed. It is the Constitution of the United States, Washington's Farewell Address, the Declaration of Independence, and some few other things of that kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. I understood the gentleman from Tennessee, yesterday, to take the position that these books, when published, are put into the market, and that they are sold for a price less than the publisher's price. I do not see how it is possible that these books can be sold for a less price than the Government pays Mr. Hickey for them, unless the gentleman intends to make a general charge against members of Congress that they intend to take the one hundred and sixty copies of the Constitution and put them into the market. I hope the gentleman will state where these books are to be found, what private individuals have them in their possession, and how they can get into the market? If the publisher can sell more than he has published, to the Government, as that amendment contemplates, I desire to know how it is that private individuals can get them at sixty cents a volume.

Mr. JONES. The amendment which I offered before, about the purchasing of books, could not apply to Mr. Hickey's book, because he can furnish you as many as you want.

Mr. SEWARD. I understood the amendment as contemplating that the Clerk could make the purchase of the books for less money from private individuals. I desire to know how these books get into the hands of private parties, so that they can sell them for a less price than the publisher. I have heard it said in private circles that members of Congress sell the books they receive from the Government. I hold it to be the duty of Congress to expel any member who shall be guilty of such a thing.

Mr. JONES. As I before stated, Mr. Chairman, it is these books which are out of print, in the hands of the publishers, and not Mr. Hickey's work on the Constitution. It is your "American Archives," your "State Papers," and some others; and I ask if they are in the hands of the publishers? If so, why put into the resolution yesterday that provision, that if any of these books cannot be procured they may buy other books in lieu of them to the same amount? That is the provision of the resolution; and I would ask again if many of these books which are distributed have not been redistributed, by being purchased, and given out again and again? There have been more copies of them distributed by Congress than ever were printed in the country.

Mr. SEWARD. If that be true, all that I have to say in relation to it is, that if the gentleman from Tennessee has information to that effect, he ought to place it before the House.

Mr. JONES. I can tell the gentleman from Georgia that one of his colleagues told me here that he had bought, some years ago, a full set of books, which had been voted to a member of Congress, costing some $500 or $600, at $125.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to object, because these books are sometimes found in the hands of individuals to whom they were not assigned by Congress. But if a member of Congress die, what use would his family have of his statutes, or of his law library, or of his congressional documents? They may, of course, in such a case, be sold.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. JONES. I would wish to alter that by reducing the appropriation to $38,000.

Mr. SEWARD. The gentleman cannot modify the resolution.

Mr. JONES. I can modify my own proposition. I move to reduce the appropriation to $38,424.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can modify his proposition under the rules of the House, though he cannot withdraw it.

The question was taken on the motion to reduce the appropriation to $38,424; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. BARRY. I propose to offer the same amendment as that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] a few moments since, with the alteration of a word or two.

Mr. SEWARD. I object. If it is the same amendment as that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, it has already been decided by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order to offer the same amendment. The Clerk will read it, that the committee may decide whether it is the same.

The amendment was read, as follows:

And it will be the duty of the Clerk of the House to purchase from any person offering the same, at not more than publishers' prices, any of the books herein appropriated for, which cannot be furnished by the respective publishers.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is in order.

Mr. BARRY. The object of my amendment is simply this: It is well understood that after the order for the distribution of these books has been made by the House, the publishers send round the country and buy the books as best they can, at one half, one quarter, and even sometimes at a less proportion of the original price. They then bring these second-hand books and sell them to the Congress of the United States at the original price at which they were sold. The amendment which I offered will, if adopted, enable those who possess books which we desire to procure to offer them to Congress at less than publishers' prices. This will prevent publishers from having a monopoly, as they have under the present system. This thing, as everybody knows, has grown into an outrageous abuse. Every man here is aware of it, although it is not susceptible of proof. There is not a gentleman on this floor who would question or dispute the fact that books which have been voted to members of Congress are sold half a dozen times over, and may again be sold half a dozen times over. Members of Congress die, whose libraries are sold as private property. Members of Congress dispose of these books, or they fall into the hands of those who dispose of them; and then publishers buy them again.

There is no excuse and no palliation for the course of voting these books to members to such a large amount, except the single fact that former members of Congress have received these books, and now they must be voted to new members, as they had been voted on former occasions to old ones. Thus it goes on in constantly increasing proportion; and there will be no limit to it but the continuance of the Government and the want of means by Congress to buy these books. It originated, as abuses generally do, in a small beginning. It set out, at the start, with voting to members a few books which they could not purchase, which were only published by the Government, and which, consequently, could not be had by those even who were willing to spend their money for them. The next step was to add books which every man could buy, and which every man, who needed a library, was bound to buy. Thus it was that the Congress of the United States placed itself in the condition of voluntarily going into the market and purchasing books for themselves. For this there is no apology except their own feelings of economy, and their desire to save their own money and to spend the money of the people.

Now, the one hundred and sixty copies of Hickey's Constitution, which you have voted to yourselves, will not go to the people who are not able to purchase them for themselves, but they will be sent by members of Congress to their particular friends throughout the country, who are men of influence, activity, and energy, and who will use them to aid these members of Congress in their canvass. I say they will not go to individuals who want the information, but are destitute of the means to purchase it. They will go to those who can purchase the book; and the appropriation of the books will turn out to be a mere gratuity to men of character and fortune throughout the country. Every man must know this. You will find in the next canvass this Hickey's Constitution, sent by members of Congress, on the center tables, and in the most expensive libraries—

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not debating the merits of the question. The gentleman talks about distributing these books for the benefit of individual members. It must be that the gentleman intends to distribute these one hundred and sixty volumes for his own benefit.

Mr. BARRY. If I were to do it, I should have illustrious precedents; and it would only be doing what forty-nine out of fifty members will do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Mississippi is taking a great deal of latitude in his remarks.

Mr. BARRY. It may be; but I am illustrating the abuse of this system; and my amendment proposes to remedy that abuse, so far as it can be done. I propose to enable the Clerk of the House to purchase those books from any man who will sell them to him, provided he does not ask more than the publishers' prices. The resolution, as it passed the other day, requires him to give the publishers' prices, although they may be second or third-hand books.

I understand there was a resolution offered some years ago, that each member's name should be put upon every volume voted to him, so that it could not be resold, without its giving evidence of the source from which it came. Such a course ought to be adopted now; and if adopted, there would be an end of all this reselling of books by members.

Mr. CHANDLER. All which that amendment contains is in the resolution as adopted.

The imputation which the honorable gentleman has cast upon members of Congress may be deserved or may not be deserved. Self-respect will lead us all to suppose that each man upon our right and upon our left is as pure as ourselves. I trust, therefore, that no resolution will be adopted of the kind which implies that members of Congress are, instead of being honorable, dishonorable gentlemen; instead of being in the reception of valuable documents for the purpose of distribution, are vending out their wares to clerks or somebody else. If such a misfortune should befall any of us, it will be time enough then for gentlemen to come forward and make personal explanations.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not wish gentlemen of the committee to suppose that I make any imputation upon them for selling their books.

Mr. HENN. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman is not arguing against the amendment.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] was, and I am speaking in his time. I believe that when the House votes books to a member he takes them as private property, and he has as much right to sell them in market, and to do what he pleases with the money, as he has to appropriate his per diem and mileage as he chooses.

Mr. CHANDLER. The only remark I shall make in reference to that amendment is, that all of it that is valuable is contained in the resolution introduced a few days since explanatory of the joint resolution. We cannot alter that resolution with propriety; and it is hardly necessary for us to undertake it.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the original amendment offered by Mr. SEWARD; and being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MURRAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following amendment:

To enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to purchase from the publishers, Messrs. Lippincott, Grambo & Co., two hundred copies of the second and third volumes of Schoolcraft's History, &c., of the Indian tribes of the United States, to complete the sets of new members of the House of Representatives, at three dollars and fifty cents per volume, $1,400: Provided, That the said volumes shall be of the same style and quality of those heretofore furnished.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. MURRAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to offer the following:

1. For the completion of the printing of the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, $20,000;

2. For the purchase of paper for the completion of the printing of the first session of the Thirty-Third Congress, $43,000;

3. For deficiency in the estimates heretofore submitted for the printing of the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress, $10,000;

4. For two additional clerks in the office of the Superintendent of the Public Printing, authorized by the joint resolution approved February 6, 1854, at $1,500 each, $3,000;

5. For rent of wareroom for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855, $250;

6. For cartage and labor, in storing and transportation of paper from wareroom and office of Superintendent to the offices of the public printers, $550.

Here is a letter from the Superintendent of Printing, which will explain the necessity of the appropriations, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The letter was read, as follows:

"Items 1 and 2.—These two items are rendered necessary by the largely increased orders of both Houses of Congress for additional numbers of the usual annual documents, as well as their increased size; by the reprinting of large editions of documents which had been printed at the preceding session; by the order for a large edition (one hundred and fifty thousand copies) of a Compendium of the Seventh Census; and also by the clause in the deficiency bill, just passed, amending the printing act of 1852, by which the composition of all documents heretofore ordered by both Houses of Congress is to be paid for twice instead of but once, as heretofore. This office was aware, during the preparation of the deficiency bill, that a considerable deficiency would occur in the appropriations for the printing and paper for the present session of Congress; but, at that early period of the session, it was impossible to make an approximate estimate of the extent of the orders for printing.

"Item 3.—An addition of $10,000 to the estimates heretofore submitted for the printing of the two Houses of Congress ($5,000 to each) is made necessary by the amendment to the printing act of 1852 above referred to."

Mr. HOUSTON. The last two items, for the rent of room, $250, and for cartage and labor, $550, were contested here, and rejected when the deficiency bill was under consideration. They were ultimately agreed to, on the ground that the Committee on the Public Printing of the two Houses had authorized the Superintendent to provide for these objects. The argument used there does not apply here. This is an appropriation for another year. There is no necessity for these two items, in my opinion. That is the opinion of the committee, who have given them thorough examination. Contracts with the paper manufacturers have been heretofore, and ought to be hereafter, that they should deliver paper in such quantities and at such places as the Superintendent designated. That I may vote for the amendment offered by the gentleman, I move to strike out the last two items.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I move an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. STANTON. I move to amend what is proposed to be stricken out. I wish to add one dollar to the appropriation. Cannot I do that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. STANTON. My amendment has precedence. I have the right to amend any portion proposed to be stricken out before the question is taken on striking out.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to reply to the gentleman in reference to the necessity for these two items. The same necessity exists now which existed at the time the Joint Committee on the Public Printing gave its assent to the Superintendent. It grows out of the fact that an immense amount of labor is thrown on the hands of the Superintendent. It is true that the contractors are required to deliver the paper wherever he directs. In the absence of a warehouse, he would direct that it be sent to the printers. The printers say that they have not room for it. It is not a part of their duty, they allege, to take care of this property, and to insure its safety. All they want is a sufficient quantity to do the various jobs that are sent to them.

Mr. PRATT. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] allow me to ask him a question. Is not the surplus paper stored within this building, and is there not room for ten times as much as is ever on hand at any one time?

Mr. STANTON. A very small portion of the paper intended for printing is stored in the room occupied by the Superintendent of the Public Printing. But the gentleman asks if the surplus paper is not stored within this building.

Mr. PRATT. It is stored in this building, and is seen as we are passing through it.

Mr. STANTON. Where?

Mr. PRATT. Just below the rotunda.

Mr. STANTON. Does not the gentleman know that the paper to which he refers is that used for packing and folding? There is not room enough in this building for storing the paper used for printing. I withdraw the amendment I offered.

Mr. PRATT. I object to the withdrawal of the amendment. I consider this proposition to be on a par with a good many others that are made here, the object of which is to procure appropriations of money by the General Government for the benefit of private individuals. I mean to attribute no improper motives to the Committee on Printing, or to any gentleman upon this floor. But I do know that there are individuals prowling about this Capitol who manage to sponge money from the General Government, and they do it in a manner which I cannot approve. I do not believe that it was proper to make the appropriation we did for last year for storing and carting paper, and all that kind of thing. I do not believe, because we concluded to pay the expenses of last year incurred in this way, that it is any reason why we should do it another year. I am opposed, in fact, to the whole proposition.

The question was then taken on Mr. STANTON's amendment; and it was rejected.

The question then recurring upon Mr. HOUSTON's amendment, it was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The question was then taken on Mr. MURRAY's amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. DISNEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands to offer the following amendment:

For compensation to draughtsmen and clerks employed on the maps of the public lands, under the resolution of 4th May, 1848, $7,500.

It is hardly necessary for me to state to the committee that the amendment is to provide compensation to the clerks and draughtsmen employed on the maps of the public lands, in pursuance of the order of the House.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I offer the following amendment:

For the completion of the bridge at the Little Falls, in the District of Columbia, $75,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended except in fulfillment of a contract which the Secretary of the Interior is hereby required to make, if in his power to do so, for the completion of said bridge for the amount hereby appropriated; and it shall be, and is hereby declared to be, the duty of said Secretary to require the contractor or contractors to give bond with ample security for the fulfillment of his contract.

Mr. SMITH. The subject has been so much before the committee that it is hardly necessary for me to speak upon it. This Government has exclusive jurisdiction over the District of Columbia, and it is bound to promote its interests. I would state, however, that originally the bridge at the Little Falls was owned by a joint stock company, and that their interest in it was purchased up by the Government. The improvement for which this appropriation is proposed, is necessary to the commerce and trade of the surrounding country. A large sum has been already expended on the bridge; and I suppose Congress will not allow what has been erected to go to ruins.

This appropriation, according to the evidence which I have here, will put it in a complete condition; and I hope, therefore, it will be the pleasure of the committee to pass it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I move to increase the appropriation $100.

I make this motion simply with a view to state that all of us here who have listened to the debate some time ago in relation to the bridge above Georgetown, and the manner in which it happened to fall while being raised under the supervision of the gentleman designated by the gentleman from Kentucky, on my right, [Mr. STANTON,] must have a desire to see the people of this District accommodated with a bridge above Georgetown some way or other.

I understand, from the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] that this $75,000, if appropriated, would complete that bridge, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. And I also understand from him, and from various other persons, that this crossing of the Potomac is one of the main thoroughfares to this city, by which the people from the surrounding country, hundreds of miles round, bring their produce to the market, in the cheapness and good supply of which we are all interested.

Therefore, as a member of Congress, I feel myself called upon by the sixty thousand people in this District who are without a vote, for a member of Congress, without the privilege of voting for a President, while we are their exclusive legislators; I feel myself bound, I say, to take care of their interests as far as I can.

I think it is a public duty we owe to them, and I cheerfully vote for this appropriation, under the assurance that a bridge can be built there, substantially and properly, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, or under his direction, which will greatly promote the interests of this District and neighborhood, and that of the public men who are obliged to assemble here.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman from Ohio proposes to increase the amount contained in this amendment $100. Well, sir, I am opposed to that. I object to increasing it, because it is wholly unnecessary. Of course, I am very much obliged to the gentleman for his support of the particular views which the amendment involves; but, inasmuch as $75,000 will accomplish all the objects I have in view, I think an increase is unnecessary.

Mr. TAYLOR. Then I will withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, no, no! I beg the gentleman's pardon. That is the foundation of my speech. [Laughter.] I want to make some remarks in opposition.

I beg this committee to understand that the amendment which I have offered does not bind the Secretary of the Interior to go on with the plan heretofore adopted. I drew it up directly with a view to avoid that consequence, because there are gentlemen upon this floor who are opposed to iron bridges. Believing that, and keeping in view, also, our recent experience with another iron bridge, I leave it entirely to the judgment and intelligence of the Secretary of the Interior to make such a contract as he may see fit.

I say to this committee that, with the stone piers which are already up, $75,000 will give us a noble structure, one that will be a credit to the District, and fully and completely satisfactory to the wants of the District.

Mr. STUART, of Michigan. Where is the bridge?

Mr. SMITH. It is across the Potomac at the Little Falls, some ten or a dozen miles from here.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Four miles.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will allow me to interrupt him a moment, I will merely state, in order that the gentleman may indicate the fact to the House, that at this point there has been a bridge, which was carried away by the flood.

Mr. SMITH. I have already stated to the committee that forty years ago there was a private toll bridge there. I stated, also, that Congress bought out the proprietors, upon the ground that it was their duty to provide a bridge for the use of the people of the District and the neighborhood. I stated that there was a chain bridge there which was swept away by the flood.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Will the $75,000 fully complete this bridge?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly; entirely complete it.

Mr. TAYLOR. Let us vote it, then.

Mr. SMITH. I hope and trust the House will pass it.

Mr. FLORENCE. With the gentleman's permission, I will say that I am acquainted with a party of gentlemen who have a very excellent plan of a bridge which can be put up for $75,000.

Mr. PECKHAM. Philadelphians?

Mr. FLORENCE. No, but Washingtonians.

Mr. BARRY. I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say that this bridge can be completed for $75,000. I suggest to him, while I do not intend to vote for the proposition, that he had better incorporate in the amendment a provision that the work shall not be undertaken unless a contract shall be entered into that it shall be constructed for that sum.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. All that is expressly set forth in the amendment.

Mr. CUMMING. I shall vote for the appropriation for this bridge. But I desire to inquire of the gentleman if he knows what has become of the last iron bridge which was constructed there?

Mr. SMITH. It is lying there now.

Mr. CUMMING. I am going to vote for the amendment. I only wished to know what had become of that bridge.

Mr. SMITH. Oh, it is all there.

Mr. BARRY. I move pro forma to increase the appropriation fifty dollars. I move it for the purpose of giving me an opportunity of explaining to the gentleman from New York, and to the committee, the condition of that bridge, and the circumstances connected with its fall, which were not explained, or not understood, when the matter was before the committee on a former occasion. The gentleman who attempted to build this bridge did it on a specific private contract. He contracted with the Government to build it at a specific price; and he being the contractor, the Government had no more control over the work, except to see that the material used in its construction was sound and proper, than it has over the work of any other private contractor. And when it was proposed to raise the bridge, the contractor said he would do it upon his own responsibility. He made the attempt, and the bridge fell, but not in consequence of any defect in the iron of which it was constructed, but because of the breaking of some straps or of some portion of the machinery used in raising it. When it had been raised six inches, it fell and broke all to pieces.

The breaking of the bridge, under these circumstances, was no indication that it was not constructed of the proper material. The same thing happened in raising the bridge across the Menai Straits, in Great Britain, under the supervision of Mr. Stephenson, the first civil engineer in the world. Some part of the machinery broke, and it fell one inch, destroying the whole bridge, because a structure of that length cannot bear such a jar without great injury, if not entire destruction.

But, sir, this gentleman did receive money from the Government as the work progressed, as I believe is usual in such cases, and at the same time he gave security to the Government upon property in this city. The security, I believe, amounts to about $4,000. I understand the wrought iron and other materials, the remains of the bridge, are worth, perhaps, as much as $4,000 more; so that there is reason to believe that there is security to the Government to the amount of about $8,000 for the $12,000 which had been paid by the Government. The contractor agreed, for the consideration which he was to receive, to complete the bridge; but the money paid by the Government will be a total loss, with the exception of the security given by the contractor—Mr. Rider, I believe—and the fragments of the bridge—the wrought iron, &c., which remain.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. If I understood the gentleman from Mississippi, who has just taken his seat, he has gone into a calculation to see how much money the Government can make out of this contractor—this meritorious contractor in the city of Washington.

Mr. BARRY. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state my purpose in doing it. When this matter was before the committee some time ago, the objection was made that no one could tell how much had been lost on the other bridge. No member then could furnish the information; and since that time I have taken the trouble to inquire into the matter.

Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, I hope the House will give us a bridge.

Mr. BARRY, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SKELTON. I move to reduce the appropriation to $38,000.

Mr. Chairman, I make the motion for reduction in good faith, and to test the sense of this committee on the important question involved in the amendment as to the construction of bridges. The bridge proposed to be constructed is of as much interest and advantage to Virginia as to the District of Columbia. I doubt the propriety of making such appropriations even for the District of Columbia. It is asserted that we ought to make these appropriations, because we are the guardians of this District. I think it is hardly proper to make such appropriations for the State of Virginia. If the amendment be adopted, I shall move to require the State of Virginia, before the money is expended, to make an equal appropriation for the same purpose. The bridge extends from the District to the Virginia side. That State being as much interested and advantaged, should pay half the expense.

Mr. SMITH. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SKELTON. The gentleman will have chance for reply. I object to these appropriations for another reason. We annually expend millions of dollars for this District. I should not be inclined to find fault with them, were it not that they so impoverish the Treasury that it cannot afford $10,000 to save four hundred human lives on the coast of the State of New Jersey. They exhaust the Treasury, and prevent the provision of $10,000 to save those shipwrecked on our coast. In the latter appropriation the whole country is deeply interested. For this, and various other reasons, which I shall not now detain the committee by repeating, I have moved to reduce the appropriation.

Mr. PECKHAM. It seems to me that this is a grave and good point on which to rise. I make the motion.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 66, noes 39.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. ORR) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

Friday, June 23, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, by unanimous consent, this being private bill day, presented a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to the Senate's resolution of the 13th instant, communicating copies of the quarterly and other accounts of the expenditures of the Mint; which,

On motion by Mr. FISH, was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ALLEN. I wish to ask the consent of the Senate to allow me to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers of John O'Leary, a pensioner. Among those papers is a certificate on which he draws his pension. Without it, he cannot receive the money. The papers are on the files of the Senate, and he is, therefore, not able to draw his pension. I move that he have leave to withdraw the papers.

The motion was agreed to.

BRIG GENERAL ARMSTRONG.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill—reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations—for the relief of the claimants of the private armed brig General Armstrong.

By the bill the Secretary of State is authorized and directed to examine and adjust the claims of citizens of the United States growing out of the destruction of the private armed brig General Armstrong, belonging to the port of New York, destroyed by a British force in the neutral port of Fayal, in September, 1814, and to settle the same upon principles of justice and equity.

On the 26th and 27th of September, 1814, the American private armed brig General Armstrong, commanded by Captain Samuel C. Reid, while at anchor in the neutral port of Fayal, belonging to the dominions of Portugal, was attacked by the gun-boats of a large British squadron, commanded by Captain Lloyd, in violation of the laws of neutrality. The squadron consisted of his Britannic Majesty's vessels, the ship-of-the-line Plantagenet, of seventy-four guns, the frigate Rota, of forty-four guns, and the brig Carnation, of eighteen guns. The General Armstrong carried but seven guns and ninety men. After a defense unparalleled in the history of naval warfare, the Americans sustained a loss of but two killed and seven wounded, while the loss in killed and wounded on the part of the enemy was between two and three hundred. The squadron was detained ten days at Fayal in repairing damages. They were occupied three days in burying their dead. The sloop-of-war, the Thais and Calypso, which arrived a few days afterwards, were taken into requisition to carry home the wounded men. The latter sailed for England on the 2d, and the former on the 4th of October, 1814.

On the representations afterwards made of the facts of the case by the Portuguese Governor of Fayal to his Government, the Prince Regent of Portugal, on the 22d December, 1814, instructed his Minister at London to demand an apology and indemnification from the English Government for the outrage committed. England promptly replied by an apology for the loss of Portuguese property occasioned by the firing of the British vessels, but refused to pay for the destruction of the brig General Armstrong.

On the 14th of March, 1818, Mr. J. Q. Adams, Secretary of State, called the attention of the Portuguese Minister at Washington to the claim, and urged its payment by his Government. It seemed to have been overlooked for a period of sixteen years afterwards; and in 1834, Mr. McLane, Secretary of State, informed Captain Reid that the situation of Portugal was such as to render that an unsuitable time for presenting any claim, however just, against that Government. On the 20th of May, 1835, Mr. Dickens, acting Secretary, and on the 14th of April, 1840, Mr. Forsyth, Secretary of State, instructed our chargé at Lisbon to urge the claim. Under President Tyler's administration, Mr. Webster renewed the demand, and a reply in writing was received from the Portuguese Minister, Señor de Castro, in which the liability of Portugal was for the first time denied, and it was boldly asserted that the Americans and not the British had violated the neutrality of the port of Fayal. Under the administration of General Taylor, Mr. Clayton, Secretary of State, strongly urged the claim; and in the final instructions to Mr. J. B. Clay, then chargé at Lisbon, on the 8th of March, 1850, a peremptory demand was made on the Portuguese Government, and twenty days allowed for a reply. The demand was backed by the presence of an American fleet in the river Tagus. In these instructions, Mr. Clayton said that a reference of the claim to arbitration would never receive the sanction of the President. The Government of Portugal, instigated by that of England, continued to resist payment; and on the 11th of July, 1850, Mr. Clay demanded his passports, and left the country. In the mean time, the Portuguese Minister here urged an arbitration; but it was peremptorily declined by our Government.

During the administration of President Fillmore, the claim was, without the knowledge of the claimants, on the proposition of Portugal, submitted to the arbitration of Louis Napoleon, President of the Republic of France. The claimants were not allowed to submit an argument in the case. On the 29th of November, 1852, (more than a year after the case was submitted,) the arbitral decision was rendered, and it was transmitted to the two Governments interested, through their Ministers in France, without our Minister, Mr. Rives, having received any intimation of its nature, and without his having been permitted to make any statement in behalf of the claimants to the arbitrator. It is, in the opinion of the committee, a well-settled principle of law, that the tolerance by a neutral Power of such a violation of its territory, as took place in this case, renders it responsible to the Government, whose citizens have suffered, not only for apology, but for pecuniary indemnity. This Government having submitted the case to arbitration against the remonstrance of the claimants, is responsible to them, for they had a right to expect from the previous conduct of our Government, that it had no doubt of the justice of the claim, and would press it until paid.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; and the President put the question, "Shall the bill be engrossed, and read a third time?" and the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SLIDELL. Mr. President, I had supposed that the mere reading of the report in this case would be sufficient to command for the bill almost the unanimous sanction of the Senate. I must think that perhaps it has not been listened to or read by a large portion of Senators who are present, because I think, if the facts of the case were understood, and the principles involved in it were examined, it could not fail to commend itself to the favorable consideration of a large majority of the Senate.

It is unnecessary for me to recapitulate the facts which are stated in the report of the committee, but I will trespass on the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments, to make a very brief statement of them, and to state what I consider ought to have some influence on the deliberations of the Senate in connection with this case. It was very fully investigated by the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I am authorized to state that the report and the bill which accompanies it, meet the unanimous sanction of that committee. It was under their consideration at more than one session, and although some of the members of the committee approached the case with great doubts as regards the correctness of the principles on which the liability of the Government was sustained, these doubts yielded to a more mature examination of the question.

Sir, I am very far from contending that it is under ordinary circumstances the duty of a Government to enforce even all the just claims of its citizens by war, or that, in the event of its declining to have recourse to belligerent measures for the purpose of enforcing those just claims, a responsibility is thrown on the Government, and it is bound to pay the citizen that which it failed to exact from the foreign nation. In the report which I have had the honor to make on this subject, I have rested the rights of the claimants upon the peculiar circumstances of the case. I will state them very briefly.

During the war of 1812-'15, the brig General Armstrong was lying in the neutral port of Fayal, and entitled to the protection of that neutral port. She was there attacked by several British cruisers, and after a most gallant defense, was destroyed. I think it was one of the most brilliant achievements of that war. Certainly, the annals of naval history cannot show anything more heroic. The Government of Portugal, at that time, recognized the fact that there had been a gross violation of the rights of neutrality, on the part of the British Government, and it remonstrated in earnest terms against that violation. Application was made by our Government for redress.

It is useless to recapitulate the various negotiations and correspondence which have been had on the subject. Suffice it to say, that at one time, I believe under the administration of General Taylor—but the Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] can state under what Administration—a peremptory demand was made for satisfaction.

Mr. CLAYTON. It was under the administration of General Taylor, and I think there was something similar before.

Mr. SLIDELL. A squadron was then sent to the Tagus, for the purpose of enforcing this claim. In the mean time, in consequence of the death of General Taylor, the Fillmore administration came into power. The belligerent ground was thereupon abandoned, and recourse was then had to negotiation. A proposition which had previously been made by Portugal, and rejected, for the submission of the claim to the arbitration of a third Power, was accepted. I am authorized to state, and I can state it without fear of contradiction, that this acceptance of arbitration was made without the knowledge or consent of the claimants. The arbitrator chosen was Louis Napoleon, who, at that time, was President of the French Republic. The case was pending some time before him, and at the period of his decision he had made himself Emperor. The parties immediately interested in the case had not only complained that the reference to a third Power was made without their knowledge and assent, but that they had no opportunity of advocating their rights, or pleading their cause before the arbitrator.

He evidently made a gross mistake in point of fact in the decision of the cause. His decision is based upon the presumption that, in the conflict which resulted in the destruction of the General Armstrong, the crew of that privateer were the aggressors; and this idea rests upon the presumption of the collateral fact that the crews of the boats who approached the General Armstrong in the night, were not armed. The fact of their being armed is abundantly demonstrated by the circumstance of the first lieutenant and two or three of the officers and crew of the General Armstrong having been killed or wounded in the melee.

I think, and the committee thought, that great injustice was done to the claimants in this case in the first instance, in submitting their claims to the arbitration of a third Power without their knowledge or assent, and next a still grosser injustice was committed in depriving them of the means of advocating their case properly before that tribunal.

It appears from the statement of the claimants, that they never were consulted or advised in regard to the prosecution of their claim before the arbitrator. If that opportunity had been afforded to the parties, if Mr. Reid had been authorized to make a resumé of the testimony in the case, and to urge its application on the Ministers to whom the Prince President deputed the examination of the facts—for I presume he did not attend to it personally—I think no such great error would have been committed as was committed by Louis Napoleon in the decision. The error to which I allude, is the statement on which he bases his decision, as follows:

"Considering that if it be clear that on the night of the 27th of September, some English long boats, commanded by Lieutenant Robert Fausset, of the British Navy, approached the American brig General Armstrong, it is not certain that the men who manned the boats aforesaid were provided with arms and ammunition. That it is evident in fact, from the documents which have been exhibited, that the aforesaid long boats having approached the American brig, the crew of the latter, after having hailed them and summoned them to be off, immediately fired upon them, and that some men were killed on board of the English boats, and others wounded—some of whom mortally—without any attempt having been made on the part of the other boats to repel at once force by force."

This is a most extraordinary presumption. In the first place, if it were not refuted by the facts in the case, which are proved beyond all contradiction, the presumption that boats in time of war, at night, would approach an armed vessel of an enemy for the purpose of reconnaissance, without being armed themselves, is one that no reasonable man could entertain. But we have something more than a counter presumption in this case. We have the fact that these boats approached so closely as to invite the fire of the General Armstrong. The first lieutenant, as I said before, and some three or four of the crew of the General Armstrong, were wounded by a fire, coming from what quarter? It could come from no other quarter than those boats; consequently the crew of the boats must have been armed; and, therefore, the whole ground on which the decision of Louis Napoleon was based, is falsified by the testimony in the case—uncontradicted testimony, in regard to the facts, admitted on all sides by the Portuguese Government, in its dealings with this Government, ever since the inception of the affair.

I will state further, that every Administration of our Government, on all occasions, under all circumstances, from the time of Mr. Madison down to that of General Taylor and Mr. Fillmore, until the case was finally decided by arbitration, asserted, in the most unqualified terms, that we had an absolute right to call on Portugal for indemnity.

Now, I come to the question in this case which in fact is the only legal question involved. I say this, admitting that the Government may, if it please, not assert the right of its citizens by arms, after all attempts at peaceable negotiation have failed—I say that, although the Government may not be under obligation to have recourse to that sovereign remedy in vindication of the rights of its citizens, yet it has no right to submit them to the arbitrament of another power unless with the consent of the parties.

They have another remedy, and a very simple one, and that is a remedy which the administration of Mr. Fillmore ought to have applied in this case—time. They should have waited until a more auspicious opportunity occurred to have urged this claim upon the favorable consideration of the Portuguese Government. They thought proper to pursue another course; and I say the effect of the pursuance of such a course, without having at first obtained the consent of the claimants in the case, or without subsequently having received their assent and permission to the action of the Government, put the Government of the United States in the position of Portugal towards the claimants, and made it liable for all the damages they sustained.

I submit to the Senate that it is very clear that if Captain Reid and his crew had not defended the General Armstrong, but had suffered themselves to be captured by the British cruisers in the port of Fayal, no doubt would have been entertained of the necessity of the Portuguese Government making a remuneration for their losses. Shall they, then, be in a worse position because they defended themselves? That is the sole ground upon which the case rests. The arbitrator says, and says, as I think I have shown, without any warrant for such an assertion, that the commander and crew of the General Armstrong were the aggressors in the case. He bases that upon the other assertion, that the boats of the reconnoitering frigates were unarmed. I think that that is proved very conclusively not to have been so; and after all, there is but one question in this case. It is a question which, perhaps, may have some light thrown upon it by drawing an analogy from law.

A Government has the right to enforce, in the ordinary way, the rights of its citizens, and may not then be liable for the non-user or mis-user of its rights; but it has always been understood that a principal, unless he have some express authority, has no right to transact for his client. I consider that the Government of a nation occupies an analogous position. It may have recourse to all ordinary usages and remedies to enforce the claim of its citizens; but the moment it travels out of the beaten track, the moment it attempts to compromise, and transact, and refer to arbitration, then, I say, failing in that arbitration, it makes itself liable to its client—the citizens, in this case—for any damages which they may have sustained, and which the Government, by its act of submitting to arbitration, made itself liable for. These people have no claim now on the Government of Portugal. They have lost their claim on that Government, I think, by the laches and torcs of their own. They come now to this Government to get relief. I trust it will be granted.

The honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] is much more familiar with the facts of this case than I am. He had it under his control while in the Department of State, and I hope that he will give to the Senate the advantage of his information on the subject.

Mr. CLAYTON. I hold in my hand, sir, the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the House of Representatives, made at this session on this claim. It appears that the committees of both Houses agree that the claim should be paid. The report of the committee in the House is unanimous. I will not read it. The main points which are enforced in it have been well presented by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, and are there well enforced by some authorities.

I rise, sir, for the purpose of stating very briefly the grounds on which, as I think, the Government should pay the claim of these claimants for the loss of this vessel at Fayal, in September, 1814. There was nothing in the annals of the last war with Great Britain, there has been nothing in the annals of the naval warfare of the United States, there has been nothing in the annals of the naval warfare of any other nation, that has ever exceeded the gallantry and bravery of the men in charge of the brig General Armstrong at the time she was attacked.

The privateer, mounting only seven guns, with a crew of ninety men, went into the harbor of Fayal, about the 20th of September, 1814, for the purpose of obtaining water. While lying under the guns of the Portuguese battery, a part of the British expedition which was intended for the capture of New Orleans, appeared off the port, consisting of the Plantagenet of seventy-four guns, the frigate Rota of forty-four guns, and the brig Carnation of eighteen guns. They were to rendezvous at Jamaica, with the other portion of the expedition. They were detained ten days, at least, as appears from the testimony, in consequence of the attack which they made on this brig; and they, by reason of that very attack, failed to reach New Orleans until a very considerable time after the day on which it was intended they should have reached there. Indeed, sir, a critical examination of this affair—an examination of the time at which that portion of the expedition that made the attack on this brig in the harbor of Fayal arrived at Jamaica, and the time when General Jackson arrived at New Orleans with the troops necessary for the defense of the city—I think will satisfy you that it is highly probable that the city may have owed its safety on that occasion to the very circumstance of the attack on the privateer. Various estimates are made of the loss of the British on that occasion. Two or three hundred men, at all events, were killed or wounded. On the next day after the battle, two ships-of-war—the Thais and Calypso—arrived on the station, destined also for Jamaica, and they returned with the wounded, amounting to more than one hundred and fifty men, to England. So much of the expedition for New Orleans was cut off in their arrival at Jamaica, and the others were delayed for a long period.

I shall not dwell on this longer. It is very well worthy the curious examination of the historian. But I now come to the merits of the matter.

In my judgment, sir, on high principles of State policy this claim ought to be paid. I do not wish to go into an examination of all the negotiations in regard to the claim, on the part of the Government. I assume—and I suppose every man will admit it—that the Government of the United States owed it to the brig to make a demand against Portugal for the loss sustained by the brig while it was under the protection of Portugal in her neutral port. Portugal admitted her liability with all dispatch to Great Britain, and demanded within two or three months, at least, after the vessel was captured, satisfaction for the violation of her harbor. For a period of twenty years the claim was neglected, and various reasons operated upon the Department of State to lead the gentlemen at the head of that Department not to interfere at particular times. But, at last, when the claimants were expecting that the Government of Portugal would pay the money, it was referred to arbitration, as it appears, without their consent, and without their knowledge. It further appears that no representations whatever were made in their behalf before the Prince President of France, who was the arbitrator. Mr. Rives shows that he made none. It does not appear that he received instructions to make any. The claimants, then, never had an opportunity to present the justice of their claim to the arbitrator; and the result was, what I think every man will be surprised to find, that the facts as admitted by the Government of Portugal herself, and as always understood by the United States, were misrepresented or misunderstood. In the award, the arbitrator assumes the fact that the attack was commenced by the American privateer. If you will look at the correspondence of the Governor of Fayal, you will see that for many hours before the attack was made, he was perfectly apprised that the fleet intended to make that attack on the privateer; and letter after letter, (which are all published,) remonstrating against such an outrage upon a Portuguese port, and demanding, in the name of the law of nations, that it should not be made, were sent by the Governor; but they all met with a most contemptuous answer from the British admiral, who, when the night came on, prepared for the attack first with four boats; and the pretext is set up that the privateer, with only ninety men, commenced the attack upon the boats of this British squadron, composed of all these ships, for the purpose of getting up a fight in a neutral port.

Sir, the privateer had demanded of the Governor of Fayal his protection. What motive or interest under heaven could induce the Americans to commence the attack? It is, to my mind, the most preposterous idea that I ever heard advanced by any arbitrator, that the privateer should commence an attack upon that fleet, an attack which would necessarily result in her destruction. My opinion, sir, is, that it was the most absurd decision that could have been made.

Look at the facts. If you will not believe the American sailors, who all swear that these boats were armed, that they hailed them, that the boats refused to keep off, that they were coming down so closely that they could easily have boarded the brig if they had got alongside the privateer, and perhaps have captured her before her guns could have been brought to bear upon them, if you even reject the testimony of these American sailors, there is other evidence which is conclusive that the alleged ground on which the decision of the arbitrator rested, is absolutely false.

Under these circumstances, you do not, by paying this claim, decide that your Government is bound to pay a claim when it has in good faith prosecuted that claim for one of its citizens, and has by consent of the party, who should always be consulted in such a case, referred his case to arbitration, or even has referred it without his consent if he unreasonably refuses to give it, but has granted him an ample opportunity of being heard before the arbitrator. This case can never furnish a precedent for any claims of that sort. In cases of that kind, the Government would not be bound to pay; but here what would be the effect of refusing to grant this paltry sum of money to these gallant men? The effect of paying it will be to stimulate our countrymen, in all future wars, to imitate the gallantry and heroism of the men who fought for the honor of the American flag on that night. There was not, I have already said, and I repeat it, anything in the history of the war to equal the daring and courage evinced by Reid and his men on that night.

There was a second attack by the British, and the Governor of Fayal gives a most extraordinary account of it. He says that, for the space of a quarter or half an hour, the American brig was a perfect sheet of flame. The British crowded up her painter, her stern, and every part where a vessel could be assailed. The American seamen stood by with their cutlasses, and cut off the hands and arms of the assailants as they climbed up the side of the brig, and those who reached the deck, reached it only to fall in a hand-to-hand struggle with our brave men. Both the attacks made that night were repulsed. Several hundred men were killed and wounded on the part of the British, and they drew off.

There is another fact in this case which ought not to be forgotten. There were over thirty American seamen in the port of Fayal at the time. When they found their countrymen were about to be attacked, and that the Portuguese batteries did not intend to defend them, they sent a deputation to the Governor, and begged that they might be permitted to go on board the American brig to assist in the defense of their countrymen. He refused to permit them to go. They stood on the shore during the fight. They were not allowed to participate in the struggle where the odds were ten to one against their countrymen. But in the spirit of true American sailors, they witnessed the whole battle, and whenever a British boat, wrecked in the struggle, reached the shore, they stood by, prepared with their hatchets and axes to cut it to pieces. The refusal of the Governor to allow them to go on board that night was an instance of enforcing the neutrality of the port. The neutrality was enforced against us, but not against the British. Not a gun was fired against them. Our countrymen were not permitted to go on board and assist the crew of the General Armstrong; but the British were permitted, without the slightest demonstration of force to repel them, to make the attack again and again.

The attack was renewed the next morning. At that time the brig Carnation was worked in near enough to bring her guns to bear against the privateer. A final desperate struggle was made by Reid and the men who were left on board not wounded to defend her still. After two or three discharges from their cannon, they shot away her main topmast, and disabled her so that she was compelled to retire. The struggle then appeared hopeless. A consultation was held, and it was determined, as there was no longer any possible chance of getting relief from the batteries under which they were lying, that they would scuttle their ship and go on shore. They put the long gun down in the hold, and then retreated to the shore. The British boarded the brig, and set her on fire.

Our men went upon the island, but they were persecuted there. Reid retreated with his men (for the British threatened to take them on the island) to a convent and fortified it, and defied the British in the convent with his sailors. Some of them, however, were captured, not by a bold, manly attack on them in the convent, but they were captured straggling about the island, and were carried to Dartmoor, and there they underwent great hardships, as we all know. I saw one of them who was shot through the neck cloth in the Dartmoor prison, after having been captured at Fayal.

Sir, as I said before, I do not base my vote in favor of this bill upon the ground that this Government has not the right to dispose of the claims of its citizens when they are intrusted to it; but I say that when the Government does undertake the charge of a claim like this, if it will refer the case to arbitration without the citizen's consent—and I very much doubt its power to do so—it is bound, at least, to give him an opportunity to be heard in his defense, or in defense of his claim. That was not furnished here.

Again, sir, without reference to any technicalities, I should hold that we could not better dispose of this amount of money in the Treasury than by paying this claim. It will teach our naval officers and sailors, in future wars, that they shall have the protection of neutral ports; that this Government will enforce it from neutral powers; or, if it fails to do that, will pay the damages itself. Sir, I need not quote the authorities which are cited in the report. Any gentleman who will look into the subject will find them amply sustained. It seems from them, though I have not investigated them with any degree of care, that this question has been decided in favor of the claim; but without any reference to what anybody else has decided, I must act on my own feelings of true State policy.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, I have, with some care, looked over the report in this case, and I have listened attentively to the speeches of the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Delaware in support of the claim; and I have come to the conclusion that there is not a single principle on which the Government is bound to pay this claim. The Senator from Delaware has entertained the Senate with high and well-deserved encomiums on the bravery displayed by the crew of the General Armstrong at Fayal. I think it is clear that the attack was made on them by the British. There appears, however, to be some doubt on that point, and I do not wish to pass on the fact. I have merely stated my own impression.

The English committed an aggression upon the neutral rights of Portugal, but it is upon an exceedingly doubtful principle that even Portugal is bound to pay at all for the damage. She has a right to demand reparation from the nation making the aggression. She had a right to make war for this violation of her sovereignty and rights. Portugal might have compelled England, who did this wrong, for she committed the attack, to do justice to these people. But when the neutrality of a weak Power is violated by a strong one, it is a very hard rule, and it is not consistent with natural justice, that she should pay at all. I know England has enforced such principles occasionally. But in this case Portugal did us no wrong at all. England, a powerful nation, violated her neutrality, attacked one of our vessels in her neutral port, and yet we called on Portugal to pay for it! I think it is a hard rule to make her pay for it in any event. But we have held her to the rule that she should go and compel England not only to make an apology, but to pay the damages, and that if she did not do it, she should pay them herself. We went to Portugal and demanded reparation. She could not get it from England. She refused our demand on two grounds, one was that she was not bound by the law of nations to pay us damages, and the other was that the American brig was the aggressor.

The American Government, from time to time, fairly and honorably prosecuted this claim in behalf of the claimants. We were injured by the action of the British, but when the treaty of peace took place with England, we demanded no satisfaction from her; we could not afford to do it. She had committed the outrage, and she was liable for the damages; but when we made a treaty of peace with her, we did not demand payment.

This Government, after pursuing the rights of these citizens for years, after forty years had passed away, referred the case to arbitration. That was a legitimate, just, and proper mode of deciding it. The arbitrator has decided the question against the claimants, and now we are called upon to pay them their claim. I do not wish to see the principle of settling national difficulties by arbitration, particularly in regard to money matters, discouraged. I would rather see it encouraged. As the Senator from Delaware admits, we were not bound to go to war with Portugal on account of the claim. He says we might demand it, and it was a just cause of war, but not a sufficient cause of war. A nation, owing to peculiar circumstances, may or may not enforce these private claims of citizens at the cannon's mouth. Generally, and, in fact, always, it is unwise, if the nation who has made the aggression is willing to refer it to fair arbitration. After pursuing the claim for forty years, as I have said, we referred it to the then President, and now Emperor, of France. He decided that the claimants were entitled to nothing from Portugal; and now they come to Congress and ask us to pay them, although this Government pressed the claim for forty years, although it threatened to withdraw our Minister at Portugal, and went to the very brink of war; for the Senator from Delaware very nearly came to that point when he was Secretary of State. A subsequent Administration agreed to refer it to a third Power, of eminent ability in Europe, which was a wise, a just, and proper course. Now, these people say it was done without their knowledge and consent. If they did not like it, they made no protest against the reference. They stood by. Again, they say they wished to be heard, but were not heard. These are mere pretenses; they are not reasons. We referred the case to an arbitrator, and he decided that the claimants were entitled to nothing. I hold that arbitration is a proper and just way for settling such difficulties among nations. The umpire decided against the claimants; and now they have the effrontery, for I can call it nothing else, to come here and say the American Government is liable. I want to know the principle on which we are liable. The Government has done its full duty, and has taken a legitimate and proper mode of enforcing the claim. It has been decided by the arbitrator that the claimants have no rights in the premises; and in the face of this decision they turn round and call upon the American Government to compensate them in damages. It is unjust. There is no principle of international law; there is no principle of national justice, which authorizes them to call on the Treasury of the United States for the payment of this claim.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, if the honorable Senator from Georgia were perfectly correct in all his facts, I should have nothing to say as to his inferences; but he discusses the case without reference to the facts. Is it true, does the testimony show that this Government did its whole duty in this case? Why, sir, the report shows that, for a period of twenty years, the case was utterly neglected, in despite of all the efforts of the claimants to call the attention of the Government to it. Was that performing the duty of the Government? Did the Government owe no better protection to its citizens than that?

Again, sir, the report and the testimony show the fact, not only that the matter was referred without the consent of the claimants, but that they never had an opportunity of presenting and enforcing their claim before the arbitrator; while, on the other hand, the agents of the Portuguese Government, and the British Government, were both active up to the last moment, when they procured the decision. Was that doing justice to the claimants? Have they, indeed, under these circumstances, no right to complain of their Government? I differ from the honorable Senator entirely on that point.

There is another point on which I differ from the honorable Senator. He says that we have made a treaty of peace with England; that she was answerable to us for the damage, and not Portugal; and that we turned from a strong and powerful nation to a weak one. Sir, England never was answerable for these damages. The damages committed by her were committed in open war against us. She was answerable to Portugal, but never answerable to us for one dollar of the claim. We had no right to look to her for its payment. There were no circumstances to justify us when making the treaty of Ghent, nor at any time after the treaty of Ghent, in asking England to pay one dollar for the loss of this privateer. We closed all accounts with her at the end of the war. We might as well have undertaken to claim damages for the loss of the frigate Chesapeake, or any other capture which the British made in the course of the war, or for taking any privateer, or any of our merchant ships. All these things were settled in the general treaty of peace, and we had no claim on England, nor had she any claim on us, for all those ships of hers that—thanks to the gallantry of our Navy—were destroyed during that war. No such thing as rights after the war exist for damages done during it. But, sir, we had a right to insist that the neutral Power of Portugal should perform its duties, and that that Government should pay us what it was bound to pay us for the loss of this vessel; and then it would have had a clear right to demand the amount from the British Government; and that demand, under the laws of nations, they would not have dared to resist.

Why, sir, the British paid them a part of the claim. In firing into the privateer they fired into the town, and did a great deal of damage. All that was actually paid for; but they determined to avoid the question of paying for this privateer. By paying for the damages done to the town they acknowledged that they were bound to pay Portugal for the privateer; but they urged Portugal—and they always had immense influence with her—not to pay for the vessel. They were engaged in exerting themselves in prevailing on Portugal, up to the last moment, not to pay us. If Portugal had been compelled to pay us, does any man doubt that England would have had to pay her? Certainly not.

Sir, it was always believed by those who understood this question best, that there was a perfect assurance on the part of the British Government that this claim should be paid to Portugal whenever Portugal should pay us. Indeed, it was believed by many at one time, that England had actually paid her part of the claim for this vessel, but how that was I never knew. Surely, there is nothing in the idea that we had a claim on England. No, sir, we enforced against England all that we ought to have enforced, and we made a final treaty of peace, which settled all disputes between her and us.

A word now in regard to the principle which the honorable Senator announces, that Portugal was a weak nation, and therefore we should not make a claim on her. If that is our rule, what will be the consequence? If we should ever have another war with Great Britain, she would treat us constantly as she did during the last war. Take, for instance, the case of the Essex, which ran into the harbor of Valparaiso, belonging to a weak nation. According to this idea, we shall obtain no damages for that or any other case of the same sort; and if any of our ships, in a future war, run into the harbors of a weak nation, and the world is full of weak nations, we can never enforce the neutrality of its ports.

Sir, although England would not have had to pay us out of her own pocket, if we had succeeded in making Portugal pay, the blow we aimed was at England, and we knew she would be compelled to pay Portugal; but if we are to pursue the principle, that, because a nation is weak, when our ships run into the ports of that nation, we will not hereafter enforce payment for the damages done us by the failure of that nation to enforce its neutrality, we shall have no protection at all against British cruisers in any future war. I am not disposed to press this case any further. I have submitted my views in regard to it. I am satisfied of its justice, and I shall cheerfully vote for the bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, I supposed that the Senator from Delaware was going to correct me on some point of fact, from the manner in which he commenced his remarks. It seems, however, to result in a mere difference of opinion between us, as to whether this Government has done its duty. It appears from the report on the table, which the Senator appears to have read carefully, for his speech is very much a recital of the facts stated in the report, that we attempted, immediately after the occurrence, to obtain compensation from Portugal. It is true the claim was not continuously pressed. There were various circumstances, which are disclosed in the report, why it was not continuously urged. The condition of the House of Braganza, the emigration to this continent of the royal family, and the internal troubles of Portugal, are some of the reasons given in the report, why the representatives of our Government did not persist in enforcing the claim at all times. It seems, in the end, that there was nothing to press. The result of the transaction has been that there was no claim.

The Senator lays down the principle of national law, I presume, much broader than he intends. I hold that it is one of the legitimate objects of war to get reparation for all the damages done to the private property, or public property of the nation forced to go to war. I take issue with the gentleman on that point. I say that this is one of the most uniform and best established laws of nations; which has been recognized from the foundation of the world. The party in the wrong is bound, according to natural justice and the laws of nations, to compensate for all damages done in the war. If the injured power is strong enough, it makes the other do this. It is a principle very well known. That is the object of war, as laid down by all the publicists; and this ought to be the only object, to make the party in the wrong pay the damages. Whenever you have a war with the Indians you make them do this. Why, sir, the other day we had a claim before the Senate, the foundation of which was the supposition that General Jackson, took a very unreasonable amount of the lands of certain Indians, as indemnity for the expenses of the war.

I deny that the Senator has laid down the sound principles of national law in the speech which he has made on this question. We ought to have made England pay the damages. She committed the wrong, and there was natural justice in compelling her to pay for it, and it was against natural justice to make Portugal pay. A wrong was done to Portugal, and to us, in the ports of Portugal. She had a right to make war with England for that cause; but I say there is no natural justice in making her pay damages for an act which was itself a violation of her rights, and from which she derived no benefit.

Suppose that, in the war raging between Russia on one side, and Turkey and her allies on the other, a Russian vessel should happen to be in one of our ports on the Chesapeake, where we have no naval armaments, and no vessels of war; suppose two or three vessels of the other side came into the same port, engaged in contest with the Russian ship, and destroyed it—I would not pay Russia for it. I am not bound to pay her for it. It is not natural justice. I have done her no wrong, but the nation at war with her has done me wrong, and has done her a wrong, and I might unite with her in obtaining justice from the other nation, if public considerations allowed it, but I would not pay Russia to-morrow in such a case. It would not be sound morality or sound international law, to require me to do it; and, therefore, I say Portugal ought not to have paid the claim in this case. She might have paid it, and might have demanded damages from England, but we had no right to go to war with her because of it.

I think, as I said before, that this Government did its whole duty towards these claimants. I wholly disapprove the mode in which the negotiation was carried on by the honorable Senator himself, as Secretary of State. He was carrying his notions of rights of war and national law to an extent which could not be maintained. The administration of Mr. Fillmore, in abandoning the ground which he assumed, and submitting the case to arbitration, did what was just and humane. We ought not to have gone to war for any such cause. Why, sir, at this very moment we have claims for injuries done to our citizens by the British Government, which are being settled by a commission in England; and we have provided for an umpire to settle differences which arise between the respective commissioners. I suppose that if we allow this claim, those of our people whose claims are decided against by that commission will come to the House of Representatives and the Senate, and get their claims paid here. I say that this Government must assert the claims and rights of its citizens in such a manner as to it seems most wise, just, and proper. We have a great many interests to look after, and we are not to go to war because some one imagines he has been cheated out of $10 or $10,000 by a foreign Government. We have a right to go to war for such a cause, but we are not bound to do it. In this case, we have gone on and submitted the claim to arbitration. This was a legitimate, just, and humane mode of settling it, and one which ought rather to be encouraged than discouraged; and, therefore, on that principle, I think this claim ought to be driven from the Congress of the United States. We referred the claim to an umpire, a man of ability, and he decided against it.

There is a paucity of facts in support of the claim. We are not told why the claimants did not go and argue the case. The Senator states what does not appear in the case, when he says the British and Portuguese were there arguing before the arbitrator. I find nothing of that sort substantiated by the report. The facts on which I have been arguing this case are in the report. I take what is there stated to be true. I say, from what there appears, that this Government has taken a legitimate and proper mode for adjusting the claim; and it has been decided that the claimants have no rights against Portugal, and could have had none. Of course, we might have made England pay; but, as the Senator properly states the rule of international law, the treaty of peace with England in 1815, closed up all grievances against her.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, the Senator has twice said that which is entirely destitute of foundation, when he has said that, under the negotiations which I was conducting for the recovery of damages for this vessel, we were going to war. There is nothing to justify that assertion in any part of the correspondence which I had, or which was had by General Taylor during his time, or by anybody under his authority. There is nothing of the kind. The only thing which he contemplated doing, was this: In the event of the refusal of Portugal to pay the claim, he intended to submit the whole facts for the consideration of Congress, with an assurance to the Portuguese Government that he would abide any decision which Congress should choose to make in regard to the matter. I know very well what is stated in the report; but I say there is nothing in the correspondence to show that there was a determination on the part of this Government to go to war without the consent of Congress. It was only intended that the Executive should transmit to Congress all the correspondence connected with the subject, and should abide the decision which Congress might make. We did it. So far as related to myself, I am proud to say I would not have hesitated at all to enforce this claim against Portugal, and compel her to pay it if we possibly could. It was a most outrageous piece of conduct on the part of Portugal. She always has been the ally of England. Her wishes and feelings have always been with England, and on that occasion she took sides with England in the controversy about this privateer. She enforced her neutrality against us, but she did not attempt to enforce it against Great Britain.

With regard to what the gentleman said as to England being responsible to us for all the damages of the war, I have nothing to say. He admits that when the treaty of peace was made, there was an end of all our claims upon England. It would have been a rare thing, indeed, if the negotiators at Ghent had sat down to make an estimate of the damages suffered on both sides, and of every ship and vessel captured in that war. They never thought of such a thing. We could have made no peace on such terms. Neither party contemplated making a peace on the basis of mutually compensating each other for all the damages that were done. It was agreed on both sides that we had done them about as much damage as they had done us; and then, on certain high principles long connected with the subject of peace and war, the treaty of peace was made and ratified.

I trust, sir, that the Senate will not lightly reject this claim. The effect of doing so, in my judgment, will be to say to our citizens hereafter, in all cases of this description, when they seek protection under the guns of a neutral port, and they fail to obtain it, "we will not demand and not enforce it; and ceasing to demand, or certainly to enforce, we will not pay the damages ourselves." These men owed obedience to the laws of their country, and were compelled to observe them. Their country owed to them protection in return. Their country has not given them the protection which it was bound to give.

The honorable Senator contends that the Government has done all it could. Why, sir, if you will look to the facts, you will find, as I said before, that, for a period of fully twenty years, nothing was done in regard to the claim. It was entirely overlooked, and why? Part of the time, it was said by one of our Secretaries, because of the embarrassing circumstances in which Portugal was then placed; this prevented our Government from enforcing the claim. The Government of Portugal was then distracted by internal dissensions, and we, therefore, did not press this demand. This Government was undoubtedly at liberty, on considerations of this kind, to assume this high ground; but it should do it at its own expense. You could afford to be magnanimous, but you ought not to be magnanimous at the expense of those citizens who had just claims.

Sir, I say again, that in my humble judgment the expenditure of this amount of money from the Treasury could not be better made for the interests of the country than by paying this claim. You need not pretend that this will set a precedent. You have never had such a case before; you will never have such a one again. You may have, in future wars, instances of gallantry and devotion to the country as great as we find here; you may have as much true American feeling manifested; you may have a vessel cut out under the guns of a neutral, or even a hostile fort; but you will not have such a case as this again presented to you. Here, after having referred the matter—with or without the consent of the parties, I care not—the Government furnished the claimants with no opportunity whatever to vindicate their claim. Whenever a case of that sort presents itself distinctly to the honorable Senator from Georgia, I trust he will concede that the Government is bound to pay it. In this case it appears to me the Government is bound to pay, because it has not done its duty, in not furnishing the individual with ample opportunity of obtaining remuneration. Mr. Reid says that he was not allowed to lay his grounds before the arbitrator; and it does not appear that our Minister at Paris was instructed to make any representations whatever upon the subject to Louis Napoleon. Nothing was done, I believe, but to send a Mr. Shattuck with the papers to France. I think that while the British and Portuguese Ministers were laboring with Louis Napoleon, we, if our own Minister did not labor the case with him, should at least have given notice to the claimants that they stood defenseless before the arbitrator. If they had appeared before the arbitrator, is it possible that he could have rested his decision on such a ridiculous pretext as it is rested upon in his report, that the Americans, and not the British, commenced the attack?

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I do not know that I very correctly apprehend the principle involved in this bill; but if I do, I think the arguments of my learned and distinguished friends from Louisiana and Delaware will present very anomalous results. The honorable Senator from Louisiana contends that this Government could neither treat, negotiate, nor arbitrate in reference to this claim without the assent of the claimants. The honorable Senator from Delaware contends that if our Minister should treat, without giving to the claimant an opportunity to present the facts upon which his claims are predicated, this Government becomes answerable. The result of either proposition is the same; it places in the hands of the claimant the power of making war, or imposes upon this Government the obligation to pay the claim. I think I can make this palpable to the common-sense view of every member of the Senate.

I concede, for the purpose of this argument, the law of nations to be, that a neutral nation is obliged to protect the vessels of a friendly belligerent within its port from the attacks of an enemy. That is the extent for which either of the honorable Senators has contended. Conceding that to be sound international law, it imposed upon Portugal, provided this attack was made without justifiable provocation on the part of our vessel within a neutral port of Portugal by the vessels of Great Britain, the obligation to pay. That is the argument of the Senators. Now, I concede, for the sake of the argument, these two principles. The obligation to pay, according to Senators' argument, would depend on the fact whether this attack was made with or without sufficient cause. If we made the first attack, as was contended by Portugal, then, undoubtedly, the British vessel had a right to resist, and, if the stronger, had a right to take our vessel, without any violation of the neutrality of Portugal, so far as we were concerned. That is clear.

Then, sir, we negotiated in reference to this claim. Failing to obtain a successful result by negotiation, we referred it to arbitration, and the referee has actually decided that the first attack was made by our people, and that consequently there was no offense against the principle of international law contended for by the honorable Senators. They had a right to make the attack; they had a right to take the vessel, according to the decision of the referee, because our people made the first attack upon the crews of the British boats.

Now, Mr. President, I ask the attention of my honorable friend from Louisiana, and also of my honorable friend from Delaware, to answer this proposition. Assume this to be the law. Then, although an arbitration has taken place, although the referee has decided that our people made the first attack, and that consequently there was no offense against the law of nations in the conduct of the British; although that has been the decision, they say we are answerable, because, according to the argument of one, the claimants did not consent to the arbitration; and, according to the argument of the other, because the Minister of the United States neglected his duty in not giving notice to the claimants, that they might bring forward their arguments.

Mr. SLIDELL. Will my honorable friend from Maryland permit me to explain?

Mr. PRATT. Certainly.

Mr. SLIDELL. I certainly did not advance any pretension so utterly untenable as that which my friend from Maryland has done me the honor to ascribe to me. I admit, unequivocally, that if that fact were conceded, if it were true beyond dispute that the first attack emanated from the crew of the General Armstrong, I should say that the claimants here presented themselves without any just claim. I would beg leave, however, to refer the Senator from Maryland to the fact which appears, perhaps, not in the report, but certainly does appear on the papers on file, and which I assert cannot be contradicted, that, in the first instance, the Government of Portugal expressly recognized that there had been a gross violation of the neutrality of the port of Fayal on the part of the British squadron, and remonstrated against it in the most earnest and indignant terms, and demanded satisfaction. After the lapse of many years, a change came over the spirit of their dream. They found they could obtain no satisfaction from England. Their relations with England, as the Senator well knows, were of the most amicable character. After the lapse of years, their game was entirely changed. They then, far from admitting that the attack proceeded from the British squadron, attempted to prove directly the reverse of what they had admitted on all previous occasions, and asserted that the attack had been made, in the first instance, by the crew of the General Armstrong.

If the case were unfounded, I should say that the claimants had sustained no damage by the decision of the Emperor of France in the merits of the case; but I assume this principle: that where a citizen does not assent to the reference of his claim to a third Power, and when that third Power decides his case upon the assumption of a false statement of facts, if I may use that expression; and when the party, not only never assented to such a reference, but never had an opportunity of being heard in support of the principles he advocated; then, I say, these facts being affirmatively proved, they take such a claim out of the ordinary principle that the citizen is bound by the act of his Government, and place the Government of the United States in the same position in which Portugal was before—responsible for this act, and bound to indemnify the sufferers.

Mr. PRATT. Mr. President, I understand the principle, as explained by my honorable friend, to be the same which I stated it to be before. This is a question of fact as to the liability of our Government. He says that if our Government treated without giving these parties notice, and without having the facts before them, they were answerable to the claimants; and he also says they would be answerable if they referred the case to arbitration without having the facts which the claimants could bring to the notice of the arbitrator, brought before him. The Senator states, and no doubt correctly, that the arbitrator has decided against the weight of the evidence. He says the arbitrator has rejected the claim against the weight of evidence. That may be so; but still the broad principle contended for is, that our Government, having made a reference, and having made that reference in good faith, because the decision of the arbitrator is against the claim, we are answerable for it! That, at last, is the broad proposition. We are not bound to go behind that arbitration for the purpose of inquiring into the facts. The question of obligation upon us cannot depend upon the existence of any state of facts whatever, provided we had the right to make the reference; because, if we had power to make the reference without the agreement of the claimant, the decision of the referee is binding on the claimant, and binding on us, and imposes no obligation on us to pay the claimant, if the decision was wrong.

I think the doctrine assumed by the Senator from Delaware is still more untenable. We have Ministers abroad intrusted by our Constitution with the conduct of negotiations between this Government and foreign nations; and he contends that this Government is unanswerable to all private claimants for the consequences, if one of our Ministers does not present such arguments as the claimant may think ought to be presented, or if he does not present such facts as the claimant could have produced if he had been notified. The doctrine of the honorable Senator is, that the neglect of the Minister so to act would impose on the Government an obligation to pay the private claimant, or go to war for it; and that if you do not get his claim paid, or do not go to war for it, you will be obliged to pay it yourselves. I cannot concede this.

Mr. SLIDELL. Will the Senator permit me to explain again?

Mr. PRATT. I have finished.

Mr. SLIDELL. The report expressly admits that the citizen has not a right to call on the Government of his country to pursue the extreme remedy for the enforcement of his rights. It may abstain from war. What is complained of in this case is, that the Government, when it had the faculty and the right of folding its arms and remaining idle, chose, without the knowledge or assent of the claimant, to submit the claim to arbitration.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Georgia has argued this question, and so have others, as if it were altogether a question whether the Government was bound to pay this claim, and, arriving at the result that the Government is not bound to pay it, they express, in emphatic language, their opinion that the claim ought to be driven out of Congress. Now, I am sure that almost the first lessons which those honorable Senators, like myself received in the history of the country, was the contemporaneous fact of the brilliant achievement of Captain Reid, in the command of the privateer General Armstrong during the last war. Remembering that, I think they will agree with me that the light in which we ought to view the question is rather this: not whether we are bound to pay this claim, but whether it is right to pay it. If they shall come to the conclusion that it is not right to pay it, even then, instead of driving it out of Congress, I hope they will dismiss it, if obliged to do so, with regret and sorrow. I certainly come to the question in that spirit.

I do not intend to go into a full review of all the facts. The report is very full, very express, and very ample; and the argument of the Senator from Louisiana, and of the Senator from Delaware, is entirely complete and sufficient on the whole case. I shall only dwell upon a single aspect or two of the facts.

It seems to be discussed as if this were a mere case of an ordinary private claim of a private citizen, who had had a vessel lying in the harbor of Fayal in a time of war, which the public enemy had assailed and destroyed. Then, upon that assumption of facts, that this is a mere private case of private property destroyed by a public enemy in a neutral harbor, it is argued that we have done all that we were obliged to do, and all that was just and necessary to do, when we prosecuted that claim against the neutral Power. Sir, this was a privateer, an armed vessel, a belligerent vessel, called into service as a part of the naval power of the country, to prosecute the war in which we were engaged against England. She necessarily provoked the very hostilities by which she suffered, which hostilities she would have escaped if she had been the ordinary property of a private citizen, and not a belligerent vessel.

Now, then, when a private citizen, at the invitation of his country, embarks his property in a public war, I think that citizen has a right to expect that the Government of the United States will insist, for his protection, upon the observance of the laws of nations by neutral Powers. If she, by her belligerent demonstrations, exposes herself to attack in the port of a neutral Power, he has a right to expect that the Government will enforce protection so far as it is due by the law of nations.

If this vessel had been a public vessel, the Government of the United States would have had no question about it, but could have released the neutral Power from any claim for damages which were sustained. But this is private property, and private property which the Government procured to be used for its own safety. I think, then, it was bound to exercise peculiar diligence in the prosecution of this claim. I think that the moment the nation failed to compel respect, by a neutral Power, to the laws of nations, and so to enforce the protection which was due to this vessel, from that time this privateer became entitled to relief from the Government of the United States directly. The Government has neglected, and has refused to grant this relief. It has contented itself with referring the question to arbitration. An award has been obtained against these citizens. The question is now asked, whether that is not a discharge of the obligation of the Government to them. I answer that it is, if the award is just and right upon the merits of the case; but if it is not, then the claim of the citizens upon this Government remains, because it is a claim which was good and perfect, in the first instance, against the Government. The Government sought for its indemnity by reclamation upon Portugal. It had a right, and I think it would have been just, to make good the damage to those of its citizens before seeking reparation from Portugal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to ask the Senator from New York a question. Suppose this Government had gone to war with Portugal to obtain redress, and for want of power had failed to get it, would it then have been bound, would it have been under any obligation of morality or justice to pay the claim? If not, why should it be so after having submitted to arbitration?

Mr. SEWARD. It would depend altogether upon the ability of the Government in that case. The Government having resorted to war for arbitration, does not change the nature of the case at all. It was bound to pay, if it was able. If it was not able to pay, these individuals must suffer, in common with all the other individuals who suffer by war; but if the Government was able to pay, it was bound to pay in the first instance, and its resort to war or arbitration does not affect the case.

The Government now pleads the award; but the award is founded upon a state of facts which the Government itself admits is false. If, then, the award is founded upon a false state of facts, it is unjust, and the Government cannot be thereby discharged from its obligations. It is true, the argument is enforced very strongly by the consideration that the Government, without the consent of the parties, undertook to refer to a foreign Power the question whether it would pay the claim. In doing so, it chose a Power which was not to be addressed by the citizen, and before whom it failed to present the claim, but left the decision to be made in error, either from gross mistake or partiality on the part of the arbitrator. It strikes me, therefore, that there are abundant reasons why we can rightfully pay this claim. That is all I contend for, and that is enough for me.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, my sympathies lead me to vote for this claim, and I am not sure that I shall not be compelled to do so. There is but one ground, however, on which I suppose the claim can be sustained, and that is a question on which my mind has not been brought to bear at all, and, therefore, I do not yet feel certain as to the result at which I ought to arrive.

I have no doubt that the Government of the United States, acting on behalf of a citizen, and in order to prosecute a claim against a foreign Power, has a right to enter into a reference, if it see fit so to do, with or without the consent of that citizen. When they represent him, everything must be left to their discretion. The doubt which arises in my mind as to the non-liability of the United States is this: The claim was referred to a foreign Government, and the decision was against the claimants; but in making that reference, the United States entered into no stipulation whatever that the citizens or the Government of the United States should not be heard before the arbitrator. It would have been contrary to the first principles of justice if they had entered into any such stipulation as that the arbitrator should take the case, and decide it without any hearing whatever, either on the part of the Government of the United States or the individual claimants.

I have looked at the words of the treaty by which the arbitration was agreed to be made, and I find nothing to restrict the right of the party to be heard, if his Government chose to adduce further proof or further argument. The claimant in this case, after this treaty had been ratified by the Senate, applied to the Secretary of State in order to have a written argument in support of his claim go before the arbitrator—before the Government selected to make the decision as to the liability of Portugal.

Of the liability of Portugal on the facts stated by the committee, I can entertain no doubt. Of the error of the decision of the Emperor of France, I have no doubt. The only question in my mind as to the liability of the Government, is, whether the act of the Government of the United States, in refusing either to let the party, who wished to be heard, have a hearing through his own written argument before the arbitrator, or in neglecting themselves to instruct their own Minister to make proper representations before the arbitrator so that the case might be fully heard, and not be decided either on a careless or an ex parte examination, does not amount to such gross negligence on the part of the Government, after having chosen to enter into this arbitration, that we have a right to look behind the award, and if we are satisfied the award was wrong, then to say that we ought to make the claim good.

I am not disposed to push too far the principle of the liability of the Government on account of such negligence; but the refusal of the then Secretary of State, distinguished as he was and able as he was, under the terms of that treaty, either to forward the written argument of the party to the arbitrator who was to decide on his rights, and on his rights alone, or to instruct our Minister to attend to the matter, seems to me to be extraordinary. Recollect, this was a peculiar case; it was not the case of the Government referring a class of general claims to an arbitrator. They settled everything else, and referred the individual case of the brig General Armstrong to the then President, and subsequent Emperor of France. They referred this case by itself. There was, then, peculiar propriety in asking that the party, who alone stood interested in the decision, should be heard. Under these circumstances, he applied to our Secretary of State, the proper person, and he submitted to him his written argument, and the Secretary of State declined to let that argument go before the arbitrator, on the ground that the treaty prevented it. I can find no such provision in the treaty. On the contrary, the treaty requires all the previous correspondence between the two Governments to be laid before the arbitrator. There is no exclusion of the right of hearing; and I cannot conceive it possible that the Senate of the United States, in such a case, acting on behalf of a citizen, on a proposition relating to his single claim alone, would refer the decision of that claim to a foreign Power, and provide in the convention that he should not be heard in support of his rights.

There is no such provision in the treaty; and, therefore, I think there was a plain mistake in law, a gross mistake in law, on the part of the Secretary of State of the United States when he refused either to instruct the Minister of the United States to appear and urge the claim before the arbitrator, and vindicate the right of his own fellow-citizen, or, in lieu of that, to suffer the argument which that citizen had drawn up in support of his claim, to go before the arbitrator. Under these circumstances it does look to me like a case of gross negligence on the part of the Government of the United States, in prosecuting the right of a citizen after it had referred it to arbitration. For this reason, and as I have strong sympathies with the claim otherwise, and as there is a great deal more than this to commend it to allowance; and as I believe, beyond all question, that this is a case in which, owing to that neglect, the party has lost his claim, I believe I shall vote for the bill. I entertain no shadow of doubt as to the liability of Portugal; and hence I say, that but for the negligence of this Government, the decision might have been different.

It has been said here that Portugal was a weak nation, and that, therefore, she ought not to have been held responsible. I hold the doctrine that if a nation is strong enough to exist as a nation, and to claim the rights of a nation, she is bound by the obligations of a nation. She is bound to protect the neutrality of her own ports, and if she cannot protect them she is bound to pay the damages which are incident to her own want of ability to do so. And there can be no other doctrine under the laws of nations. I hold, therefore, that Portugal was unquestionably liable. This has never been doubted in any of the correspondence on any pretext whatever, except on the ground alleged by Portugal, for the first time in 1843, that the American vessel had herself, by her own conduct, been the cause of the attack of the British.

This assumption is against the whole facts of the case. It is against the admission of Portugal and the conduct of Great Britain at the time when the transaction took place, and subsequently to that time. The claim was then undoubtedly admitted as a matter of right; and at the time of the transaction no pretense was set up by Portugal that the American vessel was the aggressor. On the contrary, a demand was made by Portugal on Great Britain, never on this country, on the ground that Great Britain had violated the neutrality of Portugal, and, therefore, was responsible to her; and as far as Portuguese interests went, Great Britain admitted that it was so. The path for Portugal to pursue would have been plain if this assumption were correct. If the American vessel had been the aggressor, Portugal would have come here and said, "the Government of the United States caused this aggression; the Government of the United States by the act of one of their private armed vessels caused all the difficulties which arose here by making an attack on the boats of the British squadron, and, therefore, we look to you for reparation." Instead of doing anything of this sort, Great Britain admitted her liability to Portugal, so far as regarded Portuguese interests; and I say the admission of that liability is absolutely inconsistent with anything else than the fact that the British boats were the aggressors upon the American cruiser.

I have a strong and absolute conviction that the decision of the President of France was wrong, and perhaps under all the circumstances, you could hardly have expected anything else from him; but I think there was also a neglect of duty on our part—not merely a slight neglect, but a gross neglect of duty. We violated the first principles of justice when we suffered the case to be decided by a foreign Power without a hearing and without a representation on the part of the claimant, who alone was interested in it, when he had preferred to us his argument in support of his claim. On that ground, and on that ground alone, (and still not with positive certainty that it amounts to sufficient negligence to make the Government liable,) but with a strong inclination of opinion that way, I shall be compelled to vote for this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. I rise now only for the purpose of bringing one fact connected with this matter to the attention of the Senate. It appears that there was a controversy between the friends of Admiral Lloyd and Admiral Cochrane in relation to this very transaction. A gross charge was made against Lloyd, who commanded the British squadron off Fayal, of malfeasance, improper conduct, and a gross violation of his duty in delaying the advance of his squadron to the aid of the Jamaica fleet, which was about to take New Orleans. In the progress of the controversy, a fact, which I will mention, appeared as a justification of Lloyd. It was said on one side that the game was not worth the candle; that he lost several hundred men, and crippled the expedition so that finally the attack on New Orleans failed. It was said that this was a thing for which Lloyd ought to be answerable. In his defense, it was stated that the object of attacking the privateer General Armstrong was, to capture her without destroying or crippling her, in order that she might be used, in consequence of her light draft of water, in the Mississippi, for purposes for which the other vessels they had would not answer. That was the reason why this vessel was attacked in the way she was. An attempt was made to carry her by boarding. They knew she had ninety men, or less than a hundred, and only seven guns, and they supposed they could capture her in a few minutes. They failed; and there was nothing in the annals of naval warfare, ancient or modern, to exceed the glory of this transaction. Sir, I do hope that the Senate of the United States will reflect upon the consequences which will flow from the payment of this small sum out of the Treasury, and its effect on the men who shall hereafter fight the battles of the country.

Mr. CHASE. Mr. President, the argument submitted by the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD,] if it were valid, would subject the Government to responsibility in all cases in which the Secretary of State of the United States should form a wrong opinion upon a treaty stipulation between this and a foreign Government, and in consequence of it a loss should be sustained by a private citizen. That is the principle of his argument. It seems to me that it would be going very much too far to sanction a principle which would be fruitful of such consequences. On a cursory examination of the report and the clause of the treaty, it would seem to me that the submission of this claim to the arbitrator, was in the nature of a submission, or an appeal to a superior court, that the whole case might be reexamined, but not on new arguments or new testimony; so that, in my judgment, the late Secretary of State, Mr. Webster, to whose opinions upon the construction of treaties, and upon all legal questions, every member of the Senate will be disposed to bow with very great deference, was not erroneous in the opinion which he gave.

Upon the other points in this case, the argument of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. PRATT] seems to me to be entirely unanswerable. There are three modes in which satisfaction for private claims can be obtained from a foreign Government. One of those modes is by negotiation and treaty, resulting in satisfaction or a compromise; another of those modes is also by arbitration; and the third is by war. Now, sir, if we cannot arbitrate without the consent of the claimant, we cannot compromise; we can make no adjustment that does not secure to the claimant everything that he claims, and the whole extent of the indemnity which he requires. If we cannot compromise, and cannot arbitrate without the consent of the claimant, then it irresistibly follows, as was shown by the Senator from Maryland, that the private claimant has in his hands, in every such case, the question of peace and war between this and foreign nations, or an abandonment of his claim. We are driven to that necessarily. In every case we must either abandon the claim, or else we must resort to war in its enforcement, at the will of the claimant himself.

Sir, it is by no means clear that these doctrines would not involve a still further consequence. If we cannot resort to arbitration without the consent of the claimant—if we cannot resort to the mode of compromise without the consent of the claimant—how can we resort to the great last remedy without his consent? and if we cannot do that, the result will be that, in the event of our actually going to war in defense of his claim, and concluding a treaty without reference to it, this Government would still be responsible. It is only sufficient to state these propositions to see the consequences to which they lead, and to secure, I trust, the judgment of the Senate against them.

The Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] seemed to feel the weakness of all arguments drawn from law and usage, in defense of this claim, and he placed it upon the simple ground of some general equity—that this vessel was a privateer, a part of the naval force of the country; that she had sustained injuries as part of the naval service, and that we were therefore bound to indemnify her owners. That may be an appeal to patriotic feeling; but if we acknowledge such appeals, there is no limit to the demands which they would create on the Treasury. I do not feel disposed to detain the Senate on this question; but as it is one of very considerable importance, I ask for the yeas and nays upon the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Ohio and myself agree as to the points in this case, except in one respect. We differ in opinion as to the plain intent of the third article of the convention between Portugal and the United States, by which this claim was submitted to the arbitration of the late President, now Emperor of France. I admit he has the authority—and very high authority it is—of Mr. Webster in support of his construction. I can only account for what I consider the palpable mistake in the construction of that article, made by the Secretary of State, because of the multiplicity of the transactions to which his mind was drawn, and the probable fact that this being a case relating simply to the affairs of a private individual, did not receive from him that consideration which he would otherwise have given it. I will read the language of the article:

"So soon as the consent of the sovereign potentate, or chief of some friendly nation, who shall be chosen by the two high contracting parties, shall be obtained, to act as arbitrator in the aforesaid case of the privateer brig General Armstrong, copies of all correspondence which has passed, in reference to the said claim, between the two Governments and their respective representatives, shall be laid before the arbitrator, to whose decision the two high contracting parties hereby bind themselves to submit."

I cannot understand that this is more than a stipulation that the correspondence between the two Governments shall be produced. I cannot sanction the idea that, in defiance of what is the only principle of justice for all purposes, whether between nations or individuals, that the party has a right to be heard before a decision is made against him, this article excludes his right to be heard, or even the right to adduce testimony beyond this correspondence. When an argument in support of the claim was presented by the sole party in interest to the agent of his own Government, a refusal to present it to the arbitrator was given, on the ground of the treaty not allowing it. In this case, if we examine the facts, we find that the decision is manifestly—I had almost said atrociously—wrong on the part of the arbitrating Power. In view of all the circumstances, I must impute that erroneous decision to the neglect on the part of the Government in letting the case be properly presented before the arbitrator.

I hold to the responsibility of the Government, therefore, but not on the ground imputed to me by the honorable Senator from Ohio, that in every case of slight mistake, of difference of opinion as to whether one course or another, or one argument or another would have been more advisable in sustaining the claim of an American citizen on a foreign Government: not on any ground like that do I place the liability of our Government in this case; but on the ground that there was here—and every lawyer understands the term—a plain mistake in law, a gross mistake in law. In consequence of this mistake, the great principle of justice, that every party shall be heard, was refused in this case, when the claimant's rights alone were under arbitrament. It is on that ground of gross mistake in law, which deprived him of the highest right of man, to which he should be always entitled in transactions of this kind, that my opinion in favor of this claim is founded.

Mr. BELL. Mr. President, I am strongly inclined to vote for this bill; and I rise for the purpose of throwing out a few suggestions in support of my views. I believe the argument in opposition to the bill, on the ground of obligation, is sound; except, perhaps, the exception taken by the honorable Senator from Delaware, who spoke last, [Mr. BAYARD,] in regard to the omission or neglect of the Government in not permitting the parties to be heard, or in not providing that they should be heard before the arbitrator. I am not sure that some neglect may not be fairly attributed to the Government on that ground; but that is not the principle on which I base my support of this claim.

I think the argument against the obligation of the Government to pay the claim is complete and sound; but this case is one of peculiar features, and it seems to me, in some other respects, it has peculiar grounds for allowance on the part of the Government. I do not mean to go into any argument as to the system of privateering; but I will merely suggest, that in the case of any contingency likely to arise early in this Government with powerful maritime nations, such as France or England, or both united, I am not certain that it would be good policy in us to abandon this right arm of our defense; at least for many years after we shall engage in a war, if such an event shall unfortunately happen.

Well, sir, there is not a pretense that the resistance offered by the brave commander of this privateer and his gallant seamen at the port of Fayal, was made upon any mercenary motive whatever. They could scarcely have any hope of ultimate success. What could have animated them, under the circumstances, but the sense of pride, and chivalry, and bravery, which should always actuate the commander and seamen of an American private or public armed ship? According to the law of nations, they had a right to carry on private war, but they were also placed in such circumstances as required of them to exhibit that degree of gallantry and chivalry which would show that the United States of America could contend successfully against the extraordinary superiority of the British power, especially on the ocean.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. CLAYTON] has thrown out some suggestions in regard to the possible accretion of force which was intended to be acquired for the attack in New Orleans, by the violation of neutral rights in this transaction. I leave that entirely out of view, and I look to the extraordinary gallantry and daring that these men displayed, without hope on their part of making any prize, and in a contest the inevitable result of which they must have known, particularly when they found they would not be protected by the guns of the neutral Power in whose port they were anchored. It is an exhibition which I regard as extraordinary, if the facts stated in the report be true, and I believe they have not been denied.

Mr. CLAYTON. No one ever doubted them.

Mr. BELL. Sir, it cannot often happen that neutral rights will be invaded in the daring manner in which they were invaded on this occasion; but they are liable, it is true, to be so invaded whenever an inferior maritime Power is engaged in war with a domineering, arbitrary Power, such as Great Britain, who feels the consciousness of her superiority on the sea. Sir, I look at the spirit, the noble gallantry and daring displayed on this occasion, to the total exclusion of any idea of mercenary results; for there could have been no expectation of making a prize of an enemy's ship, either a war vessel or a merchantman. Our men stood upon their own defense, and exhibited a daring and bravery seldom equaled in the course of that, or any war, which ever took place. Then I say this is not likely to be a precedent. I am not disposed to put the case on the ground of obligation; but as this is not likely to be drawn into a precedent, and as it is not likely that it will lead to any drafts on the Treasury of the United States, I am inclined to vote for the bill.

Then, Mr. President, I want to know—although there is no strict obligation on the part of this Government to vote this appropriation under the circumstances—may we not consistently and properly do it? Why, sir, on what principle do we grant numerous pensions and bounties? Hundreds of thousands of acres of the public lands have been granted in bounties to men who never heard an enemy's gun. Take the late war with Mexico. To troops who were merely mustered into the service, or accepted—volunteers, and others—we have granted bounties. They performed no service; but, merely because they were accepted into the service of the United States, we made the grant. On what principle have you granted bounty lands or pay to them? There was no obligation, for they did not serve; they were only prepared to serve. What is the difference in principle between that case and this? Here is the same principle; and here is an extraordinary and noble example and exhibition of gallantry under peculiar circumstances; and when you know you have voted to volunteers hundreds of thousands of dollars, or what is equivalent to them, bounties in land, and that for a war in which a large portion of those volunteers did no service—on that principle, as the Senator from Delaware has said, on a principle of State policy, as an encouragement to gallant conduct, as a gratuity, as a bounty to stand upon the records of the Government of the United States, given under such circumstances, how can you refuse this? That is the query I make.

I concede the correctness of the argument of gentlemen against the bill on the ground of obligation; but I consider that we are under just as much obligation to pass it as we were to grant gratuities of hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property, as has recently been done without any opposition being made to it. It cannot be drawn into a precedent. It can form no great draft on the Treasury; and I think, under the circumstances, it will be an acknowledgment of the estimation in which the Government and the country hold meritorious and gallant services. It is in the exercise of the war power to encourage the spirit of gallantry, chivalry, and devotion to the honor, and character, and interests of the country, in our troops and soldiers, and in our seamen and marines, in time of war. I know honorable gentlemen cannot justify the extraordinary pension system which we have reared up in this country without any previous obligation, except on that principle for which I contend. On an occasion of this kind, when it is not likely to be drawn into a precedent, or form any great draft on the Treasury at any time, why may you not, in the same spirit, in the exercise of the same privilege, under the grant of the war power in the Constitution, vote in favor of this claim? That is my inclination, feeling, and sympathy, without disputing at all the correctness of the argument of the Senators who have said that we are under no strict obligation to pay it.

Mr. MALLORY. The honorable Senator from Tennessee has alluded to the encouragement which the payment of this claim will give to the gallantry and bravery of the seamen. I ask him, for information simply, whether the seamen who fought the battle on board the General Armstrong will receive any money under this bill?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELL. I do not know anything about it. I have read the report of the state of the case merely.

Mr. SLIDELL. It is for the officers and crew.

Mr. MALLORY. Are they mentioned?

Mr. SLIDELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLAY. I understand there is a letter of the Secretary of State, Mr. Marcy, on file, on this subject. I should like to hear it read, and I should like to ask a question for information; for I do not rise to make a speech. I want information to direct my vote. According to the remarks of the honorable Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD] all the advocates of the bill, if he presented correctly the positions assumed by them, concede that there is no obligation on the part of the Government to pay the claim. He said that it was admitted, as I understood him, that the Government was not bound to pay it, but that it was right to do so? I should like him to explain to me what that means; for I confess I do not comprehend its force. I have always supposed that right and obligation were reciprocal; and if the party had a right to make this claim, the Government was bound to pay it. But the Senator has refined in ethics or law beyond my comprehension, by saying that we were not bound to pay it, but it was right to do so.

Mr. SEWARD. I think I can satisfy my honorable friend. There was once a trial before a court in Ohio, when it was a new State. The plaintiff made out his case, which was a claim for a considerable amount of money. After the plaintiff's proof had been given in, the judge said to the defendant's counsel: "This seems to be all right; shall we order a verdict?" "No, if your honor pleases; I have a defense to make." "Oh! you have a defense; what is it? Let us hear it." "Well," said the counsel, "if your honor pleases, our defense is, that the defendant was a minor when this account was rendered." "That is your defense, is it?" said the judge, "that the defendant was a minor—an infant?" "Yes, and I believe," said the counsel, "that that is a good defense in this court, is it not?" "Oh, yes," said the judge; "I think it is a good defense; but I must say, at the same time, that it is a very mean one." [Laughter.] So, if the honorable Senator had my note, which was given six years ago, I might plead the statute of limitations. Then I would not be bound to pay it; but still I should have a right to do so, and it would be right for me to do it. And so I think with regard to this. Whatever it is right for a man to do, he should do, whether he is legally bound to do the right or not.

There is a moral right and a moral obligation resting on the Government to pay, at least to the amount of indemnification, for extraordinary services performed, and extraordinary losses incurred, in the defense of the country, at extraordinary risks, and with extraordinary sacrifices. I know no other reason upon which I could ever have voted for the bounty land bills, for which I have voted, to give extra compensation to all the soldiers of the last war with Great Britain, to all the soldiers of the Mexican war, and to all the soldiers of all former wars. I was under no legal obligation, Congress was under no obligation to do it; but I had a right to do that which was equitably and morally just. Now, I do not know any reason why we should pension officers and soldiers of the Army over and above paying them in full of their compensation, and give them bounty lands besides; and when a privateer, consisting of officers and crew, as brave and true, and patriotic as any others, come here and represent to us that they were ruined in the most gallant naval exploit of the whole war, say that we are under no obligation to pay them for the losses they sustained.

Mr. CLAY. I now understand what the honorable Senator meant; and I discover, as I supposed from the beginning, that my embarrassment resulted from a misapplication of words. He meant to say, as I suppose, that the party had not a legal right—that is, a right existing by virtue of public law, or by treaty, or by constitutional law—but a moral right; and that there was a moral obligation on the part of the Government to pay, but no legal obligation, in the common acceptance of the word "legal." I wish to know if that is the position assumed by the other advocates of this bill?

Mr. SLIDELL. Most assuredly not. If my friend from Alabama had read the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, (which, I now repeat, was a unanimous report, made after very full investigation of the subject, and very mature reflection upon it, and after various consultations,) he would have seen that they considered that on grounds of right—I am not speaking of any appeal to the generosity of Congress—there was a legal obligation existing on the part of the United States to compensate these men for the losses they sustained by the destruction of the privateer General Armstrong. In addition to that, the Senator from New York, with great force, and with great truth, has urged grounds appealing to our equitable considerations.

Gentlemen may very well vote for the bill on either principle. I can vote for it on both. I think it is one of the most meritorious claims that ever has presented itself to Congress. I think it appeals more strongly to the chivalry of the nation, to the generosity of Congress, than almost any other I have ever heard made. But putting that aside entirely, I can vote for it on purely legal grounds. I think the course of conduct of the Government of the United States has been such as to substitute itself for the Government of Portugal, to place it in exactly the same position towards the claimants of the brig General Armstrong which the Government of Portugal was in before the rendition of the arbitral decision by the Emperor of France; and it is fully bound to pay the whole amount of the loss sustained by the claimants.

Having lost their recourse to the Government of Portugal by what I conceive to be, if not the illegal, at least the very injudicious act of the Government of the United States, I think they appeal now to Congress on legal grounds which, to my mind, are impregnable. I regret that I cannot convey the same conviction to the minds of honorable Senators. I can vote for the bill on both grounds mentioned. Stripped of all legal grounds, I could vote for it on the ground of a compensation for the gallant men who served their country.

Mr. SEWARD. I ought, perhaps, to explain to the honorable Senator that I forbore entering into the other views of the case because they were entered into fully by other honorable gentlemen. I stated that there were other views which presented themselves to my consideration; but I agreed with those gentlemen in the grounds they took.

Mr. CLAY. Now, I should like to have the letter of Mr. Marcy on this subject read. I understand it is here.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, }
WASHINGTON, February 11, 1854.

Sir: Your letter of the 7th instant, requesting that the Committee on Foreign Relations may be furnished with any evidence on file in this Department going to show that the case of the General Armstrong was referred to the arbitration of the President of the French Republic, either against or without the consent of the claimants, together with any suggestion which I may think proper to make in relation to the justice of the claim, or the propriety of its being allowed, has been received.

From an examination of the files of the Department, it appears that, pending the negotiations which terminated in the convention with Portugal of 1851, two letters were addressed to the Secretary of State on the subject of the reference of the Armstrong claim to the arbitration of a third Power, one dated August 26, 1850, by S. C. Reid, "late commander of the privateer General Armstrong," and the other dated September 5, 1850, by S. C. Reid, Jr., "sole and only authorized agent of the claimants" in the case. Copies of these letters, and of the replies thereto, are herewith inclosed.

There are several other letters from the last-named gentleman, on the same subject, and of subsequent dates, among the files of the Department, from which it would appear that the claimants in the case had acquiesced in the decision of their Government to agree to refer their claim to arbitration. If a different opinion was entertained by them, it is, at least, certain that their authorized agent did not, in any letters to this Department, protest against that decision, or intimate doubts as to its propriety or expediency.

Regarding the claim above alluded to as definitely settled, so far as this Department is concerned, by the decision of the arbitrator to whom, by mutual agreement of the contracting parties to the convention of 1851, it was referred, I conceive that I cannot, without neglecting very important and pressing business, devote sufficient time to the case to enable me to understand all the facts in regard to it.

I cannot countenance the principle, that where this Government is called on by a citizen of the United States to interpose for the purpose of recovering claims against any other Government, proceeds in good faith for that purpose, and fails in its object, or obtains what may be regarded as an inadequate indemnity, it places itself in a situation to be called on to pay the claims, or to satisfy the expectations of claimants. Our Government is not an agent in such cases; and unless it acts against the expressed or known wishes of those who have invoked its interposition, it does not, as I conceive, incur any liability whatever to the claimants.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
W. L. MARCY.

HON. J. M. MASON, Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, United States Senate.

Mr. CLAYTON. I wish merely to make one remark in regard to that. This acquiescence, as it is termed—that is to say, the not remonstrating—occurred after the treaty was made. After the reference, the matter had been settled and decided by the Government, and it was not within the power of the claimants to resist any longer. The arbitration was made without their consent. After the Senate of the United States had ratified the treaty, and the arbitrator had been appointed, they addressed the Department; and what they said in the address then I suppose must constitute the "acquiescence" from which the inference is drawn that they accepted it. No such conclusion, I think, can be drawn.

The question being taken by yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, resulted—yeas 12, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Atchison, Bayard, Bell, Brown, Clayton, Dodge of Iowa, Foot, Gwin, James, Pettit, Seward, and Slidell—12.

NAYS.—Messrs. Allen, Chase, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge of Wisconsin, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Gillette, Hamlin, Pratt, Rockwell, Stuart, Sumner, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Toucey, Wade, Walker, and Williams—21.

So the bill was rejected.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

ENROLLED BILLS.

A message having been heretofore received from the House of Representatives, announcing that the Speaker had signed a joint resolution giving the consent of Congress to the acceptance, by Lieutenant M. F. Maury, of the Navy, of a gold medal from his Majesty the King of Sweden; also, a bill to authorize the issue of registers to vessels owned by the Accessory Transit Company, they were signed by the President pro tempore.

DAVID MYERLE.

Mr. GWIN. A bill passed the Senate some weeks ago for the relief of David Myerle, and was sent to the House, but on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. BRIGHT,] we requested its return to us, and a motion is now pending to reconsider the vote by which it was passed. I hope that motion will be considered, and the bill finally acted upon now. This is probably the last day this session on which we shall act on private bills. I therefore hope it will be taken up and voted on.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from California will see that the Senator from Indiana, who made the motion to reconsider, is not present.

Mr. GWIN. He made it at the request of another Senator. He does not wish to participate in the discussion.

Mr. STUART. That is a very different statement from what the Senator gave me. He stated to me that he moved the reconsideration with a view to oppose the bill.

Mr. GWIN. He voted for the bill, and moved the reconsideration.

Mr. STUART. I know he did.

Mr. GWIN. Some years ago, he made one of the best speeches in favor of the claim that I ever heard; and I do not think he is a gentleman who generally speaks on both sides. I wish to have the question decided. I wish to have the bill sent to the House at this session. My colleague upon the Committee on Naval Affairs, who reported the bill, [Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey,] who is now absent, requested me to call it up, and have it acted upon. I have not a word to say upon it. It is well known to the Senate.

Mr. STUART. I really hope the Senator from California will not press his motion in the absence of the Senator from Indiana. I am certain, from a conversation I had with him, that he desires to say something concerning the bill.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Indiana is not absent from the building. I will send to his committee room for him. I move that the motion to reconsider be taken up.

Mr. STUART. Then I shall have to move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GWIN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon that motion. Here is a question that has been discussed time and again in the Senate. Reject the bill or pass it; it is not material with me which. I hope the yeas and nays will be given on the adjournment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GWIN. I call for a division then.

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative by a vote, on a division, of yeas 23, nays 11.

And the Senate adjourned to Monday.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 23, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. HENDRICKS. After the consideration of the private bills upon the Speaker's table, I intend to move to go into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. This is objection day, and the only private bill day upon which we can do anything to advantage.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to inquire of the Chair if to-morrow is not objection day, and if we cannot postpone the consideration of private bills till then?

The SPEAKER. The rules recognize Fridays only as objection days.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am exceedingly anxious to get through with the civil and diplomatic bill this week. It being objection day, I shall not object to the consideration of private bills, but shall try and get a meeting of the House to-morrow, so that we may finish the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that gentlemen having private bills may report them for the purpose of reference, and if reached to-day, considered in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HENDRICKS] proposes that reports of private bills, such as will give rise to no debate, be received now.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it intended to put the bills so reported upon their passage to-day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair remarked that such bills only as gave rise to no debate would be received.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would say to the gentleman from Virginia that this is objection day, and we cannot consider bills to which objection is made.

BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were then taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time by their title, and referred as indicated below:

An act for the relief of the heirs of Captain Joshua Chamberlain, deceased. Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

An act to authorize the issue of a register to the bark Amelia, by the name of Abby Frances. Referred to the Committee on Commerce.

An act for the relief of Urban Stoll. Referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

An act for the relief of James Dixon. Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. HENN. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution in reference to the establishment of some post routes in the State of Iowa.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be requested to inquire into the expediency of establishing the following post roads in the State of Iowa:

From Dubuque, via Fort Dodge, to Sargent's Bluffs;
From Adell, via Panora and the county seats of Audubon and Shelby counties, to Magnolia;
From Quincy to Clarinda;
From Lewis to Clarinda;
From Booneboro, via Homer, to Fort Dodge;
From Booneboro to Adell;
From Fort Des Moines to Marietta;
From Quincy to Adair.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object.

On motion by Mr. PHELPS, it was Ordered, That the pension certificate in the case of Thomas Bronaugh, on application for increase of pension, be withdrawn from the files of the House, for the purpose of being returned to the petitioner.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would inquire if all the bills on the Speaker's table have been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. Yes; and now, by the unanimous order of the House, reports of a private character, not giving rise to debate, will be received.

The Speaker then proceeded to call committees for reports of private bills, beginning with the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Commerce, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to remit the duties upon certain goods destroyed by fire in the cities of New York and San Francisco.

Mr. DICK. I am instructed by the Committee for the District of Columbia to report a bill for the incorporation of an insurance company in the city of Washington.

Mr. LETCHER. Is that a private bill? I think it is not.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to the report.
Mr. HAMILTON. This is a local bill, and in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what is in the body of the bill. If it is for the benefit of a company, it is in order.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is for the benefit of a company.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can hardly be regarded as a private bill, in the sense in which the rule is understood; but if there is no objection, it will be received.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Then it cannot be received.

On motion by Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, it was Ordered, That the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the State of Wisconsin, asking for the payment of a certain claim for arresting and keeping a United States prisoner, together with the accompanying papers, containing an extract from the records of the United States court in the case; and that the same do lie upon the table.

Mr. CORWIN, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Thomas Underhill, executor of Thomas Underhill, deceased.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill for the relief of Stephen Lutz; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STANTON. The Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me to report back Senate bill No. 153, "to relinquish the reversionary interests of the United States to a certain reservation therein mentioned, and to confirm the title of Charles G. Gunter."

This bill, I suppose, was referred to our committee upon the idea that it involved a question of law. The committee are of the opinion that the claimant has no legal claim to the title. It may be consistent, however, with the policy of the Government, in disposing of the public lands, to permit him to enter the lands. This question, however, does not come within the jurisdiction of the Committee on the Judiciary, and we ask therefore to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it may be referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHOWER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the following bills; which were severally read a first and second time by their respective titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Everard Meade;

A bill for the relief of the heirs of Larkin Smith; and

A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of Lieutenant Willes Willison.

Mr. S. also, from the same committee, made adverse reports on sundry petitions, and moved that said petitions be laid upon the table and printed.

[A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, the bill of the House (No. 316) "to amend an act approved September 27, 1850, to create the office of surveyor general of the public lands in Oregon," &c.; and also the act amendatory thereof, approved February 19, 1853.

Also, that the Senate had passed a bill and resolution of the following titles:

A bill (No. 413) constituting Madison, in the State of Indiana, a port of delivery; and

A resolution (No. 21) in relation to surgeons' mates of the Army of the Revolution.]

Mr. LETCHER. The cases on which adverse reports are made without written reports, I hope may be sent back to the committee, so that we may have written reports. We ought to have the reasons for the adverse reports, so that other committees may not be worried at the next session.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman submit a motion to recommit?

Mr. LETCHER. I do submit that motion with regard to adverse reports unaccompanied by written reasons. I hope they will be sent back. I think that it is due to the House the committee should accompany their reports with their written reasons.

The SPEAKER. The motion to lay upon the table takes precedence of the motion to recommit.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I rise to a question of order, and it is this: I understand that the order of the House was, that reports of bills should be received. I did not understand that adverse reports were to be received to-day. I thought it was the purpose to get bills on the Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The understanding was, that committees were to report only such matters of a private character as would not give rise to debate. There can be no debate on this proposition; for a motion is made to lay upon the table. If the House refuses to lay upon the table, and debate arises, the Chair will order the memorials back to the committee. In every case where there is a written report the Chair will order it to be printed.

Mr. SHOWER. Is there any rule of the House requiring written reasons for adverse reports?

The SPEAKER. There is no such rule. Still, if the House refuse to lay upon the table, it will be competent for it to recommit.

Mr. COBB. I demand tellers on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FENTON and Cox were appointed.

The question was taken; and the motion to lay upon the table was agreed to, the tellers having reported—ayes 68, noes not counted.

Mr. MAY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made adverse reports in the cases of Pierre Merod and Joseph Bogy, heirs-at-law of Joseph Placy; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAY also, from the same committee, reported bills for the relief of Henry Gardner and George Mattingly; which were read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SHOWER, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Nathaniel Reddick, administrator of Richard Taylor, deceased; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

On motion by Mr. HUGHES, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Biding, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. HUGHES, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported bills for the relief of John McVeigh and John F. McNeeley, and for the relief of William Curran; which were read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HILLYER, from the same committee, reported back the following bills; which were read a first and second time by their titles, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of Enoch S. More;

A bill for the relief of Patrick Gass;

A bill for the relief of Rosale Caxillo;

A bill for the relief of A. S. Laughery;

A bill for the relief of Conrad Wheat and his legal representatives; and

A bill for the relief of Sylvester J. Jerould, assignee of the interest of Henry Richards.

Mr. HILLYER, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills of the Senate, reported them back with a recommendation that they do pass; and they were referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

Bill (No. 23) to confirm the claim of William H. Henderson and the heirs of Robert Henderson to five hundred acres of land in the Bastrop grant;

Bill (No. 373) to ascertain and adjust titles to certain lands in the State of Indiana; and Bill (No. 26) for the relief of Ira Baldwin.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, made an unfavorable report in the case of the petition of Benjamin C. Cook.

Ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported back Senate bill (No. 297) for the relief of Sylvanus Culver, with a recommendation that it do not pass.

Laid upon the table, and, together with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, reported back the following Senate bills, with a recommendation that they do pass; which were referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

S. No. 329. An act for the relief of Thomas D. Jennings; and

S. No. 330. An act for the relief of Juan M. Lucio and José L. Lucio.

Mr. H. also, from the same committee, to which was referred the petition of William J. McElhenry, E. P. Mathews, and Laurence Kribben, reported a bill for their relief; which was read a first and second time by title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back the following Senate bill, (No. 23,) with a recommendation that it do pass:

An act confirming certain land claims in Louisiana in the Bastrop grant.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I ask the indulgence of the House to make a statement of this claim, which statement will not occupy more than five minutes. The Committee on Private Land Claims have recommended to the House that this bill be now put upon its passage. I wish to make a statement to the House to show the importance of immediate action in regard to it.

The Bastrop claim, in the State of Louisiana, was a grant made by the Spanish Government, when it owned that territory, to Baron DeBastrop, upon certain conditions; and among them was one requiring him to people that territory with a certain number of citizens. He went upon the grant, and fulfilled the condition. Those persons who are now asking for relief are the persons who hold under the people whom the Baron De Bastrop carried there under this agreement with the Spanish Government.

It will be recollected that the Government of the United States authorized a suit to be brought by the claimants of the British grant against the Government for this claim; that the Supreme Court of the United States very lately decided this claim to be illegal, and that the land belonged to the Government. A bill has been passed for the relief of the actual bona fide settlers upon the grant. Congress authorized by law, in 1851, commissioners, composed of the receiver and the register of the land office, at the town of Monroe, to examine the title of these people, and report upon it, Congress laying down certain principles by which they should be governed. The commissioners have made their report. They have recommended, under the principles authorized by law, the confirmation of certain claims.

The object of this bill, which has passed the Senate, is to confirm the report of those commissioners. The effect of it will be to enable the Government to confirm such titles as the commission have reported favorably upon, and bring the remainder of the lands into market. That is the only object; and permit me here to say, that I have examined the testimony presented in the report of the commissioners, and I have no doubt that every one of them ought to be confirmed, under the provisions of the act of Congress of 1851. A great many of the claims were rejected because they did not come within the provisions of that law.

I have no doubt that this bill ought to pass at once, because it will enable the Government to convey those lands to the claimants, and to bring the others into market. These lands are located in the richest portion of Louisiana, and will therefore become very valuable to the Government.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I will not detain the House further than to confirm the statement of the gentleman from Louisiana. This bill has passed the Senate, and should be passed by the House at once. I move the previous question.

Mr. HAMILTON. I want to know how this bill came before the House for debate?

The SPEAKER. The House indulged the gentleman from Louisiana in making a statement in reference to the bill.

Mr. HUNT. I hope the gentleman from Maryland will not object to the bill. It is for the benefit of a community which is entitled to relief. We have full and sufficient information in reference to it, and I hope there will be no objection to its consideration.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time.

It was then read by the Clerk in extenso.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and that that motion be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. NICHOLS, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of the inhabitants of school township forty-five, range one, in Warren county, Missouri.

Mr. N. also, from the same committee, reported back bills of the following titles; which were referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

H. R. No. 299. A bill for the relief of the Pine Grove Academy, in Louisiana;

S. No. 167. An act for the relief of Joseph Canpan; and

S. No. 296. An act for the relief of Manuel Hernandez.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to reconsider the order of the House referring the bill reported by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FENTON], to remit duties on certain goods destroyed by fire in the cities of New York and San Francisco, to a Committee of the Whole House, that the bill may be committed to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is a bill of a public and very important nature. It has heretofore been referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ought now to take the same direction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will rule, according to the order of the House, which was unanimously made, that if the motion to reconsider give rise to debate, it must lie over until another time.

Several members proposed to debate it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to all further debate.

Mr. MILLSON. I should have objected in time, had I known what the bill was.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered; it must lie over for the present.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not know that it comes within the order by which the House allowed private bills to be reported.

The SPEAKER. The bill having been disposed of under the order of the House, the Chair thinks that it can only be reached by reconsideration. The motion to reconsider will be entered, and may be called up to-morrow, or any other time except the present.

Mr. FENTON. I reported the bill under the impression that it was merely of a private character. I am still of the same impression.

The motion to reconsider was entered on the Journal.

Mr. MAXWELL, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported adversely on the petition of Simeon Buckre; which was laid upon the table.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back bills of the following titles, with the recommendation that they do pass; which were referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

S. No. 170. An act for the relief of Helen Mackay, administratrix of Lieutenant Colonel Eneas Mackay, late a deputy quartermaster in the United States Army;

S. No. 189. An act for the relief of Mrs. Celia F. B. Cochrane, widow of the late Lieutenant Colonel C. E. Cochrane, United States Army; and

S. No. 206. An act for the relief of the executrix of the late Brevet Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, of the Army of the United States.

No. 250. An act for the relief of William Claude Jones; and

No. 285. An act for the relief of the heirs of Brigadier General Richard B. Mason.

On motion by Mr. FAULKNER, the Committee on Military Affairs were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the Legislative Council of New Mexico, asking the reestablishment of Fort Atchison; and it was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ETHERIDGE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the payment of horses and other property lost or destroyed in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1849.

Mr. LINDLEY. I desire to put the bill just reported upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already announced its reference. By unanimous consent the bill will be put upon its passage.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Unanimous consent is not given.

Mr. FAULKNER. I would inquire whether the proper destination of that bill is not the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. The Chair had doubts as to whether it would properly come under the head of private bills.

Mr. PHELPS. An improper direction has been given to this bill, and I move to reconsider the vote by which it was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent the bill may be returned to the committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think the proper direction would be to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and have it printed, so that we may see what it is.

The SPEAKER. The bill was received and referred to a Committee of the Whole House. Some gentlemen propose to return the bill to the committee that reported it, upon the ground that it is not a private bill. Others suggest, that it should be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed. Is it the pleasure of the House that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. COBB. I object to that reference.

The SPEAKER. Then it can be reached only by reconsideration.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I know nothing myself about the bill, as it is one which I reported at the instance of Colonel BISSELL, and which he handed to me before he fell sick. As he is now unable to be in his seat, and as, perhaps, in view of some suggestions made by the friends of the bill, it would be better to have it re-referred to the committee, I ask the unanimous consent of the House, therefore, to have it so returned.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. ZOLLICOFFER. I am instructed by the Committee on Naval Affairs to report back the following bill from the Senate, with a recommendation that it do pass:

A bill for the relief of Joshua Gonder, jr., and John Duff.

Mr. FLORENCE. This bill involves merely a question of equity. I hope, therefore, it will be now put upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. It involves the question of non-compliance with a contract.

Mr. FLORENCE. I beg pardon, but the circumstance is a simple one.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The bill was referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. DISNEY. On behalf of the Committee on Public Lands, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up a bill, which has been returned from the Senate with an amendment, for the purpose of having it disposed of.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That would be a deviation from the rule; and I object to it.

Mr. DISNEY. It is merely a land bill in relation to the Territory of Oregon.

The SPEAKER. It is objected to by the gentleman from Indiana; and the bill cannot now be taken up.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. In the absence of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT,] who a few days ago presented a minority report from the select committee, I yesterday made a motion to reconsider the vote by which that report was ordered to be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole. My purpose in making that motion was simply to afford the honorable gentleman an opportunity of withdrawing a paper which he had filed and made part of the report inadvertently. I understand that he desires to withdraw the paper in question; and if unanimous consent be given to him for that purpose, I will withdraw my motion to reconsider.

There being no objection, the gentleman from South Carolina was allowed to withdraw the paper referred to.

Mr. STANTON. Then I ask to withdraw my motion to reconsider the vote by which that minority report was referred.

There being no objection, the motion to reconsider was withdrawn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

Mr. EDMUNDSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, reported the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of James Capers.

Mr. E. also, from the same committee, made adverse reports in the following cases; which were laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed:

The petition of Martha Scott, widow of Samuel Scott;

The petition of Samuel Ross, of Ohio; and
The petition of the children of Robert McNeil and Sarah his wife.

On motion by Mr. EDMUNDSON, it was also Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of Julian Belenger's heirs, praying for bounty land under resolution of Congress of August 14, 1776, and resolution of May 15, 1778, and that the same be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

On motion by Mr. MIDDLESWARTH, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John Sherburn, heir of Sherburn Horton, of Portsmouth, New Hampshire, for a pension, and that the same do lie upon the table.

Mr. CULLOM. I was not present when the Committee for the District of Columbia was called, and I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from that committee a bill to incorporate the Washington and Georgetown Railway Company, in the District of Columbia.

Mr. OLDS. That is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER. It can only be received by unanimous consent.

There being no objection, the bill was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PARKER. I was not present when the Committee on the Judiciary was called. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a bill for the relief of Thomas Ap Catesby Jones, surety for a former postmaster of Norfolk, Virginia.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GOODE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee for the District of Columbia a bill "to prevent mischief, and to protect property in the District of Columbia."

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not a private bill. I object.

Mr. GOODE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the objection. I only desire to have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well, sir, I will withdraw the objection in this case; but I give notice that I will not in any other of a like character.

There was no objection, and the bill was accordingly referred.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee for the District of Columbia a bill to incorporate the mutual Fire Insurance Company in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HENDRICKS. That is not a private bill. I object to its reception.

Mr. McMULLIN. I object to anything that is not in the regular order of business.

On motion by Mr. LINDLEY, it was Ordered, That the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the heirs of Epaphras Ripley, of Vermont, an insane applicant for a revolutionary pension, and that the same lie upon the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill which was read a first and second time, by its title, as follows, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed:

A bill for the relief of James Wright, jr., of the State of Tennessee.

Petition of George Blake, of Niagara county, New York, a soldier in the war of 1812, for invalid pension.

Mr. EWING. I wish now to call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill "for the relief of James Jeffries and Jeremiah M. Smith" was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The first question in order will be, "Shall the bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole House?"

Mr. OLDS. Have I the power to withdraw the motion to commit?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not. If no objection is made, the motion to commit will be withdrawn.

Mr. OLDS. The reading of the report made upon the bill in the Senate will explain the whole matter.

The report was read by the Clerk.

Mr. OLDS. The whole matter is stated very simply and briefly in the report just read. These gentlemen bid for several routes in Texas. Among the number of routes which they received were three routes, which proved to be about fifty miles longer than they were advertised at, in consequence of which they refused to perform service upon them. The Department withheld payment for their services upon other routes because they did not perform services upon these three routes.

Mr. GROW. I move that the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; being "Shall the bill be referred to a Committee of the Whole House?"

Mr. HENDRICKS. On that question I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Cox and Wheeler were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 53; not a sufficient number.

[Cries of "Count the other side!"]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There is not a quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ascertain whether there is or not.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I call for a vote of the other side.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If it is in order, I move that the House do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order.

After a count, the Chair announced that there were one hundred and twenty-one members in their seats.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. All those who sit still in their seats, and do not vote at all, are counted for the negative. That is not right. Members may be in their seats, and not vote at all.

Mr. GROW. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EWING. I do not know that there would be this contest were it not for my motion; and as I am extremely unwilling to cause it, I could in one moment, if permitted, explain to the House the nature of the motion. Half the House seems to misunderstand the matter, and if no gentleman objects, I will briefly explain it. I simply wish to remind the House that the House, as many will remember, referred this bill, because they desired to have it investigated. The question was, whether it should go to the Committee of the Whole, or to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. Those who were present will remember that the House desired only that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads should examine it and make a report, there then being no report. It was a Senate bill, and had passed that body twice, but was lost in the last Congress in consequence of delay of business. The House decided that it should go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, instead of to a Committee of the Whole House. Well, now, while I was absent the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads had it referred to a Committee of the Whole House. Being informed of that, I made a motion to reconsider that reference, which was agreed to, and, by unanimous consent, leave was given for the withdrawal of the motion to refer. The friends of the bill would still be defeating their own purposes if they were now to refer it to the Committee of the Whole House, after first sending it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

I have had no conference with that committee, or with any member upon it. I left the proof in their hands, and they considered that there was no valid objection to the bill; and I simply wish the House now to carry out the general understanding then had, and to act upon the bill now. It makes no appropriation, but only provides for the remission of a fine.

Mr. GROW. I wish to ask the gentleman if this is the same bill which the House defeated once this session?

Mr. EWING. I have tried for two Congresses to get the House to act upon it in some shape or other; but there are a few gentlemen who seem to persist in putting it off.

Mr. GROW. Is it the same bill to which Mr. SAGE made objection some time since?

Mr. EWING. It is the same bill; but the gentleman will recollect the history of that matter, and that, contrary to my wish, it was referred to a committee, the House refusing to refer it to the Committee of the Whole. I had rather have the paternity of half a dozen Nebraska bills than one private bill for the remission of a fine. It passed through the Senate twice, and has come here. I have been laboring for no other purpose than, after having it investigated by the committee, to get the House to act upon it. But it is moved now to recommit it to a Committee of the Whole House; but I hope it will not be recommitment.

Mr. COBB. I wish simply to say, that Mr. SAGE, who seemed to understand this matter when it was under discussion before, had a letter from the Postmaster General read. Perhaps that letter might throw a little light upon the subject.

Mr. EWING. In answer to the gentleman, I will say, that those who compose the Committee of the Whole House are the same individuals who are now here. Gentlemen will remember that this bill was thoroughly discussed when it was last before us, and occupied more of the attention of the House than I desired. That letter was then read; and I will state to the House its contents, as briefly as possible, if the gentleman will allow me; and I shall thereby save the time of the House. The Post Office Department advertised the routes shorter than they proved to be. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SAGE] goes to the Department, and gets some information from the clerks, and also gets a letter from the same Department. The letter states that, according to the then present information of the Department, the routes are not so long as the proof in the case shows them to be; but it allows that they are a good deal longer than was stated in the advertisement. That is the substance of the letter. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GROW] was kind enough, on a former occasion, to call the previous question upon the matter, after he had made a speech, and thereby cut me off from making an explanation.

Mr. GROW. It is true that when this bill was up some time ago, I had a word to say upon it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Before the gentleman from Pennsylvania submits his remarks, I desire to suggest an amendment to the gentleman from Kentucky: to strike out, in the second line, the words "and directed," and insert "in his discretion." It now reads:

That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause James Jeffries and Jeremiah M. Smith, &c.

If amended, it will read:

That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to cause, &c.

I ask the gentleman from Kentucky to accept that amendment.

Mr. EWING. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee if that will remove all objection to the bill?

Mr. JONES. If that amendment be made, I will not then object to the bill.

Mr. EWING. Then I will accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Kentucky has no power to accept an amendment; and that, at this stage of the proceedings, it can only be made by the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. JONES. I take it for granted that if the gentleman from Kentucky does not object, no one else will. If the Postmaster General thinks the petition ought to be granted, I have no objection.

There was no objection; and the amendment was accordingly inserted in the bill.

Mr. GROW. Now, Mr. Speaker, I have a single word to say.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I object to all further debate.

Mr. GROW. I thought I had the floor by the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the objection of the gentleman from Indiana comes too late, so far as the gentleman from Pennsylvania is concerned.

Mr. GROW. There are a large number of cases upon the Private Calendar of at least equal merit with this.

Mr. EWING. How does the gentleman from Pennsylvania obtain possession of the floor?

The SPEAKER. The House accorded it to him by unanimous consent.

Mr. EWING. Well, sir, if I had been aware of the fact at the time, I should have objected. The gentleman made a speech against the bill the other day, and then moved the previous question, although I requested him to withdraw it. If it is in my power to object, I do so.

Mr. WHEELER. Then I shall move to lay the bill upon the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor, and it is too late to object.

Mr. GROW. When this bill was before the House on a former occasion, the gentleman from Kentucky made a speech, and then called the previous question upon it. I appealed to him to withdraw it for a moment in my favor, and I promised to renew it. He refused; but when I had obtained the floor, and had called the previous question, he asked of me the same courtesy that he had refused to extend to me. So that if there is any complaint to be made, I think it is I who should make it.

But, sir, I can see no reason why this bill should be taken out of the usual course of proceedings. It has no more merit in it than a great many other bills upon your Private Calendar. If these contractors have suffered, it is their own fault, and not the fault of the Government. They knew, or they should have known, what service was required before they took the contract. But I do not propose to argue the merits of the claim. My great objection is to taking this bill out of its regular order upon the Calendar, and giving it preference in our action upon it over other bills there of equal merit.

Mr. EWING. Just one word. This bill is not upon the Private Calendar. It is before the House, and upon its passage. The remarks of the gentleman are therefore wholly irrelevant and inapplicable.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and cannot be withdrawn, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHEELER. I object

The question now being upon recommitting the bill to a Committee of the Whole House, it was taken; and the motion was decided in the negative—yeas 34, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Belcher, Carpenter, Crocker, Culloin, Dick, Ellison, Fuller, Giddings, Grow, Hastings, Houston, Daniel T. Jones, Knox, Letcher, McCulloch, Matteson, Milton, Norton, Parker, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Phelps, Pratt, Pringle, Ready, Rowe, Ruffin, William R. Smith, Trout, Wade, Ellihu B. Washburne, and Wells—34.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Barry, Benson, Benton, Breckinridge, Caruthers, Caskie, Chamberlain, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Edmundson, Thomas D. Eliot, English, Etheridge, Ewing, Farley, Faulkner, Florence, Goode, Greenwood, Andrew J. Harlan, Sampson W. Harris, Wiley P. Harris, Hendricks, Heun, Hill, Hillyer, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Giancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kurtz, Lamb, Latham, Lindley, Lindsley, McDougall, Macy, Maxwell, Mayall, Middewarh, Smith Miller, Morgan, Nichols, Noble, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Peck, Peckham, Powell, Preston, David Ritchie, Robbins, Sabin, Sapp, Seward, Shannon, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, William Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Vail, Walsh, John Wentworth, Wheeler, Witte, Yates, and Zollisoffler—90.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EWING moved that the vote by which the bill was passed be reconsidered; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I now move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. HILLYER. Before that motion is put, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee of Claims a bill for the relief of John Frazer, and the administrator of the estate of John G. Clendenin, deceased.

There was no objection; and the bill was read a first and second time by its title, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and ordered to be printed.

The question was then put on Mr. HENDRICK's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, (Mr. Disney in the chair), and proceeded to consider private bills in the order in which they stood upon the Calendar.

This being "objection Friday," no discussion was in order, and no bill could be considered to which objection was made.

HEIRS OF BARON DE KALB.

The CHAIRMAN. The first bill before the committee for consideration is entitled "A bill for the relief of the children and heirs of Major General Baron De Kalb."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why does the Chair commence on page eleven, and not at the commencement of the Calendar?

The CHAIRMAN. This is objection day, and the Chair has commenced where the committee left off last objection day, in accordance with the uniform practice of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN. I think the Chair should commence at the beginning of the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that all bills before the one, the title of which has been stated, have been objected to heretofore.

Mr. WASHBURN. That may be true, but they may not be objected to now.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has commenced the call of the Calendar, this being objection day, where it was suspended the last objection day. On private bill days, when debate is allowed, the call is commenced with the first bill on the Calendar.

The bill was then read through.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York, objected, and the bill went over.

NEW YORK VOLUNTEERS.

Senate bill (No. 17) "to reimburse to the common council of New York city expenditures made for the first regiment of New York volunteers."

The bill provides that the Secretary of War, in the settlement and adjustment (under the act of Congress of June 2, 1848) of the claims of the common council of New York, for expenditures made in organizing, transporting, clothing, and subsisting the first regiment of New York volunteers, commanded by Colonel Ward B. Burnett, prior to the mustering of said regiment into the service of the United States, shall be authorized and required to allow such of those claims as may be supported by satisfactory vouchers, showing that such expenditure had been fairly made, and was necessary and proper for the service, notwithstanding that such vouchers may be informal and defective for want of particularity, provided the amount allowed shall not exceed $3,672 90.

There being no objection to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

MAJOR CALEB SWAN.

Senate bill (No. 33) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Major Caleb Swan."

Mr. LETCHER. I object. Let the bill go over.

The bill was accordingly laid over.

W. D. PORTER.

House bill (No. 265) "for the relief of W. D. Porter, of the United States Navy."

The bill, which was read, provides for the settlement of the accounts of W. D. Porter for moneys expended by him in defraying the expenses of bringing Amin Bey and suite to the United States, in compliance with the request of the Hon. G. P. Marsh, United States Minister at Constantinople; the amount not to exceed $2,024 32.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It was in a vessel of the Navy of the United States that Amin Bey and his suite were brought here. At a former session of Congress, and at the time when he was here at the Capitol, we appropriated $10,000 for paying his expenses. I therefore object to this bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I can explain to my friend from Tennessee, if the committee will allow me, how it was that Captain Porter did not happen to be paid out of the appropriation which he alludes to.

This bill was reported by the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. PERKINS,] who, I thought, was not in the House to-day, but whom I now see in his seat. At the last Congress I was on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and was instructed by that committee to report this bill. Captain Porter was in command of the United States ship which conveyed Amin Bey and suite to this country—

Mr. JONES, (interrupting.) I have objected to this bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I can explain in one instant how it was that Captain Porter was not paid out of the appropriation of $10,000.

Mr. JONES. But I should like to know why it was that he was to be paid at all, when it was a Government vessel that he was in command of.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I would explain that, if the committee would allow me.

Mr. JONES. I must insist on my objection.

MOSES OLMSTEAD.

House bill (No. 117) "for the relief of Moses Olmstead."

The bill, which was read, authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to place the name of Moses Olmstead upon the roll of invalid pensioners, and to pay him during his life a pension at the rate of eight dollars a month, commencing on the 20th of January, 1853.

From the report, it appears that the claim rests upon the alleged fact that the claimant, while in the service of the United States, in the war of 1812, and while stationed at Harlem Heights, received an injury in one of his legs, which at the time did not prevent him from serving to the end of his term. He was discharged on the 26th of November, 1814. It would appear, however, that the injury was of a permanent nature, and increased from year to year, until, as shown by the statements of two highly respectable and well known surgeons, he is rendered wholly unable to obtain a subsistence by manual labor. The evidence in support of the claim is not sufficient to justify the Commissioner of Pensions in placing his name on the roll of invalid pensioners. But that officer, in a letter to the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, dated 20th January, 1853, says:

"Although the papers do not afford such evidence as our rules require, yet from his own statement of his case, and the evidence afforded by the papers of his high character for truth, morality, and religion, I feel no hesitation in recommending his claim to the favorable consideration of Congress."

It is shown that, since that time, by the advice of eminent surgeons, the injured limb has been amputated.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID TOWLE.

House bill (No. 269) "for the relief of David Towle."

The bill, which was read, provides that the name of David Towle, of the town of Oxford, in the State of Maine, be placed on the pension roll at eight dollars a month, from the 5th of April, 1843.

From the report, it appears that the petitioner, on the 14th of April, 1813, enlisted for one year as corporal in the company of Captain Noah Haley, in the thirty-third regiment of United States infantry, commanded by Colonel Isaac Lane, and on the 25th of May joined his regiment at Saco, in Maine, and was afterwards marched to Boston, Massachusetts; thence, on the 14th of August, was ordered for Concord, a march of eighty miles in excessive hot weather. During the march, the petitioner became so exhausted and worn down by the fatigue and heat, that an inflammation of the kidneys and stoppage of urine was produced, which eventuated in a chronic disease of the kidneys and ureter, by which he is wholly disabled from obtaining a living by manual labor.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS PORTER.

House bill (No. 270) "to provide a pension for Captain Thomas Porter."

The bill, which was read, provides that Thomas Porter, a deputy quartermaster in the war of 1812, be placed on the roll of invalid pensioners at twenty dollars a month, commencing on the 2d of March, 1831, deducting such sums as heretofore have been allowed and paid to him as pension money.

From the report, it appears that Thomas Porter entered the service, in Captain James A. McClelland's troop of volunteer light dragoons, in the month of October, 1812; continued in said service for one year; was severely wounded at the battle of Missinoway on the 19th December, 1812. So severe was his wound, that he had to be carried on a litter from the battle-ground to Dayton, Ohio, and from thence to Lebanon, Ohio, in a sleigh. His horse was killed in said battle. Partially recovering from said wound, he joined his troop in the following spring, and marched to Fort Meigs; was in the first siege of said fort, at which place he was slightly wounded by a cannon ball, the same killing a second horse for him while in the attitude of mounting. He continued in the service till the close of the campaign, partaking in all the engagements of his squadron, and terminating with the battle of the Thames; after which he was discharged. Shortly after leaving the volunteer service, he received, without solicitation on his part, the appointment of ensign in the sixteenth regiment United States infantry; and soon thereafter, without solicitation, the additional appointment from President Monroe of assistant deputy quartermaster general, with orders to repair to Carlisle, in the State of Pennsylvania. He accepted the appointment, and promptly repaired to the post assigned him, and there continued in the full discharge of his duties until peace was made. In the winter of 1814 and 1815 he felt serious inconvenience from the wounds he had previously received, and was confined to his bed for some weeks in consequence thereof. From the month of October, 1819, in consequence of said wounds, he has been confined to his bed, his crutches, and his staff.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask if there is not an amendment pending to the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. There is.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask that it may be read. The amendment was reported, as follows:

Insert after the word "money," the words "and that the amount found due under the provisions of this act shall be paid to the children of Captain Thomas Porter."

Mr. HENDRICKS. I will state to the committee, that the state of this case has somewhat changed since the report was made. Thomas Porter was wounded while a private. That wound was almost cured when he was promoted; and he services which he rendered in the Army after his promotion made his former wounds become incurable. In 1831, by a special act of Congress, he was pensioned at the rate of eight dollars a month. This pay was not according to his rank, and he declined to receive it; but afterwards becoming poor, he concluded to accept it. The committee were of opinion that the pension should have been according to his rank, and they have accordingly reported a bill to that effect. Receiving, as he did, a pension, he could not get a pension, according to his rank, at the Pension Office. Since the bill was reported, Captain Porter has died of the wounds which he received in the service, and my colleague reported the amendment which has just been read. I think that it ought to be adopted. This is a back pension, which he ought to receive.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will inquire of the gentleman whether he did not get a full disability pension for the rank he held in the service at the time he received the injury?

Mr. HENDRICKS. If that were so, the committee would have reported against the case; for the committee have in no case reported a bill giving larger pension than that of the rank held at the time of receiving the injury. This injury became permanent and incurable while he was captain. That is the finding of the report.

Mr. JONES. Was not the wound received while Captain Porter was a private?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I tried to state that to the committee. His first wound was received while he was a private. It was nearly cured when he was promoted; and, by the labor incident to the discharge of his last service, the wound was made incurable. That is the report of the physicians.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection to the bill, it was then laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

HEIRS OF DANIEL BEDINGER.

House bill (No. 272) "for the relief of Daniel Bedinger's heirs."

The bill was read through.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I should like to know from the gentleman who reported that bill why this claimant did not get his commutation pay under the general laws authorizing its payment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. ROGERS], who reported the bill, is not present.

Mr. JONES. Then let the bill go over until he is here to give us some explanation of the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. I did not report the bill, but I am somewhat acquainted with the facts of the case. The proof is conclusive that Mr. Bedinger never received the commutation pay. Why he never called to receive it, is a question which cannot be determined at this day. That he was entitled to it is certified to by all the other officers. It is certified by the officer of the Government that he never received it. All these certificates are before the committee.

Mr. JONES. Let it go over. The gentleman who reported it is absent, and I should like to have some explanation from him.

Objection being made, the bill was passed over.

PRISCILLA C. SIMONDS.

Senate bill (No. 54) "for the relief of Priscilla C. Simonds."

The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury be directed to pay to Priscilla C. Simonds the sum of $418, being the value of the property of the late Captain Moses H. Simonds, which was taken possession of by authority of the United States.

From the report, it appears that Moses H. Simonds, the son of the petitioner, was captain of company H, third regiment of Missouri mounted volunteers, and was mustered into the service of the United States on the 12th June, 1847. That while in the discharge of his duty, and en route for Santa Fe with his company, Captain Simonds sickened and died at Council Grove, on the 25th day of July, 1847. That after his death, his property and effects, consisting of two horses, clothing, and military equipage, &c., valued by Lieutenant Cannon, of said company, under oath, at $418, were taken possession of by Major Reynolds, of said regiment, agreeably to the ninety-fourth paragraph of the rules and articles of war, but never accounted for by him, either to the representatives of the deceased officer or to the Government.

It appears by the papers that the major of the regiment (Reynolds) did, on the decease of Captain Simonds, immediately secure all his effects, as provided by law; and it further appears, upon examination at the Adjutant General's office, that he failed to send any inventory to the War Department, as provided for by law. Major Reynolds is also dead; and there does not now appear to be any means of recovering the property, or its value, from that quarter.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL M'KNIGHT.

House bill (No. 319) "for the relief of Samuel McKnight of the State of Kentucky."

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Samuel McKnight, of the State of Kentucky, on the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, at the rate of eight dollars per month, to commence January 1, 1853, and to continue during his natural life.

The report shows that on the 24th day of April, 1847, the petitioner enlisted in company B, of the sixteenth regiment of the infantry in the Army of the United States, to serve during the war with Mexico, and was honorably discharged at the close of the war; that whilst the petitioner was in the service in the line of his duty, near Monterey, in Mexico, his eyes became diseased; that this disease was caused by the climate and the hardships of the service, and not by any fault on the part of the petitioner; that the disease has constantly been growing worse, and that he is now almost blind; that his eyes cannot be cured, but that in a short time he will be entirely blind. The petitioner is a stone mason, but has not been able to labor at his business since his return from Mexico. His money has been expended in securing surgical treatment for his eyes. He is now wholly disabled, and destitute.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM WALLACE.

House bill (No. 320) "for the relief of William Wallace, of Illinois."

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior be authorized and directed to place the name of William Wallace, of the State of Illinois, on the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, at the rate of six dollars per month, from March 4, 1854, and to continue during his natural life.

The report shows that the petitioner served as a corporal in Captain Whiting's company, of the twenty-third regiment of United States infantry, from the 26th day of February, 1813, during the war of 1812; that on the 25th day of July, 1814, at the battle of Bridgewater, he was wounded in his left thigh, by a musket shot; that he was carried from the field and remained in the hospital for several months; that the ball was not taken from the wound, but remains in the limb at this time, and that the injury has within a few years so increased, as three fourths to disable him from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor.

The petitioner made application at the Pension Office, but was refused a pension, because he could not produce the testimony of a commissioned officer, or of more than one private of the company in which he served, to establish his claim, which was required under the law and regulations governing that office.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

GEORGE M. BENTLEY.

House bill (No. 320) "for the relief of George M. Bentley, of the State of Indiana."

The bill provides that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of George M. Bentley, of the State of Indiana, upon the list of invalid pensioners of the United States, at the rate of eight dollars per month, from January 1, 1854, and to continue during his natural life.

From the report, it appears that the said Bentley was a private in company H in the third regiment of Indiana volunteers, and in said company served in Mexico during the war with that country; and with his company fought gallantly at the battle of Buena Vista. During the first part of the month of November, 1846, the said regiment was encamped near Matamoros, upon the Rio Grande. On or about the 10th day of that month, said Bentley, with the written permission of the colonel of the regiment, went into the city of Matamoros, and whilst there, by accident, sprained his right ankle. Upon his return to camp in the evening, his ankle was swollen, and he was so disabled by lameness as to be unable to perform military duty for a "considerable length of time." Before the limb was wholly restored, he returned to the discharge of his duty; the swelling returned, and continued until incurable ulcers broke out upon the limb. The said Bentley is now wholly disabled from providing for himself and his family by manual labor.

Before entering the service of the United States, the said Bentley was a sound and very robust man. Whilst in the service he was temperate and very attentive to his duties. This claim was submitted to the Pension Office and rejected, for the reason that there is not the testimony of any person who was immediately present when the injury was first received.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

ZADOC C. INGRAHAM.

Senate bill (No. 249) "for the relief of Zadoc C. Ingraham."

The bill provides that the Postmaster General be directed to cause Zadoc C. Ingraham, late postmaster at Wapello, Iowa, to be released from a judgment obtained against him by the United States in March, 1849, for $318 87, and all interest and costs.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I ask that the report may be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that there is no report.

Mr. JONES. Well, sir, the courts have decided against this man, and I think the bill had better go over.

Mr. OLDS. There is a Senate report somewhere; but if the committee will allow me, I will state the facts of the case in half a dozen words. This is the case of a postmaster who paid over the amount of his postages to the contractor, but the money was stolen. A suit was brought against him, and the amount recovered from him. But since that time it has been proven satisfactorily that the money was stolen. These are the facts of the case. I hope there will be no objection.

There was no objection; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

LLEWELLEN WASHINGTON.

Senate bill (No. 283) "for the relief of Llewellyn Washington."

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Llewellyn Washington $205 62, for services performed by him as clerk in the Post Office Department, from May 1, 1851, to July 14, of the same year.

The report of the committee was read, from which it appears that, according to the statement of the Assistant Postmaster General, Llewellyn Washington was employed as temporary clerk in the Post Office Department, during the time above specified, at the rate of $1,000 per annum; that the Postmaster General, in his estimate sent to the Treasury Department, asked for $205 62 for his payment; but, from some cause, no appropriation was made. The committee report that they believe the claim to be entirely just.

There being no objection to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

IRA DAY.

Senate bill (No. 209) "for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont."

The bill authorizes and requires the Postmaster General to pay to Ira Day, out of the funds of the Post Office Department, the sum of $1,008 90, in full for the balance due him for transporting the mail from Royalton to Burlington, in Vermont, from January, 1833, to July, 1837.

From the report it appears that James Barker and others were contractors for transporting a daily mail for four years from Boston, in the State of Massachusetts, to Royalton, Montpelier, and Burlington, (the great depot of navigation on Lake Champlain,) being the great mail route from Boston to Montreal, for the sum of $12,250 per annum, commencing on the 1st day of January, 1833, and ending in January, 1837. In the month of October, 1834, the Postmaster General ordered the mail to be discontinued one day in a week on that part of the route from Royalton to Burlington; which part of the route, for the transportation of the mail, was assigned by the contractors to the petitioner. Under the order aforesaid of the Postmaster General, the mail from Boston arrived at Royalton on Saturday evening, and remained over until the Monday morning following.

The inconvenience to the public by this order appears to have been so great, that the postmasters on the route and other citizens solicited and urged the petitioner to continue the transportation of the mail every day, notwithstanding said order of the Postmaster General. He did so; and by so doing the line was continued unbroken, and the mail was transported regularly from Boston to the capital of Vermont, and thence to Burlington, and vice versa, every day in the week. The petitioner therefore claims the sum of $1,008 90, being the sum withheld from him by the Postmaster General on account of the order for discontinuing the transportation of the mail aforesaid.

It also appears that the mail was carried by the petitioner, at the request of the Postmaster General, after the contract had expired, to wit: from the 1st of January, 1837, to the 1st of July of the same year. The one seventh part of the amount of the original contract for performing that service was also retained by the Postmaster General, and is included in the bill.

There was no power vested in the Postmaster General authorizing him to make the order of October, 1834, discontinuing the mail one day in the week on that part of the route from Royalton to Burlington.

Mr. UPHAM. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the name "Ira Day" the words "or his legal representatives."

The amendment was agreed to.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was not agreed to.

WILLIAM G. HOWISON.

House bill (No. 356) "for the relief of William G. Howison."

The bill provides that William G. Howison be allowed by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury $167, in full for all services as a member of the Auxiliary Guard of the city of Washington.

From the report, it appears William G. Howison was a member of the Auxiliary Guard for the city of Washington, and that whilst acting in that capacity he became sick; that he remained so for one hundred and sixty-seven days, when, on account of it, he was discharged the service; that whilst sick he was docked in his pay, which he maintains was not right, and not justified by precedent.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it pass.

CAPTAIN MATHEW JACK.

House bill (No. 360) "for the relief of the heirs of Captain Mathew Jack, deceased."

The bill and report were read.

The bill provides for the payment of one year's extra pay to which Captain Mathew Jack was entitled by virtue of resolution of 1778.

There being no objection to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

LOT HALL.

House bill (No. 365) "for the relief of the heirs of Lot Hall, deceased."

The bill provides that the proper accounting officers of the Treasury shall settle and pay to the heirs and legal representatives of Lot Hall, deceased, who was a lieutenant of marines in the service of the United States during the Revolution, $1,906, together with the interest thereon, at six per cent. per annum, from May 25, 1840, for the pay of a lieutenant of marines, due to the said Lot Hall, and for the subsistence of the said Hall while a prisoner of war, and also for the share of prize money due to him, under the resolutions of Congress, for the proceeds of the vessels captured by Lieutenant Payne, while the said Hall was under his command.

It appears, from the report made in this case, that Lot Hall entered the service of the United States in May, 1776, as a lieutenant of marines, under Lieutenant Elijah F. Payne, of the ship Randolph, of twenty guns, then lying at Charleston, South Carolina, under the command of Robert Cochran; that said Hall entered the service under the regulations of Congress, and the directions of General Washington, in Massachusetts, where he enlisted twenty-nine men and a boy, whom he transported to Providence, Rhode Island, and placed, as well as himself, under the command of Lieutenant Payne; from Providence they sailed, in the month of June, 1776, with a design to make a cruising voyage to Charleston, South Carolina, to join their ship, the Randolph. On their passage they took four prizes, the last of which Hall was put on board of as prize-master, with orders to take the prize into Boston; but she was retaken by a British vessel, and Hall carried a prisoner of war to Glasgow, in Scotland, where he was detained about a year, when he was enabled to take passage for Virginia, where he arrived about the 1st of January, 1778, as an exchanged officer; and through the munificence of Patrick Henry, then Governor of Virginia, he was enabled to reach his home in Massachusetts, February 22, 1778, stopping at Philadelphia on his route, and petitioning Congress, then sitting there, for employment, which petition is dated January 23, 1778; and after setting forth his adventures and sufferings, concludes as follows:

"I now beg of your honors to consider my sufferings, and if you think me deserving any office on board a Continental vessel, and will bestow it upon me, I am willing to enter a second time, or at least I hope your honors will supply me with money sufficient to carry me to the State of Boston, the State of my nativity."

Upon this state of facts the claimants ask for the pay and subsistence of said Hall while a prisoner; for one year's pay as a supernumerary exchanged officer, and for his share of the prize money, with such interest as Congress may deem just and right.

There being no objection to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it pass.

HENRY HOFFMAN.

House bill (No. 366) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Hoffman."

The bill, which was read, provides that the Secretary of the Treasury pay the sum of eighty dollars to the legal representatives of Henry Hoffman, being on account of a reward provided in certain cases, by resolution of Congress of the 16th of May, 1778.

From the report, it appears that, by the original papers in the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, Henry Hoffman enlisted on the 5th of September, 1782, for, and served until the end of, the war, in the second regiment Pennsylvania line. The Third Auditor of the Treasury Department also states that the records in his office show that he received his monthly pay to the end of the war, but did not receive a certificate for the eighty dollars gratuity promised by resolution of Congress, passed May 15, 1778, which provides a reward of eighty dollars for each non-commissioned officer or soldier who had enlisted, or might thereafter enlist, and serve to the end of the war. The case of Henry Hoffman clearly comes within the provisions of that resolution.

No objection being made to the bill, it was laid aside to be reported to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

BILLS OBJECTED TO.

House bill (No. 273) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel John H. Stone." [Objected to by Mr. SKELTON.]

House bill (No. 274) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel Willis Riddick, deceased." [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of New York.]

House bill (No. 281) "for the relief of Brigadier General John E. Wool." [Objected to by Mr. LETCHER.]

House bill (No. 282) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Colonel Francis Vigo." [Objected to by Mr. HAMILTON.]

House bill (No. 323) "for the relief of J. C. Buckles."

The bill was read through.

Mr. ROWE. I object.

Mr. PRESTON. The gentleman who reported this bill is not present; but I trust it will not be objected to. This case has been here continually from year to year, always reported favorably upon, and always lost for want of action upon it by the House. I hope the objection will be withdrawn.

The objection was not withdrawn.

House bill (No. 324) "for the relief of McAtee & Eastman." [Objected to by Mr. HASTINGS.]

House bill (No. 335) "for the relief of James S. Graham, and Walker H. Finnall." [Objected to by Mr. ROWE.]

House bill (No. 327) "to authorize Robert Graham to locate six thousand nine hundred and ninety-three acres of land, in lieu of one undivided half part of certain lands patented to John Edgar and John Murray St. Clair, by the Governor of the Northwestern Territory." [Objected to by Mr. READY.]

Senate bill (No. 303) "for the relief of James N. Goggin." [Objected to by Mr. HASTINGS.]

Joint resolution (No. 24) "for the adjustment of the accounts of John D. Colmesnil."

The bill and report were read through.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the objection will be withdrawn. The bill places the matter in the hands of the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and I had rather trust to his judgment than that of this House.

The objection was not withdrawn.

Senate bill (No. 147) "for the relief of the legal representatives of the late Thomas Chapman, formerly collector of the port of Georgetown, South Carolina." [Objected to by Mr. JONES, of New York.]

House bill (No. 359) "for the relief of the heirs of Captain Nehemiah Stokely, deceased." [Objected to by Mr. MILLSON.]

House bill (No. 361) "for the relief of the widow and children of Ezra Chapman, deceased." [Objected to by Mr. MILLSON.]

House bill (No. 362) "for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Joseph Savage, deceased." [Objected to by Mr. MILLSON.]

House bill (No. 363) "for the relief of the heirs of Thomas Parks, deceased." [Objected to by Mr. SKELTON.]

House bill (No. 364) "for the relief of William A. Duer, John Duer, and Beverly Robinson, trustees of the estate of Sarah Alexander, widow of Major General William Alexander, commonly known as Lord Sterling." [Objected to by Mr. HAMILTON.]

Mr. RUSSELL. I move that the committee do now rise.

The question was put; and there were, on a division—ayes 39, noes 41; no quorum voting.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the roll be called. The rule requires it.

The Clerk commenced calling the roll.

Mr. HAVEN. Is it in order to call for tellers?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I submit that it is too late to call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not. The committee found itself without a quorum upon a division, and they have a right to a recount.

Mr. JONES. The Chair announced that the committee had refused to rise; and the committee were proceeding to take up another bill, when the attention of the Chair was called, to the fact that a quorum had not voted. I think it is clearly too late to call for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon that ground the Chair will decide that it is too late. The Clerk will call the roll.

The roll was then called.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. DISNEY) reported that a Committee of the Whole House had, according to order, had the Private Calendar under consideration, and having found itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, and had directed him to report the facts to the House, with the names of the absentees, as follows:

Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Thomas H. Bayly, Ball, Banks, Bell, Bennett, Bissell, Bliss, Brocock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Bugg, Caruthers, Chamberlain, Chase, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Clingman, Cook, Cox, Craige, Cullom, Cumming, Curtis, Cutting, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Dent, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Drum, Dunbar, Dunham, Eastman, Eddy, Edgerton, Edmunds, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Ellison, English, Etheridge, Everhart, Ewing, Fenton, Flagler, Franklin, Fuller, Gamble, Green, Greenwood, Grey, Grow, Andrew J. Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Haven, Hibbard, Hiester, Hill, Hughes, Ingersoll, J. Glancy Jones, Robert Jones, Keitt, Kirtz, Kutz, Lamb, Lane, Lilly, Lindley, Lyon, Macdonald, McQueen, Mace, Maurice, Maxwell, Mayall, Meacham, John G. Miller, Smith Miller, Morrison, Murray, Nichols, Noble, Olds, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Packer, Peck, Bishop Perkins, John Perkins, Powell, Ready, Reese, Richardson, Riddle, Rogers, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Seward, Seymour, Simmons, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Solters, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Stratton, Andrew Stuart, David Stuart, Thurston, Tweed, Walbridge, Walley, Walsh, Warren, Israel Washburn, Westbrook, White, Daniel B. Wright, Hendrick B. Wright, and Yates.

The SPEAKER announced that one hundred and one members—less than a quorum—had answered to their names.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes to four o'clock) the House adjourned until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 24, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was in part read.

Mr. COBB. I understand the Journal is a very long one. I move that the further reading be dispensed with.

By unanimous consent, the motion was agreed to, and the Journal approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a statement prepared by the Register of the Treasury, exhibiting an account of the receipts and expenditures of the United States for the year ending 30th June, 1853, in pursuance of a standing order of the House.

The communication was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The House, while in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, yesterday, passed a number of bills, but the committee, finding itself without a quorum, could not report them to the House. I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole House may be discharged from the further consideration of those bills, and that they may come before the House for their passage. They are the bills which were considered in committee yesterday to which no objection was made.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say to my friend from Indiana, and to the House, that I think those bills which were laid aside in committee yesterday, to be reported to the House, should be considered as having been reported, just as if the committee had reported them regularly; but I hope my friend will allow them to go over for the present, and not call them up for their passage this morning. Let them remain upon the Speaker's table, and come up some other time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It will take but a few minutes to pass them.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am perfectly willing that the bills should pass, every one of them: but it is very important that we should dispose of the civil and diplomatic bill to-day. I hope on Monday next to be able to get up in committee the bill making provisions for carrying out the late Mexican treaty. It is absolutely necessary that that bill should pass before Friday next.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have no doubt that these bills can be disposed of in less time than we have been occupied in talking about them. I hope they will be passed in gross.

The SPEAKER. The committee will be discharged from their further consideration, unless objection be made.

There was no objection; and the bills were brought before the House in gross.

Mr. HILLYER. I rise to a privileged question. I move to reconsider the vote of yesterday, by which Senate bill No. 330, for the relief of José de Luco, &c., was referred to a Committee of the Whole House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's motion to reconsider will be entered. It cannot be considered now in connection with the unanimous order of the House discharging the Committee of the Whole House from the private bills to which no objection was made yesterday. The gentleman can call it up any time afterwards.

Mr. HENDRICKS. At the request of the Speaker, I wish to bring before the House one other matter. In calling the Private Calendar yesterday, House bill (No. 362) for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Savage, was called; but the Clerk, at the moment, could not find the report accompanying it. The report abundantly sustains the case, but merely because it could not be found, though it was among the papers, the bill was passed over. I ask that the report be now read. It is very short; not half a column in length. If there be objection, of course I shall not ask action on the bill. If no objection be made, then I shall ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] made the objection to the bill yesterday.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The objection, I understand, was because there was no report in the case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood, at the time the bill was passed over, that the objection was because there was no report. If there be other objection, the bill of course goes over.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As there seems to be other objection to the bill, I now ask that all the bills to which no amendment has been made, be put on their passage en masse.

The SPEAKER. That course will be pursued, unless objection be made. The titles of the bills will be read, and if any member desires a separate vote on any one, he will rise in his place and say so. First will be considered a bill to which amendment was made.

The Clerk read the title of the first bill, as follows:

House bill (No. 270) "to provide a pension for Captain Thomas Porter."

The amendment of the Committee of the Whole House was read and concurred in, as follows:

Add:

And the amount found due under the provisions of this act shall be paid to the children of the said Captain Thomas Porter.

The question was put on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and there were—ayes 61.

Mr. HAMILTON. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Ewing and Vail were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 99, noes 18.

The Chair voting in the affirmative, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read a third time, and subsequently passed.

The SPEAKER. The following bill is reported with an amendment:

A bill for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont.

The amendment is to insert after the words "Ira Day," the following words: "or his legal representatives."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

The following Senate bills were then taken up, read a third time, and passed:

No. 17. An act to reimburse the Common Council of the city of New York for expenditures made for the first regiment of New York volunteers;

No. 54. An act for the relief of Priscilla C. Simonds;

No. 117. An act for the relief of Moses Olmstead; and

No. 283. An act for the relief of Llewellyn Washington.

The following bill having been also read by its title:

No. 249. An act for the relief of Zadoc C. Ingraham.

Mr. OLDS said: I have one word to say with regard to the Ingraham case. I am reported in the Globe of to-day as having said, yesterday, as follows:

"There is a Senate report somewhere; but if the committee will allow me, I will state the facts of the case in half a dozen words. This is the case of a postmaster who paid over the amount of his postages to the contractor, but the money was stolen. A suit was brought against him, and the amount recovered from him. But since that time it has been proven satisfactorily that the money was stolen. These are the facts of the case. I hope there will be no objection."

Sir, the statement which I made yesterday was not that the money was stolen. The case is this: The postmaster paid over the money to the contractor for carrying the mails, and his vouchers for the payment were sent to the General Post Office, and were burned when the Post Office building was burned, in 1836. A suit was commenced against him, however, for the money, inasmuch as the vouchers were lost. The contractor to whom the money had been paid being dead, the evidence before the committee is from the brother of the contractor, who certifies under oath that the contractor did receive his money. And the petitioner asks to be discharged from this suit against him. This makes a much stronger case than that as reported in the Globe.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Ohio if the contractor was charged with the money in the settlement of the accounts of the Department?

Mr. OLDS. The contractor's account still stands open at the Department. But it is in proof by the brother of the contractor, under oath, that the contractor did receive this money from the postmaster.

Mr. JONES. In what year was the money paid?

Mr. OLDS. I am unable to say now, the Senate report having been mislaid. I believe, however, it was in 1836.

Mr. JONES. And the statement is, that the account is still open at the Post Office Department. I should suppose it would be settled before this time.

Mr. HENN. I would state to the gentleman from Tennessee, that the account has been kept open for this very purpose, of giving the postmaster an opportunity to prove this fact. He has never been able to do it till within the last six months.

Mr. JONES. Then certainly the Department ought to have been able to close the account within six months, if it is proved that the contractor got the money.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading; and was subsequently read a third time, and passed.

The following House bills were then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, were read a third time, and passed:

House bill (No. 269) "to create and provide a pension for David Towle;"

House bill (No. 319) "for the relief of Samuel McKnight, of Kentucky;"

House bill (No. 320) "for the relief of William Wallace, of the State of Illinois;"

House bill (No. 321) "for the relief of George M. Bentley, of the State of Indiana;"

House bill (No. 356) "for the relief of William G. Howison;"

House bill (No. 360) "for the relief of the heirs of Captain Matthew Jack, deceased;"

House bill (No. 365) "for the relief of the heirs of Lot Hall, deceased;" and

House bill (No. 366) "for the relief of the legal representatives of Henry Hoffman."

Mr. HOUSTON. I now hope that the House will resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view to finish to-day the civil and diplomatic bill.

Mr. DISNEY. I ask the gentleman from Alabama to yield to me for a moment. There is a bill in relation to the survey of the public lands of Oregon, which has come back from the Senate with a single amendment. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up that bill, and agree to the amendment.

The title of the bill was reported, as follows:

A bill to amend an act approved September 27, 1850, to create the office of surveyor general of public lands in Oregon, and an act amendatory thereto, approved May 19, 1853.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that that bill is to increase offices. If so, I object to it.

Objection being made, the bill was not taken up.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, the motion to go into Committee upon the Private Calendar takes precedence of the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HENN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, what he proposes to take up in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. HOUSTON. My object is to take up and finish the civil and diplomatic bill, in order that on Monday we may take up the bill to appropriate $10,000,000 to carry out our recent treaty with Mexico.

Mr. McMULLIN. We cannot get through with that bill to-day.

Mr. HOUSTON. We can, easily.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would inquire of the Chair, if we go into Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, will it be objection day, or will discussion be in order?

The SPEAKER. It will not be objection day.

The question being upon Mr. McMULLIN's motion,

Mr. CARUTHERS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PECKHAM and VAIL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 49, a further count not being demanded.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and being taken, the motion was agreed to.

CIVIL AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

The rules were accordingly suspended. The House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. ORR in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1855.

When the committee last rose, Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, had offered the following amendment:

For the completion of the bridge at Little Falls, in the District of Columbia, $75,000: Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended except in fulfillment of a contract which the Secretary of the Interior is hereby required to make, if in his power to do so, for the completion of said bridge for the amount hereby appropriated; and it shall be, and is hereby declared to be, the duty of said Secretary to require the contractor or contractors to give bond with ample security for the fulfillment of his contract.

Mr. SKELTON had moved to amend the same by reducing the appropriation to $38,000, and the pending question was upon the latter amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not propose to make anything like a speech; but there is one part of the amendment of my colleague which I want stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that there is already an amendment pending—one offered by the gentleman from New Jersey—upon which debate is exhausted.

Mr. LETCHER. I thought that the question was taken on the amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. SKELTON's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to strike from the amendment the words "if in his power he can do so."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I accept the gentleman's amendment as a modification of my own.

Mr. McMULLIN. I move to reduce the appropriation to $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, it is at all times unpleasant for me to differ with my colleagues on any question before this committee; but it is more painful for me to differ with my friend than any other colleague of mine upon this floor. It is my desire now to call the attention of the committee to the facts in this case. In the first place, I have, and have had, very grave doubts whether it is the policy of this Government to build this bridge at all; and I doubt very much the policy of recommencing the work now completely prostrate. If it be determined to build a bridge, then I insist that the one suggested is not the proper point.

You have a bridge across the Potomac river now which is called the Long Bridge. There is before Congress a proposition to build a bridge across the same river at Georgetown, the object of which will be to accommodate the traveling community, both by carriage and railroad. This bridge is located some three or four miles above Georgetown. Now, all that will be necessary to accommodate the community will be to construct a turnpike from Leesburg, down alongside the river to a point opposite Georgetown, where the bridge ought to be built. The building of that bridge will then supersede the necessity for the building of this one. Now, I put it to the committee, whether it be the desire to build one or two bridges? I give gentlemen notice to-day, that if my colleague's amendment be adopted for the building of a bridge at Little Falls, very soon they will be called on to provide for the construction of another one opposite Georgetown. I insist that two bridges are not necessary. By building the bridge opposite Georgetown, you will accommodate the travel by the road provided for in my colleague's amendment, and also the travel of Alexandria and the whole South. You must build a bridge to connect the northern and southern railroads. The building of the one at Georgetown will accommodate all interests.

I appeal to my colleague, and more strongly because I look to the interests of his constituents, whether he ought to hesitate a moment to withdraw his amendment, and to let a proposition be introduced for the building of a bridge at Georgetown. Let the citizens of Georgetown extend the turnpike three miles, to that place, and one bridge will accommodate all interests. I hope, if my colleague will not withdraw his amendment, that the committee will vote it down; for, sir, I repeat, you must have a bridge to connect the northern with the southern travel, either at Georgetown or below that point. That place I understand to be the proper and appropriate one for a bridge.

Will the committee, then, under these circumstances, having heretofore purchased this bridge from the company, and having appropriated $30,000 for this purpose, which has been all lost, now appropriate $75,000 more when Congress may in future, as it doubtless will, be called upon to build another bridge at Georgetown? It would be doing injustice to every interest of this great country. I ask you to look at this question in its true character. There ought not to be two opinions upon this subject; and I hope the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. MAY. I hope the amendment proposed by the gentleman who has just taken his seat will not prevail. I think that the one presented by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] deserves the favor of the committee. The site of the bridge at Little Falls is one that has been selected for more than fifty years; and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] is quite mistaken that it is not, by nature, in a favorable position for a bridge. It is the best, in my opinion, within fifty miles above that place, and down to the mouth of the river. The channel of the river is confined there within the narrowest space to be found any where for fifty miles above. The Government, when it agreed to purchase the bridges across the eastern branch of the Potomac, that the communication between this District and Maryland might be free, thought that it would be just to the people of Virginia that the same privilege should be given to them. They accordingly purchased the old suspension bridge which swung across the river at this place. That is the origin of the purchase of this bridge.

Roads constructed at great expense converge to this point upon both sides of the river. The communication to that point has been established by fifty years' use of the bridge; and it will be a most serious disappointment and injury to the people upon both sides of the river if that communication should be interrupted. The Government had undertaken to build this bridge. They purchased it, and it is an act of justice to the people of Virginia, as well as the people of the District, that the communication upon both sides should be free and open. I submit, therefore, whether the Government shall now retreat from this sort of undertaking? Shall an accident, such as happened to this bridge, and which has been explained by the gentleman from Virginia to have been caused by the breaking of a strap of iron, prevent Congress from fulfilling its engagement to complete this work. The gentleman describes the piers as being solid and enduring. I wish to observe, that it is the opinion of a bridge-builder, who, at my instance, went and examined those piers—I speak of Mr. Wendell Bollman, a man of learning, whose opinion is entitled to great weight, and who built the bridges upon the Baltimore and Ohio railroad—that there never was a work more judiciously planned than this bridge. I do trust that the amendment proposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia will be adopted, so that the people of Virginia, residing in that part of the State, may have free access to this city. The position is a good one, and, as I said before, one long selected, and, by a sort of common user, has become the ferry at that point of the river. I trust that the committee will give their support to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLORENCE. I want to offer an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] which I will read as I go along. I do not propose to reduce the appropriation, but to provide how it is to be expended, and how the contract shall be made. It seems to be conceded on all hands that this bridge ought to be built. That seems to be the universal sentiment of the committee; and the only suggestion now which applies most intimately to the minds of all the members here is, that the work shall be satisfactorily performed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will be pleased to state what amendment he proposes.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

For the erection and completion of a bridge near the Little Falls, on the Potomac river, $75,000; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the construction and supervision of the same be placed in charge of a civil engineer of experience and ability, and that the whole cost shall not exceed the amount herein appropriated: a contract to be made with the most responsible bidder after first inviting plans and proposals for thirty days in six or more daily journals of the United States.

Mr. FLORENCE. Mr. Chairman, I submit the amendment without desiring to detain the committee any longer with observations upon it. It is comprehensive; it is clear; it is plain; it guards the Treasury; and it secures the erection of a perfect structure.

Mr. PECKHAM. The difficulty which appears to be in the amendment is, that it orders the contract to be given to the richest man in the community—to “the most responsible.”

Mr. FLORENCE. Well, let the amendment be altered, so as to make the contract be assigned to the best bidder. I meant the most responsible architecturally—professionally the best bidder. And I do not know, after all, but that the most responsible bidder would be the best bidder. It is a matter of very great consequence that the contractor should be a man of responsibility; because if he be not responsible, we have no assurance that the bridge will be properly constructed. I think it was for want of responsibility—mechanical responsibility or skill—that the other structure fell. I therefore desire to present the amendment, and I think if the committee listen to the reading of it again, there will be no objection to its adoption.

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire the attention of the committee for a few minutes, to get the facts fairly before them. As to the correctness of the site for the bridge—as to its being a most advantageous one, as stated by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MAY,] I shall not controvert that point with him. I concede the fact; it is a good site. The river is narrow, and it is a very good place to build the bridge. But that is not the issue which I tender to my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] and to the gentleman from Maryland. What, sir, is the issue? I say that it is better that we should not build a bridge there at all. And why? I say that but one bridge ought to be built from this District to the Virginia shore. I say, further, that the building of a bridge at Georgetown will supersede the necessity of building a bridge at Little Falls. I beg the House to remember that you can construct a bridge at Georgetown, on the aqueduct, which will accommodate, as I before remarked, not only the traveling community which comes from Little Falls, but it will do more; it will accommodate the traveling community of Alexandria, Fredericksburg, Petersburg, and the whole South.

Since I had the floor upon this subject, the other day, I have been informed that various petitions have been presented at the other end of the Capitol, asking the attention of Congress to this subject. Now, sir, I say in my place that you can construct a bridge at Georgetown upon the piers already there, which were built at the expense of the General Government. Over those piers you can construct a bridge which will answer the purposes of the gentleman's constituents, by simply extending the turnpike road. Is Congress prepared for an expenditure of $75,000, when you can save the most of it by constructing two or three miles of turnpike road? Can it make any difference with the people of Fredericksburg, and of all that country, whether they travel on the north side of the river, or go the same distance on the south side?

I beg the learned gentleman from Baltimore [Mr. MAY] to look at the matter as a practical question. Will you build two bridges or one? I am one of those who will not uphold this extravagant system of legislation. And I beg the committee to remember, that if they vote down the amendment now; if the object is just, right, and proper, it will be competent for my worthy, intelligent, and illustrious colleague who offered it, or for his friends, to offer the amendment, and attach it to the bill, in the Senate. But I tell him and the Senate that it is unnecessary.

I hope the committee will vote down his amendment. I have endeavored to show that one bridge only is necessary, and that such bridge must be built. There are constituents of mine who ask the privilege of constructing a railroad from Alexandria to Washington city, the work to be allowed to pass over the Long Bridge. A bridge will be built for that purpose, either by the Government or by private enterprise. But I hope the time will soon arrive when the General Government will cut itself loose from all public improvements. A bridge can be built by private enterprise for one third less than it can be constructed by the Government.

But I repeat, that two bridges are unnecessary. The one at Georgetown is all that is necessary; and if I vote for the amendment at all, it will be for the bridge at Georgetown; but I cannot consistently vote for the amendment offered by my colleague from Virginia.

Mr. FLORENCE. With the consent of the committee, I will modify my amendment, so as to make it read “the best bidder,” instead of “the most responsible bidder.”

Mr. TAYLOR, of Tennessee. I would suggest to the gentleman, that he modify it so as to make it read “the lowest and best bidder.”

Mr. FLORENCE. I will accept that amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. FLORENCE's amendment, and it was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. SMITH's amendment.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. Before the question is taken, I move to amend by increasing the appropriation one dollar.

I move that amendment for the purpose of saying a word upon the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] and in reply to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN.] The gentleman seems to think that a bridge at this point will not be needed, because one can be built at Georgetown more conveniently. Now, sir, a bridge cannot be built at Georgetown without costing at least four or five times as much as will be necessary to build it at the Little Falls. A bridge is needed at this latter place. The people in Virginia, opposite, are in constant communication with the cities of Georgetown and Washington. As was remarked by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. MAY,] they have been accustomed to take this direction for the last forty or fifty years.

If you make the bridge at Georgetown, it will evidently be intended to do away with the one opposite Washington. There are two or three railroads centering at Alexandria, all the travel by which passes up to and over the Long Bridge, to the city of Washington, thence off to various portions of the Union. If you make the bridge at Georgetown, you increase the travel from Alexandria to that place to thirteen miles; whereas, by the Long Bridge, the distance is only six miles.

On the eastern branch of the Potomac the Government has thought proper to buy out two or three bridges located within a mile or two of each other. Why did it buy them out? Because it wanted to make the travel between Maryland and this District convenient—open and without expense. The people of Virginia are as much entitled to this convenience as those of Maryland. The citizens of Washington and Georgetown are as much entitled to convenience in going into Virginia as in going into Maryland.

The Little Falls bridge crosses the river at a point where the distance is only one hundred and twenty feet. It is about three and a half miles above Georgetown. Every part of the structure will be within the District of Columbia, its jurisdiction extending to the other shore. We have a firm and substantial abutment on the Virginia side. Besides, the Government has there two piers now constructed, and which will be a total loss if this site is abandoned. It will be necessary to build two other piers in order to reach the high ground on the Virginia side. I understand that it is intended to erect these two piers, and to put up a wooden structure which can there be made cheaper than at any other point of the river. At Georgetown the distance across the river is four, five, or six times as much, and the cost of the structure will be four, five, or six times as great as the amount now proposed to be appropriated.

I have not the slightest doubt that the appropriation now proposed will meet all the expense of putting up a complete and substantial structure at that point. I think it ought to be done, and I shall vote for it cheerfully.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, but for the original amendment, moved by the gentleman from Virginia. I am also for voting. I think that the committee understand this question very well. It is needless to consume more time on it. I think that the gentleman from Kentucky, who moves to reduce the appropriation, has given us most conclusive reasons why we should not abandon the bridge at Little Falls. I do not suppose that anything I can say will give the committee more information on this subject than it now has. The question simply is, shall we abandon this bridge after the expenditure of so much money? That is the whole question. I take it for granted that the House does not intend to abandon it. I do not think there is a majority for abandoning it. If I did, I would take more time to argue the question. I hope that we may have a vote on the amendment without further discussion.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Tellers were ordered on Mr. SMITH's amendment, and Messrs. HAMILTON and HASTINGS were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 58.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK. I am instructed by the Committee on Agriculture to offer the following amendment:

For the collection of agricultural statistics, and the procurement and distribution of cuttings and seeds, $25,000; to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

I have received a communication from the Commissioner of Patents, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The communication was then read, as follows:

UNITED STATES PATENT OFFICE,
June 21, 1854.

SIR: I understand that the Committee of Ways and Means, in the civil and diplomatic bill, about to be acted upon by Congress, have neglected to provide, as has been the custom heretofore, any appropriation for the collection of agricultural statistics, and the procurement and distribution of cuttings and seeds.

I beg leave to inform you that, in anticipation of such an appropriation, to be expended under the direction of this Bureau, we have already collected much valuable statistical and other agricultural information, intended to be embodied in our next annual report, which, if properly carried into effect, will require additional means.

Should it be the pleasure of Congress that anything should be done in this respect, beyond the reach of the means now at our disposal, a further appropriation will be necessary; and if it be intended to supply, in any reasonable degree, the wants, and to comply with the wishes, of the agricultural portion of the community, it will require an appropriation for that purpose, of not less than $25,000.

I have no doubt that such a sum could be very advantageously employed in furtherance of the general objects of the agricultural branch of this office.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

C. MASON, Commissioner.

To Hon. JOHN L. DAWSON, Chairman of Committee on Agriculture, House of Representatives, United States.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think that there are two points about this amendment on which I ought to say something. In the first place, the letter just read would seem to convey the impression that the Committee of Ways and Means had intentionally neglected to include that appropriation in this bill. It is a singular fact, that notwithstanding the phraseology used by the Commissioner of Patents in that letter, he presented no estimate to the committee for this purpose; although he seems to endeavor to cast upon us the reflection—or what he thinks the reflection—of having omitted or failed to include this appropriation in the bill. But, in truth and in fact, it is entirely a neglect of his own, or of some one else in the Patent Office. No estimate for this was sent to the Committee of Ways and Means; and we are not in the habit of traveling out of estimates, sent from the Departments in one shape or the other, with a view to make appropriations.

There is another thing. The phraseology of this amendment, in its present form, is unusual; and I think it is wrong. Until the deficiency bill which passed the House the other day, we have always appropriated that money out of the Patent Office fund. We did not do it in that deficiency bill, and for the reason that the Patent Office was without funds. But we gave them $10,000 in that bill. We gave them $40,000 or $45,000 to furnish a room in which to keep their models. We have given them from $50,000 to $60,000 in this bill, with a view to enable them to meet these expenses thereafter. That amendment ought to provide that the moneys, appropriated by it, should come out of the Patent Office fund. It is for the next fiscal year; and it is to be presumed, that they will have a Patent Office fund next year out of which to pay these appropriations. We have paid all the deficiencies this year. We have furnished their room for models, which is the first appropriation of the kind that we have ever made. We have done all this, and now it is asked to pay this appropriation out of the Treasury.

Now, I think the proper mode would be to amend the amendment so as to make the appropriation be paid out of the Patent Office fund; and if they have no fund, I think it is time for them to let us know that, and to let us take such steps to supply them as may be necessary. In the mean time, and considering the fact that the appropriations contained in this amendment will not have to be expended until the next fiscal year, I move to amend the amendment by striking out these last words, "out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and insert in lieu thereof the words "out of the Patent Office fund."

Mr. LILLY. I am opposed to the amendment to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] for the reason that he has already given. He says this money should come out of the Patent Office fund. Now, I am opposed to any such amendment. I am opposed to the great agricultural interests of this country being made to play second-fiddle to any other interest. Take this appropriation from the funds of the Patent Office, and you tax the mechanics and inventors of this country for the benefit of the farmers, although it is very little that they get from this Government. Again, he says the money will not be wanted until after the expiration of the present fiscal year. Now, the great object of having this appropriation made now is, that they can predicate upon it their conduct and calculations in reference to purchasing these seeds, and in order that they can get and distribute them within the fiscal year, as they ought to do, and in order that we may not have to supply a deficiency for this object in the next deficiency bill. I think the proposition a reasonable one, and that the Patent Office can expend this money with great benefit to the country. If it is appropriated now, out of the general fund, the Commissioner of Patents can go on and make his contracts for these seeds with more confidence, and at a greater advantage, than he can do if we fail to appropriate it. I hope, therefore, that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama will not prevail, but that the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan will be adopted.

The question was then taken upon the amendment to the amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. BENSON. I move to increase the amount contained in the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLARK] five dollars.

I make that motion, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of saying a word in reply to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] as well as maintaining the importance of a liberal appropriation for the object under consideration. It is well known that there is a large number of the members of this House who believe that something more ought to be granted to the great interest of agriculture than what is obtained as a sort of—

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) I rise to a point of order. It is, that the gentleman is talking about the propriety of buying the seed, and not to the importance of buying five dollars' worth more, as proposed in his amendment.

Mr. BENSON. I will endeavor to keep as near to the line of propriety, in my remarks, as the gentleman usually does, and as near to my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman should keep as near to the explanation of the necessity of his amendment as he can. Some latitude has been heretofore allowed; but the gentleman will see the necessity of confining himself to his amendment.

Mr. BENSON. I take it, that if my argument goes to show the necessity of expending the amount proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, together with the addition which I propose, it will be pertinent and in order.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is enough to say that there are those, and they are numerous, in this House who believe we ought to expend at least the sum which is proposed by the gentleman from Michigan, together with the sum which I have proposed to add thereto, in the advancement of this great interest. Sir, I believe the judgment of the country is, that there ought to be a separate and distinct Department of the Government devoted to the cause of agriculture. And it is not a new idea. Washington presented it in his various messages while he was President of the United States; and in March, 1797, writing to Mr. Sinclair, says:

"I am sorry to add, that nothing final in Congress has been decided respecting the institution of a national board of agriculture, recommended by me at the opening of the session. I think it highly probable that next session will bring this matter to maturity."

From that day almost every President of the United States has presented the distinct proposition that there ought to be, in behalf of the great interest of agriculture, a department peculiar and devoted to it. But all that agriculture has yet received, is simply that which it gets as a sort of adjunct to the Patent Office.

Allow me to say, however, that the agricultural part of the Report of the Patent Office is a valuable contribution in aid of this great cause. It is a document which is more demanded by my constituents, and by almost every agricultural portion of the country, than any document which is published by the order of this House. And, sir, it seems to me that we ought not to be dependent upon any particular fund, such as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] suggests, contingent in its character, to furnish the necessary means for supplying the information to give value to the only book which is peculiarly interesting to the farmers of the country.

It should be a separate and distinct fund. I think we ought to expend at least the amount asked for in the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan; and if we spend more than that, I will venture to say our constituents will not find fault with us for that, whatever they may do in reference to buying Hickey's Constitution, valuable as that is, and various other publications which we are scattering broadcast over the land. Let us do something for this interest. Let us adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, and I will not ask for more.

Mr. BENSON. I will now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the amendment being withdrawn. I have no objection at all to making the usual allowance from the Patent Office fund for the purpose specified in this amendment; but I do object to saddling the Patent Office, the Post Office, and every other Department of the Government, upon the National Treasury, and thereby creating the necessity for keeping up the tariff, and preventing a reduction of the duties. I find that those men who are the most interested in the passage of such propositions as this, are generally men who belong to the tariff party; that they are generally those who are the most interested in keeping up a high protective tariff.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman that he must confine himself to opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. LETCHER. I am confining myself to that amendment. I resist that amendment upon the ground, and for the reason, that it is throwing additional burdens upon the general Treasury, and thereby creating a necessity for imposing high tariff duties upon the people. It strikes me that that is a perfectly legitimate and fair mode of argument in opposing the amendment of the gentleman from Maine. I say I object to measures of this kind being resorted to for the purpose of keeping up the necessity of a high tariff, to prevent our reducing the duties upon imports.

Now, sir, so far as those expenditures are concerned, let the Patent Office pay them out of its own fund. Let those who come here with their inventions pay for these expenses out of the funds which they have contributed. I have no objection to this allowance being made out of that fund, to be expended in this way, or in any other way which Congress may think proper. I repeat, sir, that I hope the burdens of this expenditure will be borne by the Patent Office itself, and that that Department will not be saddled too upon the general Treasury.

Mr. BENSON, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

The question then recurred upon the amendment offered by Mr. CLARK; and being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EWING. I presume this is a very good place to offer an amendment, which I hold in my hand.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It seems to me this is rather an irregular way of proceeding. I think it will be better if the gentleman will allow the miscellaneous items contained in the bill to be read before he offers his amendment. We have commenced offering these general amendments at the head of the miscellaneous class of items contained in the bill.

Mr. EWING. If the Committee of Ways and Means think that, it would be prettier at the bottom, very well. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I move to strike "$200" from the following:

For compensation of inspectors of said penitentiary, (penitentiary of the District of Columbia,) $300, —and to insert as follows:

Seven hundred and fifty dollars; and that the proviso contained in the act making appropriations for the support of Government, approved 12th August 1848, whereby the salary of the inspectors was reduced, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. Chairman, I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report that amendment to this committee. The facts are briefly these: A number of years ago a law was passed, embracing among other things the appointment of inspectors for the penitentiary of this District, fixing the salary of each at $250, and imposing on them some very considerable duties. The compensation was not an extravagant one. In the civil and diplomatic bill of 1848 a provision was inserted, reducing the compensation of these inspectors to $100 each. That is the proviso which the amendment proposes to repeal. On the representations made to the committee of the character of the duties of these gentlemen, we thought that $250 a year to each was not an exorbitant salary. It is therefore proposed to restore the original salary. The law originally gave them $750, or $250 each.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like very much to have some information in regard to this penitentiary. There are some $9,000 appropriated each year to keep up that institution. I should like to know whether the convicts are supported in ease and comfort, or whether they are required to labor? I think that they ought to be made to work out a considerable part of the expense. I hope the committee may not adopt the amendment.

A MEMBER. The expense of the penitentiary is $12,000.

Mr. SEWARD. I am told that the expense of the institution is $12,000. If this penitentiary is getting to be such a great tax on the Government we had better abolish it.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. I cannot answer the gentleman. I cannot give him a detailed account of the management of the institution. Our attention was not directed to that. Our attention was only directed to the character of the duties which these inspectors had to perform, and the amount of their compensation. We were satisfied the amount proposed in the amendment was proper. The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer the following amendment:

For payment to the city of Norfolk, for rent of rooms in the City Hall by the district court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia, from the 30th of May, 1850, to the 30th of May, 1853, $900.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EWING. I offer the following amendment:

For mileage and per diem to William Carr Lane, for contesting the seat of the Delegate from New Mexico, $2,868 80.

I presume that, with a brief explanation, there will be no objection to the amendment. I have been instructed by the Committee of Elections, and, I believe, if I am not mistaken, with perfect unanimity, to report in favor of paying mileage and per diem to William Carr Lane for contesting the seat of the Delegate from New Mexico. I have been advised that the point in the bill which we are now considering is as good a place as I could find to offer the amendment. The Committee of Elections unanimously, or, perhaps, with but one dissenting voice, reported against allowing the seat to Governor Lane. I myself concurred in the report of the majority of the committee, believing that the sitting member was entitled to his seat. At the same time, however, that the committee believed this, there was at all events plausible ground amply sufficient to justify Governor Lane in contesting the seat. There were great irregularities—irregularities which, perhaps, ought to be overlooked in a new Territory, recently organized like that of New Mexico, comprising such a population as it does. I say, that there were great irregularities in the election, but there was no proof to satisfy us that there was fraud in any case; and we felt bound, under the decisions of the courts, to decide against the petitioner.

The committee are well aware that it is important to pay the expenses of the contestants of seats upon this floor, in order to preserve the purity of elections, and guard the rights of the people and their Representatives. No man is willing to come here from such a remote constituency as that of New Mexico at very great expense, with his case prepared at still greater expense, and remain here awaiting the action of the House at an additional expense; for we all know what it costs to live at hotels here, and it is bad enough with the per diem. It cannot be expected that a poor man would, and I know that a rich man would not, be willing—after going through the canvass, and perhaps incurring expenses there—to prepare his case, come to this great distance, neglect his business, and pay his board here, to contest a seat here. It is on that principle that we recommend this appropriation, and I simply wish to remind the committee that it has always justified and induced the House to appropriate money to pay for the mileage and per diem of a contesting member. With this brief explanation, I presume the committee will hardly object to the amendment, although I see my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] rising to oppose it. [A laugh.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am opposed to this amendment, as I have been to every one of a similar character since I have been here. I have one rule on which I act on subjects of this kind, and from which I do not vary. It is this: that when a contestant succeeds in ousting the sitting member, I will vote to pay him the mileage and per diem up to that time, whether he succeeds in establishing his own right to the seat or not. But I cannot vote to pay any contestant who has failed to satisfy the House that the sitting member is not entitled to his seat.

[Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky. I propose to amend the amendment by increasing the appropriation one dollar.

I desire to remark, Mr. Chairman, that this is a rather peculiar case, and one which does not ordinarily occur. When Colonel Lane left the Territory of New Mexico to come to Washington and claim a seat on this floor as the Delegate of that Territory, he certainly felt that he was the rightfully and legally elected Delegate. The election returns that were then in the office of the Secretary of the Territory showed that he had a large majority of the votes returned. The certificate, however, was given to Señor GALLEGOS; or rather a complex sort of certificate was given to him, not deciding the right of either party to the seat. But as the certificate was given to Señor GALLEGOS, Colonel Lane felt it to be his duty to contest the election at the instance of the people of the Territory. He did give notice to Señor GALLEGOS of his intention to contest his seat; and he authorized his agent in New Mexico to take testimony in the case, before he left the Territory to come to the States. Subsequently, however, additional returns were sent to the Secretary's office. These additional returns were sent in time, not exactly according to the requirements of the law, but really within the limitation allowed by law. And I suppose they were sent to the Secretary at the expense of the Government, and that he had authority to send out and get a correct report, the provisions of the law not having been complied with. Those additional returns to the Secretary changed the whole character of the matter, and, instead of showing that Governor Lane was entitled to a seat, it showed that Señor GALLEGOS was. There was no fraud in the transaction, and no attempt to show fraud. There was a clear and undoubted expression of the whole people in favor of GALLEGOS, and of course he was, by the action of this House, permitted to take his seat here.

But Governor Lane, when he left the Territory and came here, believed that he was justly entitled to the seat; and the returns, for the time being, showed that he was entitled to it. I am satisfied that he came to Washington in good faith; and I think, under those circumstances, he is entitled to his mileage and per diem.

Mr. EWING. I wish to inquire of the gentleman whether Governor Lane does not stand upon the same footing as those, in many other cases, where mileage and per diem have been allowed?

Mr. STANTON. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. EWING. The committee will remember that if the grounds upon which his election stood had been as he supposed they were, he would have been occupying a seat here, and receiving mileage and per diem. But the facts turned out to be different from what he supposed.

Mr. SEWARD. I put myself to some trouble to examine the returns of that election, and I am unable to see any plausible ground upon which Colonel Lane could claim a right to a seat upon this floor. In truth, the whole ground of his objection to the election of his opponent was based upon a legal technicality, and that was, that the poll books were not properly kept and certified to under the laws of New Mexico.

My objection to this amendment is, that it is setting a bad precedent. If I believed that the seat was contested in good faith, I would vote for the appropriation; but the whole ground upon which he based his claim to a seat upon this floor was flimsy and technical.

Mr. STANTON, of Kentucky, (interrupting.) The gentleman will allow me to say that the exception taken to the poll books was not taken until after General Lane had left the Territory and had arrived here.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, it was the duty of that gentleman to have received a certificate of his election from the proper authority before he left for Washington; and if he came here in advance of the fact of his election being ascertained, he did so on his own responsibility.

Let us examine this question. Here is a gentleman who was occupying a public position in New Mexico, and his business in connection with that position called him to Washington. Now, it was very convenient for him, under such circumstances, to contest the election of his opponent, and set up a claim for mileage and per diem. The practice of allowing such claims is a bad one; and in all our Territories the same condition of things may arise hereafter from the unsettled state they are in, their sparseness of population, and the want of well-settled laws of election; and if this claim is allowed, others will come here, from time to time, and set up a claim for mileage and per diem whenever there is any ground, however slight, to justify it.

Furthermore, when the matter was under investigation before the committee, it was with difficulty that we could get him before the Committee to attend to it; and the House will remember, that after the committee had decided upon the case, and reported upon it to the House, he did not trouble himself to contest the right of his adversary when the report was made, and that we heard nothing of his claim for several days afterwards. I think the chairman of the Committee of Elections himself opposed a suspension of the rules for the purpose of introducing a resolution to pay Mr. Lane his per diem and mileage when the attempt was made in the House, and I do not think I can be mistaken when I say that at that time a majority of that committee were opposed to paying this gentleman his per diem and mileage.

Mr. STANTON, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HUNT. I move to increase the amount ten dollars.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] says he desires to maintain his consistency—that he has always acted in opposition to the allowance of such claims. Sir, I desire this House, on the other hand, to maintain its consistency, and to continue the liberal policy it has heretofore pursued in cases like the present. I desire that the representatives of the people should uphold that policy as a means of preserving the purity of the elective franchise. I desire them to keep the door open for the proper investigation by this House of contested elections, and especially not to shut it against poor men who cannot afford to come here and press their claims and the claims of the people, when they know that, in the event of not succeeding, the expenses of the contests must fall exclusively upon themselves.

Mr. Chairman, I had the honor of forming an acquaintance this winter with Governor Lane in this city; and I take great pleasure in saying, that I found him a high-minded, honorable gentleman, of singular modesty, and delicacy of feeling. Sir, he never presented a petition for pay and mileage to this House. The present motion originates in the sense of justice of members; and I hope the House will feel it its duty to adopt it.

I do not propose to go into the question of the justice of Governor Lane's claim to a seat upon this floor. The Committee of Elections determined, and I have no doubt justly, that he was not entitled to a seat. But the same committee, thoroughly acquainted with all the circumstances under which he appeared before the House, have reported that he is entitled to the per diem and mileage usually allowed in cases of contested elections.

Mr. SEWARD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that, as one of the members of the Committee of Elections, I never acceded to such a proposition.

Mr. HUNT. I did not say that the honorable gentleman acquiesced in this report. I stated merely that the committee had reported in favor of the allowance.

Mr. EWING. If the gentleman from Louisiana will allow me, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia, that I was under the impression he had given his assent to this proposition. I was told that I was instructed unanimously to report it; and I presume the opinion of the committee is unanimous, with the exception of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HUNT. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. MILLER,] who had charge of this matter when it was before the House, is not now in his seat; and I will, therefore, add for him, that Governor Lane did not come here of his own motion, or for any private purposes of his own, but that he came at the instance of the people of New Mexico, and for a public purpose. Not, sir, to demand pay and mileage, but to insist, bona fide, upon what he and those who sent him here believed to be due to him and to them—his right to a seat on this floor. He came here under the honest impression that he had been elected by the votes of the American portion, usually, if not properly, so called, of the people of New Mexico, over the gentleman who received the votes of the Pueblo Indians—a gentleman who does not speak our language, and who does not choose to sit here among us. He came here to contest his right to a seat upon this floor as an act of justice to the people; and, as an act of justice to that people, I hope this House will accede to the proposition to give him his per diem and mileage.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I am very well acquainted with Dr. Lane, and have been for some thirty years. He has been an acquaintance, but not a political friend. I saw him frequently when he was here last winter; and I believe that he acted towards me as he did towards most of the other members of Congress, which was not to importune or to annoy them with his applications for a seat here. I do not think that it ought to be brought up in judgment against any man that he did not annoy us with applications. God knows we get enough of them all around! We should rather be thankful when any one will spare us, and be more disposed to do what is right for them.

I had no particular acquaintance with this case until it arrived here. I presented the memorial and papers of the sitting Delegate from New Mexico at his request. All the knowledge I have of the subject has been derived from the newspapers of New Mexico, and reports and information from that Territory during the time the election was in progress, and after it had finished. We are neighbors to Santa Fe—only twelve or fifteen hundred miles apart. There being nobody between, we are neighbors, and we can talk of each other's affairs. Well, sir, from all I saw during the time the canvass was going on, and after it was finished, I thought that Governor Lane had a fair claim to the seat. I do not say that it was better than the other, but it was fair; and, really, it seemed to me, from all I saw and heard from the Territory, that it was the better one of the two.

The question seems now to turn principally on this: Is Dr. Lane asking this in good faith? Did he come on in good faith? Or was it a mere pretense to cover a different purpose? That is the question to which the case is narrowed down. With respect to that, it seems to me to all turn on that point. I will say, in the first place, that having known Governor Lane long, I hold him to be incapable, personally incapable, of acting in that manner. So much for his character.

Then with respect to the circumstances of the case. From all that I saw in the newspapers of the country when the canvass went on—and I saw all the papers, English and Spanish—and from all I heard, I thought he had a fair claim to the seat. I do not say better than the other, but fair; and really, I thought he would be most apt to get it.

Mr. HUNT, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment.

The question recurred on Mr. Ewing's amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. TAYLOR of Ohio, and PACKER, were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 75, noes 54.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I offer the following amendment:

For continuing the aqueduct for bringing water into the city of Washington, agreeably to the plan adopted by the President of the United States, according to the provisions of the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1853, $500,000.

Some time since I addressed the committee at length upon the subject of this aqueduct. It had previously been discussed in Committee of the Whole upon another occasion. I do not intend now to enter into the merits of the case, or the necessities for such a measure. In the first place, the amendment calls for the appropriation of $500,000 in order to continue a work already begun, and well begun—to continue a work authorized by the act of Congress approved the 3d of March, of last year—to continue a work whose establishment was to depend upon the approval of the President of the United States, which approval this work has already received. A considerable portion of the work has been accomplished, and a large appropriation made for the continuance of the work.

It is therefore deemed appropriate at this time to ask for this sum, that the work may be prosecuted towards a conclusion as soon as possible. It is not necessary for me to represent to the committee an argument which has been already enforced upon them—that the United States Government is very deeply concerned in the prosecution and early completion of this work, so far as regards the preservation and safety of their public buildings, and the repositories of their papers, on the security of which so much depends, as a matter of individual rights, as a matter of individual convenience, and, let me add, in addition to that, as a matter of public propriety. Why, sir, millions of dollars have been lost to claimants by the destruction of one or two of the departments of the Government by fire. It cannot be denied that at certain times this Government has been compelled to pay perhaps millions of dollars on improper claims, merely because they were unable to produce that testimony which would have shown that they had been paid.

We require, therefore, some sufficient means to preserve from the destructive element all the records of this nation, all the archives of this country, which are hereafter to be our vouchers for moneys paid, or the vouchers of our constituents for moneys claimed. The health of the people, our own convenience, and all these circumstances, will impress themselves on every individual as they may view the subject. No man can be insensible to this. But I wish to impress upon the minds of this committee, and to ask them to consider the fact, that this work was begun by the authority of an act of Congress; that the plans were referred for approval to the President of the United States; that he did approve the plan that has been adopted; and that the money appropriated last year has been expended in the prosecution of this plan; and that, as a matter of course, the season for contracts was not allowed to pass without providing the ways and means to continue the work; bricks, stone, laborers, and all the appliances necessary to carry on such a work, when the appropriation should have been made. I did expect, and others expected, that this appropriation would have been granted in a former bill; but this matter was not deemed to be in order in it. It is now presented again. It is presented, I presume, in the confidence that it cannot escape this committee; that such a measure is as absolutely necessary to the preservation of our national archives as it is to the convenience and comfort of the national representatives. The objections that have been urged to this appropriation are, it appears to me, irrelevant. I will not meet them now, because I cannot imagine that they will be pressed on this House at the present time. The simple question is as to the appropriation; the mode of disbursing it will be a matter for after consideration.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I am opposed to this appropriation, for the reason that the plan adopted, and the work projected, is of the most extravagant and unnecessary character. It is the most magnificent that could have been devised.

It proposes to bring into the city of Washington no less than sixty-odd millions of gallons of water per day; when, at the present time, in the city of London, with two and a half millions of inhabitants, only forty-seven millions of gallons are supplied daily. In the city of New York I am told that only about forty millions of gallons are brought per day. But into the city of Washington, with forty or forty-five thousand inhabitants, it is proposed to bring a daily supply of sixty millions of gallons.

Now, sir, if gentlemen will examine into the particulars of the report, they will find that the military engineer in charge of this work proposes to use, or rather, I suppose, he would have to use, fifty-nine sixtieths of that water for manufacturing purposes. It is not so stated in terms in the report; but the appropriation of the water to manufacturing purposes is distinctly pointed out; and it must be used for that purpose, or it must be wasted. I have been informed—whether correctly or not I cannot say—that, should this water be brought in the quantity proposed, the portion of it which could be disposed of for manufacturing purposes would provide a water power equal to that at the city of Lowell. The statement may be exaggerated; but, sir, one of the gentlemen who has examined into this subject, Colonel Hughes, the engineer who made a survey some years ago, states that the highest quantity of water proposed to be furnished to each individual inhabitant, in any city in the world, is thirty gallons a day. At that rate, for the present population of the city of Washington, only one million two hundred thousand gallons per day would be required.

Now, we propose to provide water in so liberal a manner that it will supply a population more than sixty times as large as that of the city of Washington. What are we doing? What are we thinking of? If you will appoint a board of engineers to examine the report of Mr. Meigs in reference to these water-works, I venture to say that it will be shown conclusively that the establishment which he proposes to build cannot be built for three times the amount which he has estimated. But even if it could be built for the sum proposed, that is at least ten times as much as the Government ought to expend for the people of Washington and Georgetown together, and a hundred times as much as the Government ought to provide for its own use.

Mr. McMULLIN. Will the gentleman inform the House whether the original plan of iron pipes would furnish a sufficient quantity of water for the city, or not?

Mr. STANTON. I can tell the gentleman that that was the plan to bring the water from Rock Creek, which is purer than that of the Potomac, and that an abundance could be supplied for a population five times as great as that of Washington city, and that the whole cost would be less than a million of dollars, while the probability is that the plan under discussion will cost eight or ten times as much.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move to increase the amount proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania $100,000.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. STANTON] argues that this plan which has been adopted by the President of the United States, pursuant to the law of the last Congress, is upon too extravagant a scale, and will bring too much water into the city. I do not know what plans were submitted to the President, nor do I know how far he exercised a wise judgment in coming to his conclusion; but, for one, I am inclined to believe that, whether right or wrong, we should not go behind that decision.

So far as the bringing of too much water into the city is concerned, if that is considered any objection, I am against the gentleman from Tennessee. You cannot have too much. I want no Lowell privileges here for manufacturing purposes, but I want a plenty of water, good water, and pure water, and I should not care if the entire stream of the Potomac were turned into the city. I would not care if its whole current were turned, to-day, in the city; and if it were, it would not be too much to wash out the filthy streets and lanes, alleys and avenues, we see around us. I want an abundance of water. We cannot have too much; there is no danger of error on that side.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the facts connected with the history of this matter.

At the last session of Congress we adopted the following provision in the appropriation bill:

"To be expended under the direction of the President of the United States, for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington, upon such plans, and from such places, as he may approve, $100,000: Provided, That if the plan adopted by the President of the United States should require water to be drawn from any source within the limits of Maryland, the assent of the Legislature of that State should first be obtained."

Upon the adoption of that provision the President of the United States, in pursuance of the authority given him, accepted the plan which he considered the best one. All the plans were before him. He exercised the power conferred on him doubtless to the best of his ability and judgment. The gentleman from Tennessee is opposed to that plan approved by the President.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will allow me, I will ask him if he is in favor of bringing into the city of Washington thirty or forty millions gallons of water per day for manufacturing purposes?

Mr. STEPHENS. Certainly not.

Mr. STANTON. Well, sir, that is included in the project.

Mr. STEPHENS. Well, sir, I do not know what may be in the project, but this plan was accepted by the President of the United States.

Mr. STANTON. The report of Captain Meigs contains this among the other items of the project.

Mr. STEPHENS. Well, sir, I do not propose to go into the particular merits or demerits of either of the plans or projects; these were all before the President, to whom Congress submitted the matter. The gentleman objects to the one adopted by the President, because it provides too much water. I repeat, that I do not care if it brings the broad Potomac itself into the city. I do not care how many gallons, or how many millions of gallons, it brings. The whole river, in my opinion, would not be too much. But we gave the President the power to adopt a plan. He has done it, and I am bound to believe he acted as wisely and prudently with all the facts before him, as we could have done, or can now do. I have no evidence to the contrary. No man has risen to impeach the integrity of the President, or that of the engineer. Well, then, what are we to do? Are we to undertake to decide anew upon these several conflicting plans? I say no; go on and complete the work according to the plan decided upon. Let us go on and provide the necessary means for carrying it into effect, and supplying the city with the greatest abundance of water at the cheapest rates, and in the most practicable way. From the Great Falls it will cost very little more to bring a large supply than a small one. And when the supply is furnished, I care not whether the surplus, after the legitimate wants of the city are satisfied, be used for manufacturing purposes or not. If this additional advantage will accrue from the larger supply from the Great Falls at a small increase of cost, it is no objection, in my opinion, to the plan adopted by the President.

Mr. SMITH, of New York. The honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] said, "Go on!" I say, stop! I have not risen to oppose this plan, or to advocate any other. I have nothing to say in disparagement of deriving the water from the Potomac; and nothing to say in praise of deriving it from Rock Creek. I am opposed to the execution by the Government of any plan, whatever, for supplying this city with water.

In my judgment, sir, we are on the threshold of a vast expenditure of money. Government had better retrace its steps than go forward. If it goes forward, it will find itself involved, not only in a great loss of money, but in difficulties that will call for legislation, and that will consume much of the costly time of Congress. And that it will find its execution of the work the occasion of no little corruption to itself and to others, is what all experience in such matters teaches us to expect.

This work can be done, and be kept in repair, by individual enterprise, at one half the expense it would be to Government. Why, then, should it not be entrusted to individual enterprise? Let Government offer half a million, or, if proper, a million of dollars, to the responsible association that shall undertake to supply the city with water, and the offer will be promptly accepted. But it is said, that there is not enterprise enough among the people of this city to get up such an association—not wealth enough to accomplish the object of it. I think better, however, than this of both the enterprise and ability of the people of Washington. But if either will not, or cannot, do the work, there are Yankees enough who will; and not only Yankees enough, but people enough in every part of the country, who will do it.

Of course, I would have Government require, in return for its grant to the proposed association, the fullest liberty to use the water for all possible governmental purposes. And I would have Government prescribe the general plan of the work—at least, some of its main features.

I hardly need say that I am willing, more than willing, to have Government pay for the water in full proportion to the value of its buildings and their precious contents, and to the value of its various great interests here, among which is the importance of preserving the health of its numerous servants collected here. Indeed, I would have Government bear more than such proportion of the expenses for the common welfare of the city. It is the misfortune of our nation that its capital is in the midst of a people who cannot be a self-subsisting people. To a great extent Government must ever carry and sustain the people of this city.

I am not of the number of those who think it would have been unwise to establish the capital in one of our great seats of commerce. A people who support themselves are quite as virtuous and intelligent and safe a people as are they who lean largely upon others for their living.

But it is said, that if Government does this work it will derive a great income from it. I do not believe that it will derive any income from it. It will be too much out of harmony with its dignity for Government to be peddling water. If Government does the work, the people of this city will never be taxed for their water. The whole tax, in that case, will rest upon the whole people of the country. You might as well expect that Government should erect toll-gates on the bridges it owns around this city, and stop passengers for their pennies, as expect that it will descend to the little business of selling or leasing water.

This city should be supplied with water, both abundantly and speedily; and, as I have said, I am willing to have Government contribute liberally toward the expense of it; but its contribution must be in a way consistent with the office of Government. Not for the sake of doing any good may Government exceed its province. Government may do nothing that its citizens can do; least of all may it do anything that they can do better than it can.

I love the city of Washington. I love it, because it was founded by the greatest of all great names. I love it, because it does itself wear that greatest name. I love it, because it is the capital of our nation—the seat of Government of our beloved country. I love it for its great natural beauty, that marks every part of this broad and magnificent amphitheater; and all the more do I love it because this beauty is heightened by the embellishments of art. It is true there are two plague-spots upon its health—two blemishes and blot upon its beauty—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, then, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HAMILTON. I move to increase the appropriation five dollars.

Mr. Chairman, I deem it my duty to speak in behalf of this appropriation for many reasons. It is entitled to my support and advocacy, not only because of the past action of Congress, but because of the great necessity for the work. It is needless for me, at this day, to urge the necessity for water in this city. Every member knows and can appreciate it. Your public buildings and grounds, your dusty streets and filthy gutters, all strongly attest it. If a member, even in this city, magnificent as it is claimed to be, takes a walk from the Capitol gate to the Treasury building, he is met and sickened each step by most foul and disgusting odors from accumulating filth along the avenue.

While upon this point, I cannot avoid condemning the city authorities for the manner in which they allow the avenue to be left. But yet, without water, how can it be cleansed, and how can your parched public gardens be refreshed? Go down to the pool near the western front of this Capitol, where rises a monument dedicated to the heroic bravery of your seamen in the Mediterranean, and see the filthy water there, hardly able to subsist a hundred fish, and trickling down as if water drops were as scarce as diamonds. We should have water here, either by authority of the United States or by the City authorities. It is a disgrace that the capital of this Republic, containing as it does a population of forty thousand inhabitants, should not be better supplied with water, that indispensable necessity of life. Who should supply the city with it? If not the inhabitants, who? If not Congress, who?

Two years ago Congress solemnly passed a law authorizing surveys to be made for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington. A committee of conference, of which my honorable friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] was a member, agreed to the proposition, and it passed both Houses. After that survey had been made, and after an examination of the three plans which were submitted, Congress agreed to appropriate $100,000 to supply the city with water. I was astonished at the remarks made by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] the other day, when he said that this House would have recoiled from making this appropriation of $100,000, if they had known what the plan was. The honorable gentleman from Kentucky must know that that plan was before the Senate, this House, and the country; and that it was discussed at great length. As a member of this House I voted against the commencement of these water-works, upon the ground that they would cost the amount enumerated in the plan. The work was commenced, and the honorable gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] upon that committee of conference, ratified the action of Congress. We made an appropriation of $100,000, and entered into a contract with parties for constructing these works, and shall we now abandon the work, and lose all we have expended? The city cannot long remain without water. If the city authorities bring it here we shall have to pay more than $300,000 for the use of the water.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was a member of the committee of conference to which the gentleman from Maryland alludes. I voted, as it was well known throughout, against the appropriation for these water works. But being overruled in the committee of conference, I did sustain the report of the committee in the House, because it was during the closing hours of Congress, when we had not time, if the bill to which that appropriation had been attached had been defeated, to originate a new one, pass it, and keep up the wheels of Government. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maryland, if he supposed at that time that the appropriation for the completion of these works would run up to some six millions of dollars? No. We made an appropriation that was intended to authorize surveys, and then the authority was given to the President to make a selection of a plan, but so far as I was concerned, and I presume the same is true of every member of this House at that time, I did not suppose that we were to pay $3,000,000 or $6,000,000 for the completion of these works. Because I sustained the bill in which the appropriation of $100,000 was made, I would like to know why the gentleman from Maryland need refer to me as sustaining the course he sees fit now to pursue. If the gentleman has other grounds for his support of this appropriation, he had better occupy these other grounds. He does not go for a bill or for an appropriation, simply because I have recommended it. His votes here show that he selects bills and appropriations for himself. And if my honorable friend from Maryland is now disposed to go for this appropriation, I put it to him that he ought to place his support of it on its own merits, if it has any, and not take shelter under any report of a conference committee of this House.

Mr. HAMILTON. It is a high sanction.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir, it is a high sanction; and I wish the gentleman to consider that high sanction on other occasions. I shall remind him, doubtless, before the session expires, of occasions when he will have an opportunity of taking shelter under that high sanction for the purpose of stopping some of these improper appropriations.

Mr. Chairman, this plan that has been selected is, in my opinion, an injudicious one. I think it is wrong. Believing so, I feel just as much at liberty to vote against it as if I had voted for it as an original proposition, which I did not do. I endeavored to defeat it before. But when it was put in above my head, so that I could not resist it, I then sustained the bill containing it, as I the other day sustained the bill in which the appropriations for the custom-houses were contained. I do not feel at liberty, when it was put in one of the leading appropriation bills of Congress at the expiring hour of the session, to give up that bill simply because the conference committee saw fit to put in an appropriation to which I objected. My duty is to get the appropriation bills passed. I believed it was wrong to include this appropriation; but when a majority of the members of the House put it in over my opposition, was it then for me, occupying the position which I do in the Committee of Ways and Means, to use the power in my hands to wreck and destroy the bill, and to bring confusion to the administration of the Government? No, sir. If I had chosen to defeat one of those bills, which have been loaded down with appropriations other than those recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means, I presume that, having the management of it, I would have had twenty modes by which I could have accomplished that end, almost in defiance of a majority of the House. But I did not feel at liberty to use the power which I possessed in such a way.

And although this bill is loaded down with appropriations to which I may object, though I may doubt the expediency or propriety of granting them, I shall not feel at liberty to wreck the bill, or endeavor to have it defeated, and thereby deprive the Government of the means of carrying on the administration, simply because a majority of the members of the House did not agree with me in my view of the propriety or expediency of this appropriation.

Mr. HAMILTON, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BARRY. Mr. Chairman, there have been several propositions made with reference to this amendment. I now move to amend by increasing the appropriation five dollars.

This particular plan, which we are discussing, has been adopted. There are other plans which the advocates and friends of them desired to have adopted instead of this. It is a matter of fact that there never has been a plan adopted against which the friends and supporters of rejected contesting plans have not waged bitter war until the last moment of the completion of the work. It is a consequence in the nature of man; it is the consequence of disappointed pride, disappointed avarice, disappointed ambition. And the outside opposition to this particular plan—I do not, of course, speak of the opposition in these Halls—the outside opposition, has originated with men who had plans of their own, which were fairly made, fairly considered, and as fairly rejected. And when we consider the influence which ought to be attached to opposition from that quarter, when we recollect the source from whence it has come—though I do not impeach the integrity or honesty of the opposition within these walls—we ought to make liberal allowance for the fact that this judicious work is opposed and contested by disappointed persons.

Now, sir, as I have stated before, there were several plans proposed, which I shall not discuss; but I want to allude to several objections which are made to this particular plan. One was made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. STANTON.] He thinks he knows of a plan which, he says, will not cost more than a million of dollars. Now, to judge his estimates upon the same principle that he judges the estimates of others—for he says this work will cost three times the amount of the estimate, and you are to judge him in the same manner—his work will cost at least three millions of dollars. Now, the estimates which we present here are those made by a competent engineer upon good data, and there has been no criticism made here going to refute them.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee, (interrupting.) I have made no estimates, but have relied in my statements upon the estimates of an engineer as competent as any that can be found.

Mr. BARRY. We are bound to conclude that the estimates we present are as correct as those of the gentleman, and that he can claim no superiority for his. We have commenced this work, and because it was impossible for this House to go into the details of the plan we referred it to the action of the President of the United States. But now gentlemen propose to bring back to the House the very difficulty which they sought to obviate by that reference. They propose to bring up for discussion the details of this matter, when they are of such variety, number, and extent as would occupy the House for weeks together in the consideration of them.

One objection made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. STANTON] to this work, was in regard to some of the brick used in its construction. I call the attention of the committee to the facts of the case, because I know the statement startled some gentlemen here. The statement was, that after the bricks were engaged for the Capitol extension at $5 88, and were condemned as unworthy for the use intended, they were afterwards purchased at a higher price than they were to be furnished for the Capitol, and used in the aqueduct.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels compelled to remind the gentleman that he must confine his remarks to his amendment.

Mr. BARRY. The statement which I have made was used as an objection to the work, and I am undertaking to correct that statement. The gentleman relies, he said, upon the statement of Mr. Wendell, the contractor, to furnish those brick for the Capitol; that he sold them to Mr. Meigs for a higher price than he was to furnish them for to the Capitol.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi is traveling beyond the legitimate ground which he may occupy. The gentleman will perceive that his remarks will lead to a reply, and the original amendment will be lost sight of in the collateral issue.

Mr. BARRY. I am showing that the reasons urged against the work are not good. The great objection is upon the ground of its extravagance; and I am going to show that the charge of extravagance is incorrect. I have here a copy of the receipt, signed by Mr. Wendell himself, in which he states that he sold six thousand brick for $5 25 per thousand. I wish to state another fact, and that is, that these brick were purchased to build the chimneys and fire-places of the shanties of the workmen, and not to be used in the aqueduct at all. The gentleman from Kentucky was led into an error in reference to this matter; but I hold in my hand the receipt Mr. Wendell copied from the records of the office, showing that the brick were sold for $5 25 per thousand, instead of at a higher price.

Mr. PARKER. I am opposed to this amendment, decidedly. I am opposed to the appropriation; and the reasons which induce me to go against the increase are just as good against the appropriation altogether.

Mr. Chairman, I am no enemy of the city of Washington; but am ready and willing to do a liberal part towards providing for it an ample supply of good water. But I happened to be here during the last Congress, and I recollect the introduction into the appropriation bill, at that time, of the brief item looking to the construction of water-works here. And I think I can safely say, that there was not one in ten of the members of that Congress who ever dreamed that they would come here at this session, and, under our action then, find a contract now made, involving an expenditure of millions of money that are not counted. Sir, I have seen enough here to become satisfied that this kind of sharp legislation, and still sharper action under it, is becoming one of the very greatest evils of the day. We are prodigal enough at best, God knows, when nothing more is done than we mean should be done. But how often is it, that when we intend to give only a dollar, ten is taken?

I am sure it never occurred to me, when those half dozen lines were inserted in that bill, that we were then finally determining upon the construction of water-works for this city on a scale of magnificence that the world has hardly, if ever, witnessed, and at a cost from the National Treasury alone of untold millions of money; and I confess that there is no one subject of legislation during the last Congress which has caused me more chagrin than that of finding we are involved in this difficulty. I thought at the time of the adoption of that act we were going a great way in appropriating $100,000 for the purpose of procuring these "plans"—predicated, of course, on careful surveys and estimates. That is all I supposed we were then doing—that the determination to construct upon the plan that might be deemed the most feasible and expedient, and the contract to construct would all be matter for after consideration. Judge, then, of my surprise—and not of mine alone—when we came back here this Congress to find that the President had finally determined upon one of his adopted plans, and that contracts had been entered into for the absolute construction of these works at such an enormous cost. Yes, sir, I am quite sure very few, if any, of us here then contemplated such a result.

It is all wrong any way it can be viewed; and, in my poor judgment, no such power can be fairly derived from the act. I do not think it can be extorted from it. And I now ask the attention of the committee for a moment to the simple provisions of this brief clause of the act.

This is certainly no express power given the President to proceed when he shall have procured his "plans" from the different "places," and enter into contracts for the final completion of these works, at any cost that he might deem it expedient to incur. Plans and places, "for the purpose of"—that is to say, with a view to bringing water into the city of Washington—is all that he is authorized to turn his attention to.

But I suppose I will be told the fair implication is that we have given the President the power to go on, if he can find a plan that he will approve, and let out the work at any cost he may see proper to incur, and call on us, again and again, from time to time, ad libitum, to foot the bills. But let us see the precise language of the act. It is this:

"To be expended under the direction of the President of the United States, for the purpose of bringing water into the city of Washington, upon such plans and from such places as he may approve, $100,000: Provided, That if the plan adopted by the President of the United States should require water to be drawn from any source within the limits of Maryland, the assent of the Legislature of that State shall first be obtained."

Now, sir, that is all there is of it—all upon which is predicated, not only the "plans" obtained from the different "places," and the adoption of one of them by the President, but the letting of contracts for a large quantity of material and labor for the construction of the work, and the actual execution of a considerable amount of the labor. Pray, sir, where do you find the authority for all of that? The alacrity with which all this is done, during the interval between two Congresses, is remarkable, when contrasted with the protraction of all our public works, when once fairly begun!

If this be all right, will gentlemen tell me upon what "plans"—that is the language—is it proposed to bring the water here? It is upon but one plan. "Such plans" is what we talk of in the act. Again, the act says from "such places." From what places is it proposed to bring the water? Is it from Rock Creek and the Potomac? Or is it from the Potomac and any other place, or from Rock Creek and any other place that may be found available? Not at all. But it is from one place—the Potomac alone—and on one plan alone. While the President's agency in bringing the water to the city is to be upon such "plans and from such places as he may approve."

Sir, the whole language shows that the act never contemplated giving the President the power to contract for bringing the water into Washington, after he had adopted the plans and places upon which it might be done. That was to be afterwards done by us, if deemed expedient at all, on view of the facts. In my judgment, that is the only proper and sensible construction that can be given to the law of the last Congress.

Who could have supposed that, in giving the President power to expend this specific sum of $100,000 on "plans," we were giving him the power to fix and involve the nation, certainly, in the expenditure of another indefinite sum, ranging surely from two to three millions of dollars—and, as some tell us, even three or four times that sum; and that, too, with all the care and charge of supplying this city with water forever!

The construction I contend for must be the true one. And that would have saved us from the difficulty in which we are now involved.

But am I told that I am attacking the President; that I am charging him with exceeding his powers? Well, sir, thank God, he is not above legitimate attack from this quarter. I cannot help who or where a just construction of this law may hit. But I am not necessarily required to suppose the President did not act in good faith in this behalf. I would give him credit for so acting. I suppose he has been compelled to confide this matter, in a great measure, to others. Such is usually the result in this mischievous class of legislation. And thus, I would hope, he has acted as he deemed himself authorized to do. But that he has acted upon a false construction of this act I must believe, let others look upon this law as they may. And I venture to repeat, that nine out of every ten of the members of the last Congress will bear me out in saying, that they never dreamed such consequences were to follow the appropriation then made.

But, sir, suppose the President has given the proper construction to the act, and has but carried out the intention of the last Congress in what he has done, the question remains whether we shall go on or retrace our steps—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARRY, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. EWING moved, pro forma, to increase the appropriation six dollars, and addressed the committee for five minutes.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I should certainly fail if I were to attempt to answer the arguments of the gentleman from Kentucky. I shall content myself, therefore, with endeavoring to oppose the amendment which he has proposed. Now, I beg this committee to remark, what cannot have escaped the observation of any gentleman upon this floor, that my statements in reference to the quantity of water proposed to be brought here have not been denied, and cannot be denied. I hold the report of Captain Meigs in my hand, in which he states the capacity of this work to bring sixty-seven million five hundred and ninety-six thousand four hundred gallons of water daily into the city. Sixty-seven million gallons of water, when Colonel Hughes states in his report that the largest quantity he ever knew estimated for each inhabitant was thirty gallons a day. Then, on this largest estimate that Colonel Hughes has ever known, one million two hundred thousand gallons will be required for the present population of Washington—twelve millions for ten times the population. We have five times as much provided by this work as would suffice for ten times the present population of Washington.

I read from Captain Meigs's report, and I desire gentlemen of the committee seriously to consider whether they are prepared to adopt his ideas:

"The aqueduct from the Great Falls offers, I think, uncommon advantages. Among them are: the simplicity and durability of the work; the purity and abundance of the source; the extent and capacity of the reservoirs, by which ample supplies are gained to guard against accidents and great emergencies, and which, allowing space and time for settling, secure the delivery of a supply clear and free from mud; the height at which it is delivered—fourteen feet above the upper floor of the Capitol; its adaptability to manufacturing purposes; the great quantity it will supply, while it takes from the river only what it delivers in the cities, not drawing off, as when machinery is used, seven or eight times as much to drive the wheels as those wheels and pumps raise for use. This enables us to use the water more freely than from either of the others. The streets, in hot weather, may be flooded every morning by hose. Every particle of dust or of offal prejudicial to health or comfort would thus be washed into the sewers. The most magnificent fountains could be kept constantly flowing; and the city of Washington, unrivaled in grandeur and beauty of plan, would, in a few years, refreshed by living streams, and beautified by sparkling jets and towering columns of water, become a place of summer resort, and the admiration of our whole people."

That is the magnificent plan of Captain Meigs, not only to bring five times as much water as ten times the population of Washington would require, but to have a surplus for manufacturing purposes. I cannot dwell as long upon this matter as I would wish, for my time is too limited. I have looked through the estimates of Captain Meigs, and unless I am greatly mistaken, I have not found any estimate for the foundation of this structure; and I should judge, from the reading of the report made by him, that he proposed to put it upon the ground without any foundation. I say that when this work comes to be constructed, it will necessarily cost two or three times as much as Captain Meigs has estimated for, if his figures and statements are worth anything at all. I have a copy of Captain Meigs's plan here before me, and he not only proposes to bring water from the Great Falls, but he proposes to bring water from Rock Creek. I do not hesitate to state here that his estimate of the cost of the work at Rock Creek is studiously exaggerated, while, on the other hand, his estimate of the cost of bringing the water from the Little Falls of the Potomac is studiously diminished from what it would really cost.

Mr. EWING then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the appropriation to $100,000.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it has been found to be the universal experience in this city, and in every other place where Governments have carried on works, that the estimates of engineers have never, or if ever very rarely, come up to one half of the amount which the work has actually cost. I have no doubt that the same experience will be found verified in this instance. There is a peculiar faculty in builders all over the country getting the Government into undertaking the building of custom-houses and other works by the appropriation of $10,000 or $50,000, which they say will cover the whole cost, and then after the work has been commenced, we find ourselves called upon to supply deficiencies in the appropriation, year after year, for a period of ten years, until finally the original sum is doubled, trebled, and in many instances quintupled. I do not believe that there can be found a single instance of engineers ever having made an estimate for the Government of this country, the amount of which proved to be in the end more than half the sum that the work has cost. Not a single instance of the contrary can be found, I believe, in the past history of such works.

Well, now, what is this particular proposition? It is a proposition to expend millions of dollars on the work of supplying the city with water. For the benefit of what and of whom is this outlay to be made? They say here that the Government of the country has a large amount of public property here; that its buildings are of immense value. To be sure the Government does possess a large amount of buildings here. It has parks in the city which it is constantly surrounding with iron fences, and expending vast sums of money upon. It expends large amounts annually in adorning this city, which draws upon the Treasury of the United States every day and every hour. This expenditure is lavished for no other purpose save to adorn the city. This is the character of the property, with the exception of the national archives, which it is sought to protect and improve at this immense expense. And importance is sought to be attached to this matter from the fact that some public buildings have been burned here. But, sir, it was not from any want of water that they were burned. They might have any quantity of water here without the aid of an engineer, or a greater achievement of engineering skill than a reservoir. Water enough runs to waste every day to supply all the public buildings of the city if they were constructed with reservoirs.

Mr. CHANDLER. You are mistaken in that.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, if I am mistaken in that, certainly I am correct in stating that enough of water runs to waste about this Capitol to supply it with any quantity it might require. If we want water for the protection of this building from fire, we can have it in any quantity without going to the Great Falls for it.

Well, Mr. Chairman, when we have got this water introduced into the city, when we have spent five or seven millions of dollars upon it, for whose benefit is it? When the Government of this country has got to pay the interest of the money that will be spent on this enterprise, for whose benefit will it all be? For that of the property holders of the city of Washington. If this aqueduct is built, and water conveyed to the city, what will be the effect of it? The effect will be to make property more valuable, and to make rents higher. And, Mr. Chairman, let me ask who pays the high rents in the city of Washington? It is the Government clerks that pay them; it is the members of Congress; it is the persons who live here transiently, and who cannot get a decent room in a boarding-house even in the fourth story, for which they have not to pay from twenty dollars to thirty dollars a week. And all this is owing to the expenditures of money here by the Government in improving the value of property.

Mr. VANSANT. This is no new question sprung upon this House. As early as 1849 an appropriation—a homeopathic one to be sure—was made by Congress for the purpose of surveying these different routes, with a view to the introduction of water into the city of Washington. The $500, which was the amount appropriated, being found inadequate to the survey of even one route, the city corporation appropriated $1,000 in addition. That $1,500 enabled the engineer, Mr. Hughes, to make a survey of one route, over which the water was to be taken, and that was from Rock Creek. Subsequently the matter was taken up again, and $5,000 was appropriated by Congress for the purpose of making another survey. Surveys were then made from Rock Creek, from Little Falls, and from the Great Falls, and a report of those surveys was made to the Congress of the United States. They were first presented to the Senate on the 21st of February, and the report was printed in the daily papers. The Senate appropriated $150,000 for the work. It came to the House, and was sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where it was passed as it came from the Senate; but the sum was stricken out in the House, but by a committee of conference it was restored, and made $100,000.

Now, when the matter was presented to the Senate it was fully discussed, and a report was made of the cost of the construction of the different lines. Since it has been introduced here, this session, every effort which human ingenuity could devise has been resorted to for the purpose of shaking the confidence of this committee in the capacity of the engineer who has charge of the execution of the work; and, in my judgment, the more theories they have set up, and the more facts they have asserted, the more has the tendency been to strengthen his reputation as an engineer.

The most startling facts, and the most wonderful theories, have been sprung upon this House. We were told, in the beginning, with an air of authority which seemed to carry conviction, and which startled those who have been somewhat familiar with the subject, and that, too, by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. STANTON,] that the work for the excavation of the earth was contracted for at $7 50 per cubic yard. Those who have examined the report upon the subject, are aware that the excavation of earth is estimated at from twenty to thirty cents a cubic yard at the highest. Well, certainly the declaration of such a fact as that I have referred to was most startling—the fact that it should not cost more than thirty cents, and that it did cost $7 50 per cubic yard.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to correct the gentleman. I know he does not intend to misrepresent me; but he does not understand what I said. I never said that the excavation of earth cost $7 50. I spoke of its being rock; and said, at the same time, that if it had been cast iron it could not have cost more.

Mr. VANSANT. I am sure the honorable gentleman from Kentucky does not believe that I would wilfully misrepresent him. I heard his remarks, but have no recollection of his having said anything about rock excavation. The impression made upon my mind at the time was, that he referred to the excavation of earth.

The question was then taken upon Mr. PERKINS's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. EWING offered a pro forma amendment, and addressed the committee in favor of Mr. CHANDLER's amendment, and in reply to Mr. SMITH, of New York. [The remarks are withheld.]

Mr. GOODRICH. I am disposed, Mr. Chairman, to be as liberal to the city of Washington as most members of Congress. I am disposed to go as far as I possibly can, consistently with a conscientious discharge of the duty which I owe to others. If I could see my way clear, I might be quite willing to vote for this appropriation; but I cannot do so while it is in the shape it is now. I agree entirely with the views which have been presented by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. PARKER.] I was in the last Congress, and had no more idea then than the gentleman had, that we were doing anything by which we were committing ourselves to any plan which would be brought here, or any contract which should be presented to this Congress. But I cannot go into that matter in a five-minute speech.

I say that this appropriation ought never to be made, in my judgment, unless it is done upon some principle of division between the United States and the city of Washington. If the appropriation be made, and the water be brought into the city, it will become a matter of great personal interest to the inhabitants of this city. I have no doubt at all that the effect will be to increase the value of private property in this city more than the sum which it is estimated the work will cost. My friend from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] asks how much will it increase the value of the public property? Very well; as much as he pleases. Admit it increases the value of the public property $3,000,000, and my principle is the same. Suppose this Capitol was in the city of New York, and you were to bring water there at a cost of two, three, five, or ten millions of dollars! I want to know on what principle you can justify this that would not justify giving water for the whole city of New York. Sir, if you adopt this principle, you will have to continue the supply of water for the benefit of private property so long as the city lasts, however much it may increase in size and population.

I say that I cannot consent to vote to do that unless you will go on some principle of division. If you will say that the corporation here shall pay one fourth, so I can save my principle, I am willing to be exceedingly liberal. I am sure no man can say that the inhabitants of the city of Washington, now numbering some sixty thousand—shortly to be more—ought not to pay for the benefits to be derived at least one fourth the expense. Do that, and to some extent the objection of the gentleman from New York will be obviated. It will be done much cheaper in that way. The inhabitants of the city are interested in the work, and let them bear the burden, and the work will be done better and cheaper in that way. But that is not the point I desire to make. I do not feel authorized to vote an appropriation for a work so much of which shall inure to the benefit of private property, without asking those who own the property to bear one cent of the burden. I therefore cannot vote for this appropriation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. Ewing's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move to increase the amount proposed in the amendment $100.

Having made some remarks a few weeks ago upon this proposition, I would not trouble the committee now, were I not desirous of saying something in reply to my friend from Indiana, [Mr. PARKER], in reference to the action of the last Congress. He argues as if the appropriation of $100,000 was only to enable the President of the United States to select the plan for the work, and the place from which the water was to be brought. For one, as a member of the last Congress, I state that I had a very different impression.

I hold in my hand Executive Document No. 48, made February 22, 1853, being a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a report of Lieutenant Meigs, with surveys, plans, and estimates for supplying the cities of Washington and Georgetown with water. I examined these surveys, plans, and estimates; and, when I voted at the last Congress to make this appropriation of $100,000, I did it with the distinct understanding that the President of the United States was empowered to adopt one of three plans that were submitted to Congress. I trust gentlemen of the committee will bear with me for a moment, while I make a reference to this report, to show that there were, at that time, three plans submitted to Congress, and that the difference in the expense of each was very immaterial. I find, on the second and third pages of this report, a recapitulation of the communication from the President of the United States, of the report of General Totten of the surveys made by Captain Smith, Lieutenant Meigs, and the engineers, and a recapitulation of the probable expenses of bringing water, by the three plans, from Rock Creek, Little Falls, and the Great Falls:

"The aqueduct from Rock Creek, complete, to the Capitol, navy-yard, and public buildings, including the high service in Georgetown, will cost $1,258,863. Advantages over the others, cheapness; supply in winter and spring, 26,732,300 gallons, but liable, in the heats of summer, to be diminished to 9,560,000 gallons.

"The Little Falls work, complete, will cost $1,587,415. Advantages over the Great Falls project, cheapness; over Rock Creek, steadiness of supply; which, at the above cost, will be 12,000,000 of gallons, to be increased in time, by another pump and wheel, to 18,000,000. Disadvantages, a doubt as to the sufficiency of the water power for a greater supply than 12,000,000 of gallons, and, by some engineers whom I have consulted, even for this amount in very dry seasons; want of simplicity; use of machinery always, however well constructed, liable to injury and interruption; want of reservoir space for settling the water; liability to interruption, for a time, during floods.

"The Great Falls project will cost, complete, $1,921,244. Constant and everlasting daily supply, 36,015,400 gallons. Advantages, simplicity and durability; perfect security and inexhaustible, and unfailing source; lavish use, which can be indulged in in consequence of abundant supply; power of street-washing, cooling the air, and embellishing the city by great fountains; use for driving small machines, lathes, printing presses, and the like; great space for settling and purifying in reservoirs, and great quantity in store for emergencies; small expense of keeping up the works when once established, and consequent low price of water delivered in houses or factories."

The statements in this recapitulation show a comparatively small difference in the estimates of these eminent gentlemen. The report of Lieutenant Meigs now before the members of the committee shows the probable cost of the aqueduct from the Great Falls to be $2,300,000. I have a letter in my hand from Mr. Meigs, dated the 25th of May last, in which he says that, so far from the cost of this work exceeding the estimate of $2,300,000, as stated by gentlemen here, there are responsible men now proposing and willing to contract for the execution of the whole work at $2,300,000. Any gentleman desiring to look at the letter may see it. And he says, also, that so far from the cost of the work exceeding his estimates, instead of paying fourteen dollars per cubic yard for excavating rocks, he has had it done for seven dollars, and from that down to three dollars and one dollar and fifty cents, showing that the work can be done for even less than the estimated cost.

Now, then, let me say a few words more in relation to this matter. In this report, which Mr. Meigs cites, it is stated that the Croton aqueduct in New York cost $12,000,000; the aqueduct in Boston, $5,000,000; that it cost $600,000 to supply Jersey city with water, and—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLINGMAN. I am opposed to the amendment of my friend from Ohio to increase the appropriation for this work $100. I think that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHANDLER] is the proper one, and that the sum indicated in it is just enough for the purpose. I was some time since opposed to the appropriation in this form; but I have great confidence in the judgment of my colleague over the way, [Mr. CRAIG], the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, whom, however, I do not now see in his seat. I know him to be an economical man in his public character; a strict constructionist, and all that. He has investigated this subject thoroughly, and he is of opinion—and I rely very much on his judgment—that the plan adopted had better be carried out. Every gentleman admits that we need water much in the District, for the purpose, as my friend on the left suggests, of making it Washington in fact, as well as in name. [A laugh.]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman from North Carolina speaks of the opinion of his colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Let me ask him if the matter has ever been before that committee?

Mr. CLINGMAN. The chairman told me he had investigated the matter thoroughly; and I understand, in fact, that it was referred to that committee. As I said, I have great confidence in his judgment, as I consider him to be a safe man in all respects, and opposed to all sorts of lavish expenditure. I was about to say, that it has been conceded by every gentleman who has spoken on the subject, that we very much want water in this city. These gentlemen, who have adopted and had charge of the execution of this plan—the President and our committee—seem to think it the right one. I admit that it is a large sum; but I have made up my mind to vote for the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

I rose, however, not for the purpose of making a speech on the subject, but to appeal to the friends and foes of the measure to let us vote upon the question at once. It is now after three o'clock, and the day is Saturday. I am very anxious to get this bill out of the way as soon as possible. I believe there is but one page more of the bill to be read after we shall have disposed of this question. I hope we shall take a vote upon it now, and adopt or reject it, so that we can go on and read the other page.

The question was taken on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. GREENWOOD. I propose the following amendment to the amendment:

Provided, That no portion of the foregoing amount shall be applied unless the corporations of Georgetown and Washington shall appropriate and pay a sum equal to one fifth of the amount, to aid in the construction of the water-works proposed.

When this question was being considered, a few days ago, in committee, a similar amendment, I believe, was moved to the deficiency bill. I felt called upon at that time to move an amendment a little different to the one now proposed. I believe that the amendment I offered provided that the corporations of Georgetown and Washington should defray one fourth of the cost of the work.

I have thought proper to modify the amendment, and to present it in the present shape. I would not be understood, in moving the present amendment, as entertaining any prejudice against the citizens of Washington.

It occurred to me that an amendment of this character would be equitable. The citizens own a large portion of the property of the city. It is true that the Government owns a very large amount of property, and it is necessary that the Government should be provided with a sufficient supply of water. But I hold that while we are making appropriations which will have the effect of enhancing the value of the property of the citizens of the District, they ought, at least, to come forward and say to Congress: "You are bringing water into the city, by which we are to be benefited, and we will aid in the matter."

If this appropriation should be made, and the corporations of Washington and Georgetown should think proper to make an appropriation, in accordance with this amendment, to aid in the work, and the water should be brought into the city, I would then be willing to vote for a law which should give those corporations the entire control of the water, with the exception of as much as should be required for the purposes of the Government, in order to enable them to make such disposition of it as they choose, for the purpose of deriving an income from it, to reimburse them for aiding to bring it in.

Certainly, sir, it was never the intention of Congress, when the appropriation of $100,000 was made, to pay that amount simply for a plan of the work. That certainly would have been a very extravagant amount to have appropriated for a plan. And I take it for granted that the Committee of Ways and Means never would have sustained the report of the Committee of Conference, had they believed that the $100,000 was appropriated simply for the purpose of procuring a plan for the construction of water-works.

Then, sir, I take it that the President has done no more, under this provision, than he was fully authorized to do by it.

If, then, this sum is to be appropriated for the purpose of constructing these water-works, I think the amendment which I have submitted should be adopted with it, and thereby give the corporations of Washington and Georgetown the opportunity of cooperating with the Government in bringing water into the city. That water is needed, judging from the remarks of gentlemen upon this floor, cannot be questioned. And I am told by my friends around me that we ought to have better water, or better whisky; and that if the water was better, we should not want so much whisky. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMULLIN. I desire to address the House upon the amendment; but it is so late in the day that I do not wish to do so now. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee then rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman (Mr. ORA) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at three o'clock and thirty minutes, p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday next at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

SUPPRESSION OF THE SLAVE TRADE.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. President, I had the honor to submit a resolution to the Senate on the 22d of May last, directing the Committee on Foreign Relations to make certain inquiries in regard to the African slave trade in the Spanish West Indies. That resolution was adopted by the Senate, and I am now instructed by the committee to report a bill for the more effectual suppression of the slave trade.

I am happy to state, sir, that the committee unanimously agree that it is not less due to the honor of the United States than to the obligations of their Government and people to the cause of humanity, to continue our efforts to suppress this inhuman traffic. If there be a single member of this honorable body who is insensible to the great duty imposed upon us as a civilized and Christian people in reference to the slave trade, I have yet to learn it. I assume it, that, with one heart and mind, the representatives of the American States and people, with the hearty concurrence of the American President, stand at all times prepared to perform their part of the great duty of suppressing the exportation of slaves from Africa by the most stringent and effectual means within their power.

But although such is and has been the settled desire of all branches of this Government, it is now apparent that the measures we have adopted, although aided by the Powers of the two great nations of Europe which stand foremost in the march of human progress and Christian civilization, are inadequate for the purposes for which they were designed. Great Britain and France, with their squadrons always cruising on the coast of Africa, acting in cooperation with an American squadron of eighty guns on that coast, have, it is believed, failed not only to suppress, but even to diminish this infamous trade. It is true, the importation of negroes into Brazil has nearly ceased since the year 1852, owing, I believe, to the energetic operation of the Brazilian Government in enforcing its treaty with Great Britain; but the importation into the Spanish West Indies has greatly increased, to the disgrace of those who have administered the government of those islands; and this Government is called upon by a consideration of the possible danger to a portion of our own country, whose prosperity and safety may be thus imperiled, as well as by all the dictates of humanity, to arrest that growing evil so far as we have means to accomplish the object.

I am well satisfied that this traffic is most successfully, though not exclusively, carried on in American-built vessels, and under the protection of the American flag. On a former occasion I endeavored to expose the means by which this shameful prostitution of the proud emblem of our national honor has been effected. Under the guard of the stars and stripes, the pirate has been enabled to renew all the horrors of the middle passage, and any man who will peruse the volume on "Africa and the American Flag," by Lieutenant Foote, of the United States Navy, who commanded the United States brig Perry, on the coast of Africa, during the years 1850 and 1851, will comprehend the means by which the worst of men have committed the worst of crimes, and escaped, unwhipped of justice, by the abuse of our flag.

I have this morning received a letter on this subject from this able and efficient officer of our Navy, dated the 24th instant, which I will submit to the perusal of any Senator desiring it, and which is well worthy of a careful consideration. He says:

"I have before me a copy of 'Instructions for the senior officers of Her Majesty's ships and vessels on the west coast of Africa with respect to the treaty with the United States of America, signed at Washington on the 9th of August, 1842, by the commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of Great Britain and Ireland,' &c., which say: 'The commanding officers of Her Majesty's vessels on the coast of Africa station will bear in mind, that it is no part of their duty to capture, or visit, or in any way to interfere with vessels of the United States, whether these vessels shall have slaves on board or not.'"

This confirms the statement I made to the Senate when I originated this inquiry, that slavers sailing under the American flag are in all cases protected by it, unless they chance to be overhauled by one of our own cruisers. Other nations have resolved, and I think wisely, that we shall have the sole responsibility of the traffic, if we are resolved that no others shall search our vessels. The fact redoubles the duty we owe both to God and man to spare no effort to prevent the trade, and the necessary dishonor of our national character which flows from it when conducted in American vessels.

The writer of the letter to which I refer, afterwards adds:

"The practice is, for American vessels to show their register or sea-letter to the foreign officer, as proof of nationality; they then become inviolate, and cannot be searched or detained."

This, it will be remembered by the Senate, is precisely in accordance with the view I presented to the Senate on a former occasion when the committee was instructed to direct their attention to the issuing of those papers commonly called sea-letters, and the restrictions which should be made when granting them, so as to prevent the abuse of the flag caused by them while the sale of American-built vessels in foreign ports should not be prevented. It is this sea-letter which enables every pirate engaged in this trade in an American bottom to escape all the cruisers of Great Britain and France. As soon as the slaver produces this sea-letter, the nationality of the vessel is established as American, and then if there be a thousand slaves in her hold, she passes unobstructed by the cruisers of all other nations on her piratical voyage.

Now, sir, it is just here, precisely at this point, that the committee propose to make a blow at the slave trade. To a clear understanding of the old law, the mischief and the remedy, let us ascertain first what this sea-letter is.

By the fourteenth section of the act of December 31, 1792, "concerning the registering and recording of ships or vessels," it is enacted that when a registered ship or vessel "shall in whole or in part be sold or transferred to a citizen or citizens of the United States," &c., &c., "in every such case the said ship or vessel shall be registered anew, by her former name," &c., &c., "and her former certificate of registry shall be delivered up to the collector to whom application for such new registry shall be made, at the time that the same shall be made, to be by him transmitted to the Register of the Treasury, who shall cause the same to be canceled." Then, to procure a new registry, it is necessary, under the same section, that the paper, which is now known as the sea-letter, shall be executed at the time of the sale. The provision is, "And in every such case of sale or transfer, there shall be some instrument in writing, in the nature of a bill of sale, which shall recite, at length, the said certificate, [of registry,] otherwise the said ship or vessel shall be incapable of being so registered anew." Every registry (without which no vessel can be entitled to any of the privileges or benefits of a vessel of the United States) contains a certificate under oath of the facts which establish the nationality of the vessel, such as the name, occupation, and place of abode of the owner, the port to which she belongs, the name and citizenship of the master, and among other things that she is of American build. This sea-letter, or bill of sale, therefore, as it recites the certificate of registry at length, must always show the nationality of the vessel.

Hence, it appears that these instruments of writing substantially differ only from the sea-letters or passports required by the acts of Congress of June 1, 1796, and March 2, 1803, in this particular, that the latter are required to be issued by the collectors to whom they are transmitted by the Treasury Department, after being signed by the President and countersigned by the Secretary of State, while the former is executed by the party transferring the vessel abroad, and by usage, in presence of an American consul. Both agree in certifying the nationality of the vessel. I can find nothing in the acts of Congress which requires the consul to authenticate such an instrument, or to issue it. His duties are prescribed by instructions from the State Department. But by another act of Congress of the 2d March, 1803, (not the act of the same date just referred to,) it is provided in the third section:

"That when any ship or vessel, which has been or shall be registered pursuant to any law of the United States, shall, whilst such ship or vessel is without the United States, be sold or transferred, in whole or in part, to a citizen or citizens of the said States, such ship or vessel, on her first arrival in the United States thereafter, shall be entitled to all the privileges and benefits of a ship or vessel of the United States."

The time allowed for obtaining the new registry is "within three days from the time at which her master, &c., is required to make his final report upon her first arrival, agreeably to the act of 2d March, 1799." This act does not repeal the provision in the former act of 1792, requiring the instrument in nature of a bill of sale on the transfer of an American vessel in a foreign port, and it carefully abstains from fixing any period for the return of a vessel so transferred abroad, to the United States for a new registry.

The consequence has been that vessels sold for slavers abroad have always been provided with these instruments in writing called sea-letters, though they are, in reality, nothing more than bills of sale reciting the old registry, which proved them to be American vessels. With this they have sailed for the coast of Africa, and by it they have been protected against all foreign cruisers.

This abuse of our flag, by these means, has been much complained of by our consuls abroad in their correspondence with the Department of State. In November, 1846, Mr. Parks, then consul at Rio de Janeiro, requested the President's instructions on the construction of the acts of Congress, and particularly whether a vessel so sold in a foreign port ought not, by law, to return home for a new registry before she could make a voyage to the coast of Africa with this instrument, sometimes called, as I have before stated, a sea-letter. The Secretary of State having consulted the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as the President, replied to him in a dispatch dated May 26, 1847, of which I hold a copy in my hand, that they were "clearly of opinion that a vessel, under such circumstances, is not obliged to return to the United States for a new register."

Speaking of the act of 1792, the Secretary then said:

"This act was passed in the infancy of the Federal Government, and does not seem to have contemplated the sale of American vessels beyond the limits of the United States. When such sales were made in a foreign country, it would therefore have been a reasonable construction of its provisions to require the vessel to return to the United States for a new registry with the least practicable delay. Between the years 1792 and 1803, however, there had been a great expansion of our foreign trade. In consequence of the wars between the Powers of Europe arising out of the French Revolution, we had become, in a considerable degree, the carriers for the whole world. Congress, under these circumstances, deemed it necessary to provide expressly for the sale of American vessels to American citizens in all foreign countries."

This, the Secretary said, they had done by the third section of the act of 1803, which I have read, and he then added:

"Congress had the whole subject before them at the time of the passage of this act. Had they intended that the vessel should return home immediately for a register, they would undoubtedly have expressed this intention. So far from this being the case, (their language is indefinite in point of time. It does not require the vessel to return immediately after the sale; but at whatever time she may return,) it recognizes her right to all the privileges and benefits of an American vessel."

He then proceeded to say that a different construction of this act would prove extremely injurious to American citizens, in prosecuting our carrying trade between foreign nations, an object always much cherished by the policy of the United States, and would be detrimental to our ship-building interest. An American citizen could not then purchase an American vessel in China, or at the Sandwich Islands, to prosecute a lawful voyage from thence to any foreign country; and an American ship-builder could not send his vessels abroad with any hope of selling them to American citizens beyond the limits of the United States. Besides, such a construction of the act would be contrary to the settled practice at the Treasury Department. And he finally concluded that "the bill of sale, properly authenticated, and reciting at length the certificate of registry, becomes the substitute on board the vessel for that certificate, until her first arrival in the United States thereafter."

In the decision thus made by the President, with the advice and concurrence of the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury in 1847, succeeding Administrations of this Government have fully acquiesced, and it may now be considered as the settled law of the United States. Viewing it as such, and desiring to prevent the evils of the slave trade, President Taylor in his annual message of the 4th December, 1850, thus pressed the subject on the consideration of Congress:

"Your attention is earnestly invited to an amendment of our existing laws relating to the African slave trade, with a view to the effectual suppression of that barbarous traffic. It is not to be denied that this trade is still, in part, carried on by means of vessels built in the United States, and owned or navigated by some of our citizens. The correspondence between the Department of State and the minister and consul of the United States at Rio de Janeiro, which has from time to time been laid before Congress, represents that it is a customary device to evade the penalties of our laws by means of sea-letters."

"Vessels sold in Brazil, when provided with such papers by the consul, instead of returning to the United States for a new register, proceed at once to the coast of Africa, for the purpose of obtaining cargoes of slaves. Much additional information of the same character has recently been transmitted to the Department of State. It has not been considered the policy of our laws to subject an American citizen who, in a foreign country, purchases a vessel built in the United States, to the inconvenience of sending her home for a new register before proceeding on a voyage. Any alteration of the laws which might have a tendency to impede the free transfer of property in vessels between our citizens, or the free navigation of those vessels between different parts of the world, when employed in lawful commerce, should be well and cautiously considered; but I trust that your wisdom will devise a method by which our general policy, in this respect, may be preserved, and, at the same time, the abuse of our flag by means of sea letters, in the manner indicated, may be prevented."

Had the suggestion thus made been followed by an act of Congress, in the spirit of the message, the exportation of more than one hundred thousand slaves would probably have been prevented. But Congress, engrossed by the political struggles of 1850, made no attempt to adopt the recommendation. It is the object of the bill I hold in my hand to adopt it now. It will not obstruct the transfer of American vessels in a foreign port for the purposes of lawful commerce, but will prevent the abuse of our flag by means of these sea-letters in future.

In this connection, suffer me to say, that the committee do not believe that the African slave trade will ever be arrested by the operation of the eighth article of the treaty of the 9th of August, 1842, called the Webster and Ashburton treaty, by which about one eighth of our whole naval force afloat has been employed on the African coast, at an annual cost of about $800,000, having captured only twelve slavers in twelve years. A portion of that squadron might always be advantageously kept on that coast to protect our commerce, and put down piracy. But the greater part of all our disposable force for the suppression of the slave trade should be employed in the Spanish West Indies, and it should not consist merely of one or two heavy frigates, or sloops of war, but chiefly of small steam propellers, of light draft, mounting a heavy gun on a pivot, and with men enough to enable them to carry any pirate by boarding. We should faithfully fulfill the stipulation in the treaty of Ghent, by always using our best endeavors to promote the desirable object of the entire abolition of this barbarous traffic; and, as a suitable measure to effect that great object, the committee now report this "bill for the more effectual suppression of the African slave trade in American-built vessels."

The bill was read a first time, ordered to a second reading, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

SLAVERY IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. CHASE gave notice of his intention to ask leave to introduce a bill to prohibit slavery in the Territories of the United States.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

The Senate proceeded to consider the motion made by Mr. ROCKWELL, on the 22d instant, to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary, the petition then presented by him from twenty-nine hundred citizens of Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of the fugitive slave law.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, addressed the Senate at considerable length, in a speech in which he reviewed an address recently issued by several Senators and members of the House of Representatives on the passage of the Nebraska and Kansas bill. [The speech of Mr. Jones will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. ROCKWELL. Mr. President, it is to only a few of the remarks which have fallen from the honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] that I have at this time any reply to make. Those remarks relate to a petition which I have introduced into the Senate, as a Senator of Massachusetts, and they have been of such a character that I deem it necessary to make some brief reply.

I regret, sir, that this duty has fallen on me at this time. I regret that it has fallen on me at a time when my distinguished predecessor [Mr. EVERETT] has been so recently compelled, by the pressure of, I trust, temporary ill health to relinquish his seat on this floor. I regret that it has not fallen on some other and worthier successor to him, whom our Commonwealth might have designated.

It is now scarcely three weeks since, while in the pursuance of my humble avocations I received the behest of my State to take my seat upon this floor. I had resigned every office which had ever been conferred on me, and I had chosen to remain in the walks of private life; but it was the command of the State of Massachusetts that I should come here, and no citizen is, in my judgment, at liberty to disobey her commands.

The first public act which I had to perform on entering the Senate, was to present the petition which has been made the subject of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Tennessee. It is a petition signed by two thousand nine hundred men of Massachusetts. They are principally from the city of Boston, and its vicinity. It is a fair representation of the bone and sinew of the active business men of the city of Boston. Included in the signatures to the petition are many others. The signers of this petition are lovers of this Union. They are lovers of the peace and quiet of this Union. They send their petition for the repeal of a law which has been but four years on your statute-book. They ask for the repeal of a law, which was in addition to a law that had been more than fifty years upon your statute-book, and under which law, without this additional act, this great country had achieved its greatness. In the year 1854, they come to this Congress, and say that a law passed in the year 1850 ought to be repealed. Is there treason in this? Is it not a law of Congress? Is it treasonable in the people of this country to ask for the modification or even for the repeal of any act of Congress?

But it is said that the source from which this application comes is one that is worthy of censurable remark; and this is said, too, in a speech which deprecates agitation, and which is so admirably calculated to allay agitation! It is said that the time and the circumstances are to be regarded in this matter. What is the time, and what are the circumstances surrounding it? The time chosen is after an agitation in this Congress which is unprecedented, I believe, in the history of the Government. I can confidently say that the feeling created by it in the free States of this Union is utterly unprecedented, and will be felt to be so for long years to come. It was immediately upon the passage of a bill, which was resisted here in every constitutional form, and in forms which have been branded as unjustifiable and unconstitutional, that this petition arose. It is a declaration of twenty-nine hundred men that they think, under the circumstances of the country, and the recent passage of the measure to which I have referred, that the fugitive slave law of 1850 should be repealed.

It is true that, immediately after the passage of the bill, which occasioned such great excitement, which filled all the arteries and veins of this country with excitement, as all know, a fugitive slave was arrested in the city of Boston. It did so happen that there was a popular feeling on the subject. It did so happen that, on a certain evening, there was an outbreak, an affray, a riot, if you please, and a homicide. It did so happen, also, that the constituted authorities of Massachusetts, and of Boston, took this matter into their hands, and the law which had produced so much agitation and so much feeling, was executed. The constituted authorities of the United States in Boston, telegraphed to the President of the United States that they wanted no further aid from him; that the authorities of Boston and Massachusetts were amply sufficient for all purposes; and that quiet and order existed.

Sir, it was at or about that time that this petition originated. Do you think that if the hearts of the three thousand men who sent you this petition had been filled with riot and with murder, they would have sent it to you? Do you think they would have drawn it out and laid it up in their Merchant's Exchange for everybody who chose to sign it, and everybody who did not so choose to pass it by? Do you think they would thus express their feelings to Congress if their hearts had been full of riot and murder? There is no ground for this charge against the citizens of the city of Boston. Affrays and homicides occur in other portions of this country. They occur upon occasions of great popular excitement, and they cannot always be avoided. This petition is, however, itself a proof, and should be a conclusive proof as to all who present it here, that they have no connection whatever with any proceedings of violence.

But, sir, I have said, and I say again, in connection with that portion of the Senator's remarks in reference to this subject, that there is a feeling throughout the free States of this nation the like of which has never existed before. There have been debates in Congress in relation to the character of some of those who have presented petitions and memorials here. Whole classes of men have been denounced for that. I tell you, gentlemen, that, whatever you may say in relation to the propriety, the duty, or the personal character or the profession of the clergy, the ministers of the Gospel, they have a right to present their petitions, and you should regard their petitions not merely as the expression of their own sentiments, sentiments as pure and disinterested as those of any class, but the expression of the sentiments of the population in which they are situated—the index and the exponent of a general feeling. It is so; it will be found to be so. Is there cause for it? I think there is, and that cause I will explain.

Four years ago my most distinguished predecessor, Mr. Webster, stood upon this floor, and advocated the compromise measures of that period. Among the rest he acquiesced in the passage of the fugitive slave law. He said, at that time, and the words which fell from his lips were regarded by himself and by all others as words to be entirely relied upon, as fixed facts that could never be changed, that the state and condition of the whole territory of the United States, in the matter of freedom and slavery, was fixed by irrepealable law. Underlying the acquiescence which followed upon those compromise measures of 1850, was that belief on the part of the whole population of the free States, that the condition of the Territories was fixed by an irrepealable law. If it had not been for that, there would have been no such acquiescence; and proof of it is found in the very petition I have presented here. Appended to it are the names of a great many persons who were actively engaged in reconciling the public opinion to a support of and acquiescence in that system of measures.

When this Congress met, all was quiet. When the measure proposing the repeal of the Missouri compromise was introduced, it was impossible for men to believe that it was to be carried out; but it proceeded, and day after day the conviction was forced upon our people that it was to be carried out. Then this excitement was occasioned. Sir, I will say now, that it has proceeded further than a mere requisition for the repeal of the fugitive slave law. It does proceed, as is stated in the address on which the Senator has commented, to a requisition to repeal the provision of the Kansas and Nebraska bill which repeals the Missouri compromise. It goes upon the ground, and it will proceed upon the ground, that there are no sacred compromises outside of the Constitution of the United States—that there are no laws which cannot be repealed—that there is nothing in the nature of law or compromise which Congress cannot and may not be asked to repeal.

This petition asks simply and directly for the repeal of the fugitive slave law. It does not ask for a modification of that law. It expresses the opinions of the petitioners, that something should be done; and they have not stopped to weigh their words, but they say distinctly and directly that they want that law repealed. They undoubtedly wish its repeal for two prominent reasons—because it does not recognize the right of trial by jury, and because it does not recognize the writ of habeas corpus. They ask for a repeal of the law, because it contains a denial of those provisions. This is an expression of their dissatisfaction with the law.

Mr. President, I have shown that there is no difficulty between the Government of the United States, and the government of the State of Massachusetts, but there is a difficulty between the Government of the United States and a large portion of its people. A large portion of the people of the United States are dissatisfied with the measures of Government. What course do they take? I am not undertaking to say here, and I do not say that there may not hereafter be a party even in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, which will sustain these measures. I know there are members of a party there who now sustain them. I do not know but that there may be more of the members of that party who will hereafter sustain them. But I say that any party which sustains them there or in any of the free States will, in my judgment, "grow small by degrees, and beautifully less." I say there is such a pervading public sentiment that this must be the result.

Now, sir, when there is a difficulty between the Government of the United States and a portion of its people, what is the duty of that portion of the people? Is it not to address the Government, to state the cause of the grievance, and to ask for specific redress? Is not this done? It has been truly said by the honorable Senator that this is not the only petition that has been presented or that will be presented. It is true, that the same feeling pervades great masses of the citizens of this country, and the same feeling will exhibit itself hereafter. Now, what I ask, is, that this petition shall be referred to the appropriate committee, and receive its respectful and attentive consideration. I say the Government of the United States is bound to do that, and no less, with such a petition.

Sir, in regard to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, in relation to the effect which the repeal of the fugitive slave law may have even upon the continuance of this Union, I have this to say, for I will speak here as freely as I would speak under the arches of Faneuil Hall,—I say that the time has gone by when anything like a threat of the dissolution of this Union consequent upon the action of the people of the free States will have any influence upon them—not because of a want of devotion to the Union on their part—not because they have not signified in the past, and will not signify in the future, the depth of that devotion by their lives, but because that threat is not to be used for the purpose of influencing the free exercise of their judgments.

Threats of disunion are no longer to be regarded as arguments for or against any measure of this Government. We look upon the dissolution of this Union as an impossible thing. We are willing, as we always have been, wherever it is extended, to go with it. We are willing to do that; and I ask here to-day, why is it that the measures are not in progress to unite the Pacific with the Atlantic? Why is it that this old commercial Atlantic ocean is not to-day in progress of being connected with the Pacific? Why do you not invigorate the great ideas that you sometimes utter, of "an ocean-bound Republic," of the whole of North America? Why do you not invigorate them with the great achievements of science? Why is it that we may not know here to-day what has taken place in California this morning? Are not the power and resources of the Government sufficient? Where are those measures? Why are they not followed up? Why are they not brought before the Senate, and passed by Congress? Let us be bound together in links of iron, and no question or debates upon any subject, can ever sever them. This has always been the sentiment of Massachusetts; and when I had the honor of a seat in the other House of Congress it was always the principle that animated my heart. The Atlantic and the Pacific! Let them be together. This day the Pacific, for all practical purposes of transportation, is not as large as the Atlantic was twenty years ago. Its borders are nearer together than the borders of the Atlantic were twenty years ago. Yours is the path that Omnipotence has pointed out for the transit of the commercial products of the earth. Why is it not carried out? Was there ever a richer Government? Do you say that there are difficulties as to the routes, and as to the modes of construction? Commence the work, and all the difficulties, as to the routes and modes of construction, will vanish away. Give us the West, give us the South, give us free opinions, and we shall be with you forever, and neither you, nor I, nor all men together can prevent it.

Mr. President, I desire to speak in words of truth, of sincerity, and in the calmest and plainest possible manner. There is an excitement in the free States of this Union such as has never before been seen; it is more powerful by far than anything that has preceded it. It is increasing every day. It must be respected, it must be heard, it must be considered, and I trust it will be. I trust that this petition will receive the calm consideration and attention of the committee to whom I have proposed to entrust it. Let it be argued, let it have a fair and full consideration. Whatever of argument connected with it is brought forward by the eminent standing committee to whom it is referred, let it come before us. Let the public opinion be heard and respected.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Tennessee stated, at the commencement of his speech, that he did not arraign the motives of any Senator. He has treated me, personally, with the courtesy which belongs to his character. It is not my province to reply to that portion of his speech which relates to the address. I am quite too young in the Senate, to presume to do that, under any circumstances, in the presence of older Senators; but it happens that I have had no connection with the preparation of that address, and therefore I am not qualified to speak upon it. If I were the proper person, however, I would willingly undertake its defense.

I am of the same opinion expressed by the honorable and experienced Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Dawson,] a few days since, that the true course of debate here is for each Senator to express his opinions and arguments, at this late period of the session, in as brief and direct a manner as possible. I will, therefore, no longer detain the Senate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I shall detain the Senate but a few minutes in reply to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts. There are only one or two points in his address upon which I feel called on to speak. He seems to think that I arraigned the signers of that memorial with more harshness than they deserve; and he announces to the Senate and the world that they constitute the bone and sinew of Boston and Massachusetts. Well, sir, I am not personally acquainted with all the persons; but I respectfully submit to that honorable Senator to tell the Senate and the world, while he is finding fault with me for alleging that the memorial comes here surcharged with treason and with blood, how many of those who aided in resisting the laws of the country in Boston are signers of the memorial? Will the honorable Senator pretend to say to the country that many, very many of the signers, were not of that class of men who dared, with treason in their hearts, and with knives in their hands, to resist the constituted authorities of the country?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I will state that I did not positively affirm that not a single person who signed the address was engaged in the transaction to which he refers. That is not what I undertook to say. All that I said was, that I had no reason to believe that they were.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Senator says that he does not know. Well, Mr. President, I should like to know whether such men as Wendell Phillips and Theodore Parker, and others of that class, who had not the courage personally to stand in the fight, but urge on a band of infatuated and ignorant men to do that which they have not the courage to do, are not responsible before God and the country for this?

But, sir, this is not all. The Senator says that they have a right to petition. I am sure that that honorable Senator did not point that remark at me. He will do me the justice to say, that I conceded the very largest possible latitude to petition; that I extended it to his Satanic Majesty himself. I am willing that they shall petition here upon all subjects; but when their petition does come, I am not required to swallow it without inquiring into its merits or its purposes. The honorable Senator says that we need not deceive ourselves; that there is a feeling in the North that is going on conquering and to conquer; and that the excitement and the agitation will go on until these great things be accomplished. Will that honorable Senator, for whom I have respect, although I have not the honor of a personal acquaintance with him, upon his responsibility as a man and a Senator, tell us whether he believes this Union could last a single day under the repeal of the fugitive slave law? Will the honorable Senator answer that?

Mr. ROCKWELL. I have to answer that I do not apprehend that any act of that kind would dissolve this Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am very sorry that I cannot concur with the honorable Senator in that. I can tell him that we differ toto celo. If he supposes—and I infer from his remarks that he does—that the South will stand tamely, submitting like cravens to an invasion upon its rights, he mistakes its character. If he supposes that the South will stand and see their property, which the guaranties and protection of the Constitution secure to them, carried away, he knows very little of the southern character. When that Senator says that he has seen and heard enough of these threats and taunts about the dissolution of the Union, so that they have no force left; that they do not alarm him; that it does not disturb the equanimity of his heart to be threatened with a dissolution of the Union, I must say that I used no threat. I utterly disavowed anything like a threat. I am not of that class of men who make threats. And as for the threats to which he alludes, he cannot find them in anything that I said. But I can tell him that he need not lay the flattering unction to his soul, or communicate the intelligence to his constituents, that we of the South are ready to bear everything that the North may suggest. He need not tell his constituents that we will tamely submit to any invasion upon every right that we enjoy. He need not mislead his constituents by an argument addressed to them to go forward and do all that they may to destroy the last vestige of equality between the North and the South, and tell them, "Gentlemen, do not be alarmed. You need not be alarmed about the dissolution of this Union; they are afraid to do it." We are, sir, afraid to dissolve this Union without cause; but when it comes as an alternative between the Union on the one hand, and dishonor, disgrace, and infamy, and being trodden upon by men who are but our equals, on the other, I say that if I had a torch I would apply it myself, and be consumed in the conflagration, before I would submit to it; and I speak the sentiments of the South.

If we are to hold our place in this Union at the expense of honor, and virtue, and equality, the Union is not worth having, and you can take all the glory you can find in it. We do not seek to place you in such a position. We have never sought to do it; and when you seek to place us in such an attitude, you misinterpret the character of the South if you suppose it will submit to it. Why, sir, we hold our servants under the Constitution—whether this is right or wrong, you have no right to inquire. If they go to Massachusetts, we have a right to reclaim them; and when we go there to reclaim them, instead of finding every man in Boston, as he ought to be, standing by the law, you find heartless, odious hypocrites in the pulpit, preaching sedition and treason; and yet you tell us we may talk as we please about the ministry, they are a mighty power—as much as to say, take care lest you fall beneath their execration. I am not going to make war upon the ministry. I leave that to the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] I think his argument is about equal to the three thousand and fifty ministers; and when they have destroyed him, they will probably find some other victim to satisfy them. I do not expect to say anything about them or the piety of their hearts. They are not to be alarmed about that. I have great respect for the ministry. I do not seek to get into a quarrel with them. I would rather take the men they send here; and I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts is their representative. I am willing to discuss with him; but I do not mean to get off on a false track. With women and preachers I never quarrel; you cannot get me off on such a track.

But, sir, the Senator says very frankly—and I take it he is a very honest man, but I think he has partaken of that fanaticism that will lead him astray—that I am right; that repeal is the watchword. They intend to agitate until the fugitive slave law is repealed, and until the Missouri restriction is restored to the statute-book. Then, my honorable friend, let me say to you that you have a lifetime before you, and you may sit out here for your term, and the term of your successor, and the term after that, but I do not think you will live to see the day when the one or the other can be done. But if you do live to that inauspicious day, let me tell you that you will have nothing to do. The work will already have been accomplished; and then, sirs, the proclamation that has been issued by some of your allies, that the incendiary had better come and apply the torch to the Capitol of the country, will be useless. That thing has been done once before, Mr. President. The Capitol was once the scene of a conflagration—and by whom? by whose hands? By the enemies of the country. And we are told now by one of the leaders of this war upon the institutions of the country, that it is better to see the Capitol of his country in flames, than to see the South brought to stand upon an equality with the North. Oh! sirs, if there be a curse preserved in all the armory of Heaven that is deeper than all others, let it descend upon the infamous wretch who could have such a feeling; and if I had the power of Omnipotence, I would draw some thunderbolt from its armory, and hurl such a wretch into annihilation. Rather see this Capitol itself in flames, these marbled columns tumbling to ruin, and the representatives of the States and of the people crushed in their fall, than to see an equality of rights between the members of this Confederacy! Ah! sir, in the better days of this Republic, in the days of Washington and the patriots of the Revolution, the man who should have uttered such a sentiment would have been hung as high as Haman; and he deserves it to-day.

You talk about the rights of the South, and about trampling upon them, and you say she will submit. It may be that we shall; but may the God of Heaven forever blast me and all mine, if they ever submit to infamy, degradation, and dishonor. Lay not that flattering unction to your souls; she will not do it. You say "give us iron bands to bind us together. Give us the West; give us the South; give us trade; give us commerce." You have got nearly all, and, not satisfied with that, you want our negroes; you want our property; you want to dishonor us; you want to disgrace us; you want a servile war, that our wives and daughters may be degraded and dishonored. Do not make a fuss about this thing. Talk more reasonably. Talk a little more patriotically. Talk about the authority and the rights of the country. Give us what the Constitution gives us. We ask no more. We will give you all that it secures you. We seek not to encroach upon you, and will never, no, never, submit to encroachments from you.

Mr. BRODHEAD. This, Mr. President, is a controversy between old friends. I believe that for the last twenty years Tennessee and Massachusetts have stood shoulder to shoulder in presidential elections; and if this controversy is to result in a change of the policy, I hope it will go on. I believe that Tennessee, since 1836, has been with Massachusetts in politics, in the presidential elections at least, against the national men of the country. When General Cass declared himself against the Wilmot proviso, did not Tennessee prefer General Taylor who declined to declare himself against it? And why did he decline to do so? Because the Whigs wanted Massachusetts. Massachusetts and Tennessee were together during the last presidential election, and I rather fear they will be together hereafter. Therefore, hope that this unpleasant controversy will cease, and that, the morning hour having gone by, we shall proceed with the regular business of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I begin by answering the interrogatory propounded by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. Jones.] He asks, "Can any one suppose that, if the fugitive slave act be repealed, this Union can exist?" To which I reply at once, that if the Union be in any way dependent on an act—I cannot call it a law—so revolting in every regard as that to which he refers, then it ought not to exist. To much else that has fallen from that Senator I do not desire to reply. He has discussed at length matters already handled again and again in the protracted debates of this session. Like the excited hero of Macedonia, he has renewed past conflicts,

"And thrice he routed all his foes,
And thrice he slew the slain."

Of what the Senator has said on the relations of Senators, North and South, of a particular party, it is not my province to speak. And yet I cannot turn from it without expressing, at least, a single aspiration, that men from the North, whether Whigs or Democrats, will neither be cajoled or driven by any temptation, or lash, from the support of those principles of freedom which are inseparable from the true honor and welfare of the country. At last, I trust, there will be a back-bone in the North.

My colleague has already remarked, that this memorial proceeds from persons of whom many were open supporters of the alleged compromises of 1850, including even the odious fugitive slave bill. I have looked over the long list, and, so far as I can judge, find this to be true. And, in my opinion, the change shown by these men is typical of the change in the community of which they constitute a prominent part. Once the positive upholders of the fugitive slave bill, they now demand its unconditional repeal.

There is another circumstance worthy of especial remark. This memorial proceeds mainly from persons connected with trade and commerce. Now, it is a fact too well known in the history of England, and of our own country, that these persons, while often justly distinguished by their individual charities and munificence, have been lukewarm in their opposition to slavery. Twice in English history the "mercantile interest" frowned upon the endeavors to suppress the atrocity of Algerine slavery; steadfastly in England it sought to baffle Wilberforce's great effort for the abolition of the African slave trade; and, at the formation of our own Constitution, it stipulated a sordid compromise, by which this same detested, Heaven-defying traffic was saved for twenty years from American judgment. But now it is all changed—at least in Boston. The representatives of the "mercantile interest" place themselves in the front of the new movement against slavery, and by their explicit memorial, call for the abatement of a grievance which they have recently bitterly felt in Boston.

Mr. President, this memorial is interesting to me, first, as it asks a repeal of the fugitive slave bill, and secondly, as it comes from Massachusetts. That repeal I shall be glad at any time, now and hereafter, as in times past, to sustain by vote and argument; and I trust never to fail in any just regard for the sentiments or interests of Massachusetts. With these few remarks, I would gladly close. But there has been an arraignment here to-day, both of myself and of the Commonwealth which I represent. To all that has been said against myself or the Commonwealth—so far as it is an impeachment of either—so far as it subjects either to any just censure, I plead openly, for myself and for Massachusetts, "not guilty." But pardon me, if I do not submit to be tried by the Senate, fresh from the injustice of the Nebraska bill. In the language of the common law, I throw myself upon "God and the country," and claim the same trial for my honored Commonwealth.

So far as the arraignment touches me personally, I hardly care to speak. It is true that I have not hesitated, here and elsewhere, to express my open, sincere, and unequivocal condemnation of the fugitive slave bill. I have denounced it as at once a violation of the law of God, and of the Constitution of the United States. In violation of the Constitution, it commits the great question of human freedom—than which none is more sacred in the law—not to a solemn trial, but to summary proceedings.

It commits this question—not to one of the high tribunals of the land—but to the unaided judgment of a single petty magistrate.

It commits this question to a magistrate, appointed, not by the President with the consent of the Senate, but by the court; holding his office, not during good behavior, but merely during the will of the court; and receiving, not a regular salary, but fees according to each individual case.

It authorizes judgment on ex parte evidence, by affidavits, without the sanction of cross-examination.

It denies the writ of habeas corpus, ever known as the palladium of the citizen.

Contrary to the declared purposes of the framers of the Constitution, it sends the fugitive back "at the public expense."

Adding meanness to the violation of the Constitution, it bribes the commissioner by a double fee to pronounce against freedom. If he dooms a man to slavery, the reward is ten dollars; but, saving him to freedom, his dole is five dollars.

But this is not all. On two other capital grounds do I oppose this act as unconstitutional; first, as it is an assumption by Congress of powers not delegated by the Constitution, and in derogation of the rights of the States; and secondly, as it takes away that essential birth-right of the citizen, trial by jury, in a question of personal liberty and a suit at common law. Thus obnoxious, I have regarded it as an enactment totally devoid of all constitutional obligation, as it is clearly devoid of all moral, while it is disgraceful to the country and the age. And, sir, I have hoped and labored for the creation of such a public opinion, firm, enlightened, and generous, as should render the act practically inoperative, and should press, without ceasing, upon Congress for its repeal. For all that I have said on this head, I have no regrets or apologies; but rather joy and satisfaction. Glad I am in having said it; glad I am now in the opportunity of affirming it all anew. Thus much for myself.

In response for Massachusetts, there are other things. Something surely must be pardoned to her history. In Massachusetts stands Boston. In Boston stands Faneuil Hall, where, throughout the perils which preceded the Revolution, our patriot fathers assembled to vow themselves to freedom. Here, in those days, spoke James Otis, full of the thought that "the people's safety is the law of God." Here, also, spoke James Warren, inspired by the sentiment that "death with all its tortures is preferable to slavery." And here, also, thundered John Adams, fervid with the conviction that "consenting to slavery is a sacrilegious breach of trust." Not far from this venerable hall—between this temple of freedom and the very courthouse, to which the Senator [Mr. Jones] has referred—is the street where, in 1770, the first blood was spilt in conflict between British troops and American citizens, and among the victims was one of that African race which you so much despise. Almost within sight is Bunker Hill; further off, Lexington and Concord. Amidst these scenes a slave-hunter from Virginia appears, and the disgusting rites begin by which a fellow-man is to be doomed to bondage. Sir, can you wonder that the people were moved?

Who can be wise, amazed, temperate, and furious,
Loyal and neutral, in a moment? No man.

It is true that the slave act was with difficulty executed, and that one of its servants perished in the effort. On these grounds the Senator from Tennessee charges Boston with fanaticism. I express no opinion of the conduct of individuals; but I do say, that the fanaticism which the Senator condemns is not new in Boston. It is the same which opposed the execution of the Stamp Act, and finally secured its repeal. It is the same which opposed the Tea Tax. It is the fanaticism which finally triumphed on Bunker Hill. The Senator says that Boston is filled with traitors. That charge is not new. Boston, of old, was the home of Hancock and Adams. Her traitors now are those who are truly animated by the spirit of the American Revolution. In condemning them, in condemning Massachusetts, in condemning these remonstrants, you simply give a proper conclusion to the utterance on this floor that the Declaration of Independence is "a self-evident lie."

Here I might leave the imputations on Massachusetts. But the case is stronger yet. I have referred to the Stamp Act. The parallel is of such aptness and importance, that, though on a former occasion I presented it to the Senate, I cannot forbear from pressing it again. As the precise character of this act may not be familiar, allow me to remind the Senate, that it was an attempt to draw money from the Colonies through a stamp tax, while the determination of certain questions of forfeiture under the statute was delegated, not to the courts of common law, but to courts of admiralty without trial by jury. This act was denounced in the Colonies at once on its passage, as contrary to the British Constitution on two principal grounds, identical in character with the two chief grounds on which the slave act is now declared to be unconstitutional; first, as an assumption by Parliament of powers not belonging to it, and an infringement of rights secured to the Colonies; and, secondly, as a denial of trial by jury in certain cases of property. On these grounds the Stamp Act was held to be an outrage.

The Colonies were aroused against it. Virginia first declared herself by solemn resolutions, which the timid thought "reasonable;" yes, sir, "reasonable;" even as that word is now applied to recent manifestations of opinion in Boston. But these "reasonable" resolutions soon found a response. New York followed. Massachusetts came next. In an address from the Legislature to the Governor, the true ground of opposition to the Stamp Act, coincident with the two radical objections to the Slave Act, are clearly set forth, with the following pregnant conclusion:

"We deeply regret that the Parliament has seen fit to pass such an act as the Stamp Act; we flatter ourselves that the hardships of it will shortly appear to them in such a light as shall induce them, in their wisdom, to repeal it; in the mean time, we must beg your Excellency to excuse us from doing anything to assist in the execution of it."

The Stamp Act was welcomed in the Colonies by the Tories of that day precisely as the unconstitutional Slave Act has been welcomed by imperious numbers among us. Hutchinson, at that time Lieutenant Governor and judge in Massachusetts, wrote to Ministers in England:

"The Stamp Act is received with as much decency as could be expected. It leaves no room for evasion, and will execute itself."

Like the judges of our day, in charges to grand juries he resolutely vindicated the act, and admonished "the jurors and the people" to obey. Like Governors in our day, Bernard, in his speech to the Legislature of Massachusetts, demanded unreasoning submission. "I shall not," says this British Governor, "enter into any disquisition of the policy of the act. I have only to say it is an act of the Parliament of Great Britain." Like marshals of our day, the officers of the customs are recorded as having made "application for a military force to assist them in the execution of their duty." The elaborate answer of Massachusetts—a paper which is one of the corner-stones of our history—drawn by Samuel Adams, was pronounced "the ravings of a parcel of wild enthusiasts," even as recent proceedings in Boston, resulting in the memorial before you, have been characterized on this floor. Was I not right in adducing this parallel?

The country was aroused against the execution of the act. And here Boston took the lead. In formal instructions to her Representatives, adopted unanimously in town meeting at Faneuil Hall, the following rule of conduct was prescribed:

"We, therefore, think it our indispensable duty, in justice to ourselves and posterity, as it is our undoubted privilege, in the most open and unreserved, but decent and respectful terms, to declare our greatest dissatisfaction with this law. And we think it incumbent upon you by no means to join in any public measures for countenancing and assisting in the execution of the same. But to use your best endeavors in the General Assembly to have the inherent inalienable rights of the people of this province asserted, and vindicated, and left upon the public record, that posterity may never have reason to charge the present times with the guilt of tamely giving them away."

The opposition spread and deepened, and one of its natural tendencies was to outbreak and violence. On one occasion in Boston it showed itself in the lawlessness of a mob, of a most formidable character, even as is now charged. Liberty, in her struggles, is too often driven to force. But the town, at a public meeting in Faneuil Hall, called without delay, on the motion of the opponents of the Stamp Act, with James Otis as chairman, condemned the outrage. Eager in hostility to the execution of the act, Boston cherished municipal order, and constantly discountenanced all tumult, violence, and illegal proceedings. On these two grounds she then stood; and her position was widely recognized. In reply, March 27, 1766, to an address from the inhabitants of Plymouth, her own consciousness of duty done is thus expressed:

"If the inhabitants of Boston have taken the legal and warrantable measures to prevent that misfortune of all others the most to be dreaded, the execution of the Stamp Act, and, as a necessary means of preventing it, have made any spirited applications for opening the custom-houses and courts of justice; if, at the same time, they have borne their testimony against outrageous tumults and illegal proceedings, and given any example of the love of peace and good order, next to the consciousness of having done their duty is the satisfaction of meeting with the approbation of any of their fellow-countrymen."

Thus was the Stamp Act annulled, even before its actual repeal, which was pressed with assiduity, by petition and remonstrance, on the next meeting of Parliament: Among the potent influences was the entire concurrence of the merchants, and especially a remonstrance against the Stamp Act by the merchants of New York—like that now made against the Slave Act by the merchants of Boston. Some asked at first only for its modification. Even James Otis began with this moderate desire. The King himself showed a disposition to yield to this extent. But Franklin, who was then in England, when asked whether the Colonies would submit to the act, if mitigated in certain particulars, replied: "No, never, unless compelled by force of arms." The great Commoner, William Pitt, in an ever memorable speech, uttered words which fitly belong to this occasion. He said:

"Sir, I have been charged with giving birth to sedition in America. They have spoken their sentiments with freedom against this unhappy act, and that freedom has become their crime. Sorry I am to hear the liberty of speech in this House imputed as a crime. But the imputation shall not discourage me. It is a liberty I mean to exercise. No gentleman ought to be afraid to exercise it. It is a liberty by which the gentleman who enlumines it might and ought to have profited. The gentleman tells us America is obstinate; America is almost in open rebellion. I rejoice that America has resisted; three millions of people so dead to all the feelings of liberty, as voluntarily to submit to be slaves, would have been fit instruments to make slaves of all the rest. I would not debate a particular point of law with the gentleman; but I draw my ideas of freedom from the vital powers of the British Constitution—not from the crude and fallacious notions too much relied upon, as if we were but in the morning of liberty. I can acknowledge no veneration for any procedure, law, or ordinance that is repugnant to reason and the first elements of our Constitution. The Americans have been wronged. They have been driven to madness. Upon the whole, I will beg leave to tell the House what is really my opinion. It is that the Stamp Act be repealed, absolutely, totally, and immediately, and that the reason for the repeal be assigned, because it was founded on an erroneous principle."

Thus spoke this great orator, at the time tutelary guardian of American liberty. He was not unheeded. Within less than a year from its original passage, the Stamp Act—assailed as unconstitutional on the precise grounds on which we assail the existing slave act—was driven from the statute-book.

But, sir, the Stamp Act was, at most, an infringement of civil liberty only, not of personal liberty. It touched questions of property only, but not the personal liberty of any man. Under it no freeman could be seized as a slave. There was an unjust tax of a few pence, with the chances of amercement by a single judge without jury; but by this statute no person could be deprived of that vital right of all, which is to other rights as the soul to the body—the right of a man to himself. As liberty is more than property, as man is above the beasts that perish, as Heaven is higher than earth, so are the rights assailed by an American Congress above those once assailed by the British Parliament; and just in this proportion must be our condemnation of the Slave Act by the side of the Stamp Act. And this will yet be declared by history.

I call upon you, then, to receive the memorial, and hearken to its prayer. All other memorials asking for changes in existing legislation are treated with respect, promptly referred, and acted upon. This should not be an exception. The memorial simply asks the repeal of an obnoxious statute, which is entirely within the competency of Congress. It proceeds from a large number of respectable citizens whose autograph signatures are attached. It is brief and respectful in form; and, in its very brevity, shows that spirit of freedom which should awaken a generous response. In refusing to receive it or refer it, according to the usage of the Senate, or in treating it with any indignity, you offer an affront, not only to these numerous petitioners, but also to the great right of petition, which is here never more sacred than when exercised in behalf of freedom against an obnoxious statute. Permit me to add, that by this course you provoke the very spirit which you would repress. There is a certain plant which is said to grow when trodden upon. It remains to be seen if the Boston petitioners have not something of this quality. But this I know, sir: that the slave act, like vice, is of so hideous a mien, that "to be hated it needs only to be seen;" and the occurrences of this day will make it visible and palpable to the people in new forms of injustice.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I wish to know, as I came into the Senate Chamber since the discussion commenced, what is the proposition before the body?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. NORRIS in the chair.) The question is on the motion to refer the memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BUTLER. It becomes me, then, as chairman of that committee, to say one or two words. I have never had any very great confidence in what is called the fugitive slave law. It became my duty certainly, as the organ of the Committee on the Judiciary, to report a bill out of which grew the present act known as the fugitive slave act. My opinion always has been, however, that, primarily, there ought to have been no fugitive slave act at all, but that, under the Constitution of a Confederacy of slaveholding States—for these were slaveholding States at the time of the formation of the Constitution—each State was bound to perform its own duty in carrying out the mandates of that Constitution. The Constitution contained obligations of States as parties to see them performed; and if each State would do its full duty—the duty of compact stipulation—in good faith, Congress, as the representatives of the States, would never have been called on to provide such a measure as the fugitive slave act.

Now, I must be permitted to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROCKWELL,] who has spoken in a temper that I somewhat commend, with his solemn declaration that the feeling which has been excited at the North by the passage of the Kansas and Nebraska bill cannot be extinguished; that the fires which have been kindled are to continue; does he suppose that any report made by the Committee on the Judiciary could appease a sentiment which has been expressed, and, I believe, exaggerated by the speech of his colleague; a speech whose whole style, tone, and character does not become a Senate, especially a Senate representing a constitutional Confederacy; a speech that I regard as a poor edition of his other speeches on the same subject? It might have suited for the 4th of July, which comes on in a few days. Do gentlemen suppose, after the declarations which they have made, that any act or any measure, recommended by the Judiciary Committee, could satisfy the feelings of which they have given us such notice? Sir, I will not go into this matter; but there is one thing which I wish to say in reply to the honorable gentleman who sits near me, [Mr. SUMNER.] When Faneuil Hall was illustrated by eloquence, and immortalized by patriotism; when Otis spoke, and John Hancock acted, and John Adams made the declarations which have been so much applauded by the gentleman, they were the representatives of slaveholding States. They represented Massachusetts as she was—hardy, slaveholding Massachusetts. Sir, when blood was shed upon the plains of Lexington and Concord, in an issue made by Boston, to whom was an appeal made, and from whom was it answered? The answer is found in the acts of slaveholding States—animis opibusque parati. Yes, sir, the independence of America, to maintain republican liberty, was won by the arms and treasure, by the patriotism and good faith of slaveholding communities.

Sir, the Senator has chosen to exhibit a good deal of sensibility upon abstract questions of liberty; but he knows that this Confederacy could not have been formed without a Constitution made by practical statesmen, in which New England entered into a compact with slaveholders. If the sentiments which he entertains now be the general sentiments of Boston and Massachusetts, it is a Commonwealth which ought not to belong to a Confederacy of slaveholders. That ought to be their feeling. If they cannot associate with us, under a common Constitution, let them say so. Sir, the gentleman has made his declarations with much pomp, and, I must say, not with his usual taste; with a species of rhetoric which is intended, I suppose, to feed the fires of fanaticism which he has helped to kindle in his own State—a species of rhetoric which is not becoming the gravity of this body. Let me tell him that when all those distinguished acts took place, to which he has alluded, they came from the organs of a public opinion representing peaceful wisdom—those who made compacts to observe them—those who could have their own, but could respect and conform to the opinions of others. They were gentlemen.

Perhaps, sir, I have said more than I ought to have said on this subject; but when gentlemen rise and flagrantly misrepresent history, as that gentleman has done, by a fourth of July oration, by rapid rhetoric, by a species of rhetoric which, I am sorry to say, ought not to come from a scholar—a rhetoric with more fine color than real strength—I become impatient under it. I speak very differently of the other honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROCKWELL.] He spoke with calmness, gravity, and dignity; and I attended to him. His warning would give me some understanding of the state of feeling which I would be inclined to respect. I respect a man who speaks under the sanction of responsibility which seemed to pervade that Senator's bosom. He was the selected representative to present the petition. He has discharged the office, and has spoken in the soberness of one expressing conviction; and in that spirit—not as a rhetorician, playing a part—I must regard his representations. If they shall be the prevailing sentiments of those for whom he has spoken, they make the issues of separation.

I have never made a threat on this floor; but I will tell him that if these agitations go on, the consequence will be that an issue will be made between the North and the South. Each section will become united—maintaining the position of units. I do not undertake to indicate those things; but will say, if sectional agitation is to be fed by such sentiments, such displays, and such things as come from the honorable gentleman near me, [Mr. SUMNER,] I say we ought not to be in a common Confederacy, and we should be better off without it. In such a state of things, I might well entertain feelings of respect for the gentleman—as representing a different confederacy. I will not suppose a hostile confederacy; but even if such should be its character—if I do not mistake the gentleman—he would extend to me the protection of an honorable and respected flag. My condition is different when I am assailed by a confederate, making war upon me under the covering of a common camp. In one, and a plain word, if the proceedings of this Senate are to be made the vehicle of denunciation or assault, the thing cannot be tolerated. Sir, I am understood to be somewhat an excitable man, but I have never here, on any occasion, made any remark which I am not willing to qualify, and make conformable to the judgment which my responsible position would require of me. I can, as I do, entertain strong feelings, but they shall not find expression in violent threats. Such, I may well appeal to the Senate, has not been my habit. I have been betrayed into remarks not intended.

I rose, however, simply to say that, so far as regards myself, I am perfectly willing that this memorial shall be referred. If we respond to it by saying that the law should not be repealed, I do not think it is going to appease the feeling at the North, according to the expressions made by honorable gentlemen; and if we say it shall be repealed, that certainly will not satisfy the country. Then if the object be to make the issue between the North and the South, let the issue come. Let it come with dignity; let it be met in calmness of spirit. I do not want any of these flaming speeches here, calculated to excite merely—to feed a flame without seeing where it shall extend. No, sir, do not let us involve the country in a contest to be decided by mobs—infuriated by the flaming speeches of servile orators. Let the proud civilization of the country never be committed to the chances of anarchy, let us live together under a constitution, or let us separate with purpose and dignity.

I have said I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to let the memorial be referred; but I wish to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, who presented it, [Mr. ROCKWELL,] a question; and I believe, from the impression which he made on me to-day, that he will answer it. If we repeal the fugitive slave law, will the honorable Senator tell me that Massachusetts will execute the provision of the Constitution without any law of Congress? Suppose we should take away all laws, and devolve upon the different States the duties that properly belong to them, I would ask that Senator whether, under the prevalence of public opinion there, Massachusetts would execute that provision as one of the constitutional members of this Union? Would they send fugitives back to us after trial by jury, or any other mode? Will this honorable Senator [Mr. SUMNER] tell me that he will do it?

Mr. SUMNER. Does the honorable Senator ask me if I would personally join in sending a fellow-man into bondage? "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?"

Mr. BUTLER. These are the prettiest speeches that I ever heard. [Laughter.] He has them turned down in a book by him, I believe, and he has them so elegantly fixed that I cannot reply to them. [Laughter.] They are too delicate for my use. [Renewed laughter.] They are beautiful things; made in a factory of rhetoric somewhat of a peculiar shape. But, I must be permitted to say, not of a definite texture. Now, what does he mean by talking about his not being a dog? [Continued laughter.] What has that to do with the Constitution, or the constitutional obligations of a State? [Laughter.] Well, sir, it was a beautiful sentiment, no doubt, as he thought, and perhaps he imagined he expressed it with Demosthenian abruptness and eloquence. [Laughter.] I asked him whether he would execute the Constitution of the United States without any fugitive slave law, and he answered me, is he a dog—

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator asked me if I would help to reduce a fellow-man to bondage? I answered him.

Mr. BUTLER. Then you would not obey the Constitution. Sir, [turning to Mr. SUMNER,] standing here before this tribunal, where you swore to support it, you rise and tell me that you regard it the office of a dog to enforce it. You stand in my presence, as a coequal Senator, and tell me that it is a dog's office to execute the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. PRATT. Which he has sworn to support.

Mr. SUMNER. I recognize no such obligation.

Mr. BUTLER. I know you do not. But nobody cares about your recognitions as an individual; but as a Senator, and a constitutional representative, you stand differently related to this body. But enough of this.

Mr. MASON. I wish to inquire if a motion has been made to refer this petition?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MASON. I desire most respectfully to know from what quarter that motion came? What honorable Senator made the motion?

Mr. PRATT. The honorable senator from Massachusetts who first spoke, [Mr. ROCKWELL.]

Mr. MASON. The Senator who introduced the petition. I had hoped, Mr. President, after the compact (if I may so express it) which had been entered into between the various States of the Confederacy in enacting this law, that debate would not again have arisen upon it; and I had hoped, also, that the dignity of the American Senate would not have been subjected to the assaults made on it this day by one who is a Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] I say, sir, the dignity of the American Senate has been rudely, wantonly, grossly assailed by a Senator from Massachusetts, and not only the dignity of the Senate, but of the whole people, trifled with in the presence of the American Senate, either ignorantly or corruptly—I do not know which, nor do I care. Sir, that Senator said that the law for the reclamation of fugitive slaves denied to a citizen the privilege of the habeas corpus, which was secured to him by the Constitution. I repeat, such a declaration in reference to that law was made, either ignorantly or corruptly, for corrupt purposes. There is nothing like it in the law. The law does not deny the privilege of the habeas corpus; and if it did, it would have been a dead letter.

Why, sir, the experience under the law is, that the habeas corpus issues, and there is nothing in the law which says to the contrary; and yet the Senator, discharging what, I suppose, he considers his duty to those who sent him here, has had the temerity to declare that this law violated the Constitution in refusing the habeas corpus. Sir, this writ is to inquire only into the legality of the detention, and the law so recognizing it bases its provisions only upon the question of the legality of the detention; and if it is proved that the fugitive was held to service, or labor, and did escape, whether justly so held or no, under the Constitution, he is to be returned whence he escaped. Sir, the proof establishes the legality of the arrest and detention, and is an answer to the writ of habeas corpus; and in this the fugitive slave law does not depart from the policy regulating the administration of all penal law. One arrested as a fugitive from justice is entitled, on his arrest, to a habeas corpus—for what? To determine whether he committed the offense with which he was charged, at the place whence he escaped? Certainly not; but to determine only whether he was so charged in proper form of law to authorize his detention until a trial could be had; and proof that he was so charged is then, also, an answer to the habeas corpus, and he must be remanded without inquiring whether the charge is true or false.

I do not know whether the Senator claims to be a jurist; I know not his position at home; but I know something of his associations there from his language here. Sir, he has denounced a gentleman from Virginia who goes under the protection of the Constitution, and the sanction of the law into his State, to reclaim his property. He has the boldness to speak here of such a man as "a slave-hunter from Virginia." Sir, my constituents need no vindication from me from such a charge, coming from such a quarter. The Senator from Massachusetts, in the use of such vulgar language here, betrays the vulgarity of his associations at home; and shall it be tolerated in the American Senate? Yes, sir, a gentleman from the South, who goes under the protection of that Constitution which the Senator has sworn to support, and which he just now declared he would be a dog to execute or to recognize; a gentleman from Virginia who goes to his State under the protection of the Constitution and the sanction of the law, to reclaim his property, may be subject to vulgar denunciation, but only by vulgar men.

Mr. President, I differ from the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] who said, as I understood him, that this law had not done its office. Sir, it has done its office. To be sure, there are instances where it has been violated by brutal mobs, as there are instances of other laws being evaded by knavery, or silenced by brute force; but I say the law has done its office well, done it on a recent memorable occasion in the very city of Massachusetts which the Senator claims so worthily to represent; but the enlightened patriotism of most of whose citizens, I believe, think of him as I do. In that city, within the last fortnight, it has done its office, and done it in the presence of a mob, which that Senator and his associates roused and inflamed to the very verge of treason, subjecting them to traitors' doom, while he and his associates sat here and kept themselves aloof from danger. Yes, sir, it was executed under these circumstances, and executed by that power that is bound to execute it—the Government of the whole United States.

Mr. President, I did not think I could have been drawn into a debate on this subject. I should not have engaged in it but that I thought it right to vindicate the law from the misconception which was placed on it by the honorable Senator, before the country, in reference to the habeas corpus. But, sir, I may say neither that law nor any other law could require vindication from attacks made by one mad enough to announce to the American Senate and the American people, that although the Constitution provides that fugitives from service shall be surrendered up, he would recognize himself as a dog were he to execute that provision. He has said so in the presence of that American Senate who witnessed his oath to support, protect, and defend that same Constitution, and his appeal to his God to witness the truth and sincerity of his purpose. Why, sir, am I speaking of a fanatic, one whose reason is dethroned! Can such a one expect to make impressions upon the American people from his rapid, vulgar declamation here, accompanied by a declaration that he would violate his oath now recently taken?

Well, sir, that Senator attempted to institute a comparison between the Stamp Act, resisted by our common ancestry, and resistance to the fugitive slave law. Sir, he was well answered by the honorable and distinguished Senator from South Carolina, that in those days the people he represents now were slaveholders. I cannot believe he represents them now, although they are slaveholders no longer. Sir, I think I might venture upon the office of vindicating his own people from the aspersions their representative has cast on them. Let the honorable Senator remember that he says he would be a dog to surrender a fugitive slave, although the Constitution imposes the duty on his State, and he has sworn to obey it.

Let me recall him to that page in our history which shows that, by the vote of Massachusetts, and the other New England States, the interdict was placed in this very Constitution against prohibiting the African slave trade. Sir, the New England States at that day, with Massachusetts at their head, knowing that the first act of the American Congress would be to prohibit the African slave trade, voted, all of them, to take that power from Congress, so as to continue the slave trade for twenty years after its adoption, and up to the year 1808. These are the people whom he dares now to say, before the American Senate, would be depraved, and sinful, and mean, and odious, and dogs, if they recognized even the existence of slavery! What more did they do? Why, sir, they enjoyed that trade, as the carriers of the slaves from Africa, through those twenty years for which they had stipulated in the Constitution. They brought the slaves over, and within a recent period suits have been brought in southern States on bonds executed on the purchase of slaves from these very New England slave importers.

Now, Mr. President, I believe the Senate will agree with me that, unworthy as the occasion may be, it is difficult to be silent; yet, I confess, I almost feel that I owe an apology to the Senate for having spoken in this debate. I know I shall owe an apology to those who sent me here for noticing it from such a quarter and in such a presence.

Mr. PETTIT. I have lived to witness to-day what I had hoped I should not live to witness. I had hoped that the silent clod would have covered me before I should hear fall from the lips of a Senator who had sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, an avowal that he would not support it; an avowal that he disregarded all such obligations, that it was as dross with him.

Mr. President, I have no objection to the reception, or the proposed reference of this petition. I have always maintained the unlimited right of the people to memorialize or petition Congress in any form, for any object that might be constitutionally acted upon here. That we may constitutionally repeal, or modify the existing, or any other fugitive slave law, there can be no doubt. That the law as it is, is constitutional, I entertain no doubt. That we have the constitutional power to make it less rigid, or more rigid, or to abrogate it entirely, there can be no question. The proposed reference of the petition is, I think, the legitimate one. However ready I may be to say that I would not grant the prayer of a petition which is sent here, I cannot be induced to throw the least barrier in the way of the reception and proper reference of any petition in regard to any subject upon which we may constitutionally and legitimately act.

Nay, sir, I go further. I believe that to-day, if the people of Massachusetts, or the people of any other portion of this country, should send in a petition, and it should be laid upon your table, and its reference moved to the Judiciary Committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, praying that this body should expel a member who had sworn to support the Constitution—the sacred bond of our Union—and in our faces, in open Senate, had disowned it, and positively asserted that he would not enforce it, I should vote for its reception, I should vote for its reference, but I will not say how I should report on it, though I am inclined to think I should report in favor of granting their prayer and expelling that member.

Sir, Senators are not to be tolerated here, who, openly and boldly, in the face of the country and of the Senate, say that they would violate their oaths. Sir, [addressing Mr. SUMNER,] in stepping to that desk, laying your hand upon the Gospel of God, swearing that you would support the Constitution, and placing the book to your lips, giving seal and assurance that your heart as well as your lips acquiesced in what you said, you made no reservation of any clause, any article, any section, any line, or any word. No mental reservation could be allowed. You swore that you would support all and singular, each and every part from beginning to end, the commencement and the ending inclusive; and you now in the face of your peers—peers, did I say, I hate to use the word—are the first in the Senate of the United States to openly declare you would violate the oath you have taken, and the bond of Union your ancestors made for you.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will address the Chair.

Mr. PETTIT. I am certainly not out of order. I say if such a petition or memorial were sent here, I should be willing to receive and refer it, and if referred to my committee, I should be willing to act on it, though I will not say how I would act. It is suggested to me that he could not have taken his seat if he had made such a reservation at the time of taking the oath, and that he ought not to hold it after he makes the reservation.

Mr. President, I should have taken no part in this discussion, but for a reference made to me by the Senator from Massachusetts, an allusion understood by every Senator, and by the country. I have not uttered here or elsewhere anything to retract. I have nothing to withdraw. "I never tread backwards," but always go onward, unless I meet a barrier that stops me. That Senator has said that if those things go on, it will become a common saying, as it has already been said on this floor, that the Declaration of Independence is a self-evident lie.

Mr. President, let me for a moment turn you to that clause of the Declaration of Independence to which reference is made. What is it? "We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal"—not born equal, as many say and as many state it in the newspapers—"that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." In a speech which I made here some time ago, upon the Nebraska bill, I said that the construction put upon this clause of the Declaration of Independence by the Abolitionists of the country, made it a self-evident lie instead of a self-evident truth. From that position I do not withdraw, but I boldly assert it again.

Sir, Mr. Jefferson, in penning that instrument, was not talking about individuals; he was not talking of the Senator or his progenitors from Massachusetts; he was not talking about the white or the black race, the Caucasian or the African race; but he was talking about aggregated, congregated bodies, collections, and associations of men. He had reference to collections of men when they had become sufficiently numerous to form independent States. Then it was, according to his ideas, that they, as collections and associations of men, had equal political rights with all other similar associations or collections of men. In no other light did Jefferson ever dream that he was speaking in that portion of the Declaration. Will you say to me that Mr. Jefferson, himself a slaveholder, the descendant of a European, would stultify himself by saying that his African negro slave, who was born his slave, created his slave, begotten his slave, who was his slave during the whole course of gestation, was created his, Jefferson's, equal? He never dreamed of such a thing.

Sir, the Senator named an African who was among the first that was slain in the contest for freedom in the streets of Boston. I will not pretend to say whether that African was the superior of the Senator from Massachusetts, or the Senator his superior; but they were not, in my judgment, equals in life or equals in death. They were not harmonious and beautiful in life, nor will they be equally beautiful in death.

Now, sir, to give this clause of the Declaration of Independence any other construction than that which I have given it, is an evident, a self-evident, a palpable lie. What is the language? That "all men are created equal." Are they created equally tall, equally broad, equally long, equally short? Are they created politically equal? Are they created physically equal? Are they created mentally equal? Are they created morally equal? I say, in no one of these several instances are all men created equal. You cannot go beyond the moment when they first respire their native air. At that time you see presented to you the imbecile in mind, weak in body, dwarf in size; while, beside him, the same day's birth, you see power, greatness, strength, wisdom, and beauty. In no one instance, therefore, is there perfect equality among men, if you regard them as individuals. As nations, as collections of men, they have a right to perfect equality as to the formation of their government, and the rights and domestic duties that shall be established among them. I ask that Senator—you, who to-day have stultified yourself—you, who have said that the solemn oath which you took at that stand, administered by the President of this body upon the holy Evangelists of God, kissing the book, giving seal and sanction to your asseveration—you, who have said to-day that you would spit upon that oath, would disregard its obligations—

Mr. SUMNER. Never! never!

Mr. PETTIT. You, who denied it; denied its power to bind you; you, who said you would not maintain the Constitution of the United States—

Mr. SUMNER. I said I recognized no obligation in the Constitution of the United States to bind me to help to reduce a man to slavery.

Mr. PETTIT. I ask you, do you claim to be the equal of your revolutionary sires?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must address the Chair, not the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. PETTIT. I ask the Chair, then, whether the Senator from Massachusetts, with this odium on his lips, is the equal of his revolutionary sires? I do not know that he had any, properly speaking, but I take it in a State point of view. Is he the equal of Adams, of Hancock, of Warren, who was the first martyr in the great cause of liberty, of freedom, and union; whose blood was the first to cement the union of these States, on Bunker's hill, to which he has referred? Are you the equal of those men? Is he, sir, the equal of those men? I had rather ask you, Mr. President, for I think you would answer "no," and he might answer "yes."

Now, Mr. President, I come down to later times. There is no distinction between moral, physical, political, and mental equality, if you take the language literally as it reads. I ask that Senator, then, or I ask you, sir, whether that Senator is the equal of the late lamented Daniel Webster, who preceded him here long years ago—and it would have been well for the country if he had remained here in his seat to this day? Is that Senator the equal, mentally, morally, physically, or religiously, of that deceased and illustrious man? When will the Senator get to himself the proud reputation of the "Expounder of the Constitution," "the Godlike Daniel," the mighty giant intellect of Webster? He will get to himself, instead, the odious, withering, blighting, and blistering name of "contemner and despiser of the Constitution, who refused to maintain, support, and indorse it." Does that Senator pretend to say that, mentally, there is no difference? You might as well interpolate "mentally" as "politically." You might as well say that all men are created mentally equal as to say that all men are created politically equal. Neither of those words is in it; and, therefore, it applies as much to mental as it does to political equality.

Sir, men come to the earth, they make their appearance upon it, with mental powers, but with no political rights, and I may therefore say with more propriety that Jefferson intended to say they were created mentally instead of politically equal. At the earliest creation there are evidences of mentality without any political rights whatever. Then is the Senator the equal of Webster, who has left a name, a monument, and a fame, I will not say unsurpassable, but unequaled in strength, and power, and durability by any other American Senator? I believe that as a mere mental man—and I speak of him in no other capacity—Webster had not his equal on this continent, if he had in Europe, or upon any other continent. Is that Senator his equal? He might as well say that the jackal is the equal of the lion, or that the buzzard is the equal of the eagle.

When you, sir, [addressing Mr. SUMNER] find no man beneath you; when those who are near you—your own class of men—can find no man beneath you; when you shall claim as your equal the man who rolls in the gutter, whom God has deprived in his own organization and creation of all mental power and capacity; when you shall claim that he who wallows in the gutter with the vilest and most worthless is your equal, then your interpretation of the doctrine is true. Let me go further. If the Almighty even intended to create the Senator the equal with the mighty and lamented Webster, I must be allowed to say that He made a gross blunder and a most egregious mistake. How, then, is it that men are all equal, and are created equal? When we first see them, they are unequal. They grow up unequal. They have not equal political rights. Will that Senator say that this equality consists in political rights? Then he says that the serf of the Autocrat of Russia is his equal in everything and he the serf's equal. If so, they ought to change stations, perhaps. I say they are not equal, and were not created equal.

Was that Senator, created as such a member of this great Republic and Confederation, and yet was he created no more than equal with the southern slave upon a southern plantation? Was he created precisely equal with the most ignorant of the ignorant hordes that inhabit any portion of the habitable globe? Was he created only equal with the veriest and lowest serfs of the Emperor Nicholas? When the time shall come when he avows that there is no degradation, no weakness of intellect, no physical, moral, or mental development beneath his own, then he may assert the truth of his dogma and his declaration. Sir, I am inclined to believe that, in a moral point of view, that Senator cannot find one beneath himself, taking his own declaration to day. He who will swear here in this body, appealing to God for the truth of what he says, to support the Constitution of the Union, and then boldly proclaim that he will not do it, has sunk, in my estimation, to a depth of humiliation and degradation which it would not be enviable for the veriest serf or the lowest of God's creation to occupy. It may be in that point of view the Senator regards all others as his equal; but there are some who are not willing to regard that Senator as their equal, and who will never be coerced into any such admission.

Mr. DIXON obtained the floor, but yielded at the solicitation of several Senators; and
The Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 26, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

MARTHA WASHINGTON CASE.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is a motion to suspend the rules, laying over from Monday last, for the purpose of allowing the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Bliss] to introduce a bill "to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to appoint a special agent to investigate and bring to justice certain offenders against the laws of the United States, and making an appropriation of $15,000 for that purpose."

The bill, which was read for information, provides that, whereas, there is probable cause to believe that an extensive combination exists in the western States, having for its object the commission of crimes against the laws of the United States; and in pursuance of which, such crimes have been committed; therefore, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to appoint a special agent, at such compensation as he may deem proper, to investigate and bring to justice the said offenders, and for that purpose the sum of $15,000 is appropriated: Provided, That the said duties of said special agent shall determine on the 1st of July, 1856, and that the Secretary shall report to Congress an account of the disposition of said sum.

The question was then taken upon the motion to suspend the rules; and it was decided in the negative—two thirds not voting in favor thereof.

SURVEYS IN ALABAMA.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE, by unanimous consent, introduced the following joint resolution; which was read a first and second time by its title:

Joint resolution directing the connection of the public surveys in Alabama with the boundary line between the States of Alabama and Florida.

Mr. ABERCROMBIE. The object of the resolution is to have surveyed the lands on the boundary line between Alabama and Florida. The line between these two States has been recently settled and acquiesced in upon the part of both States. The section lines have not been extended to the boundary lines upon the part of Alabama. On the part of Florida, this work has been done. I now desire to give authority to the General Land Office here to have these surveys made. There is no conflict of interests. There is no appropriation necessary to carry out the work. I have been written to by constituents to get these surveys made, that they may be enabled to purchase a portion of those lands. I hope there will be no objection made to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. HAVEN. This resolution makes no appropriation. It is only to have surveys made. I hope it will be passed.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

THE LATE MEXICAN TREATY.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose now, if the House will indulge me, to move a suspension of the rules for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with a view of taking up House bill (No. 405) to enable the President to execute the third article of the recent treaty with Mexico. We have a very short time in which we can act upon that bill, and I hope that the House will act upon it in one way or the other at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. PECKHAM. Before that motion is put, I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if not inconsistent with the public interests, to communicate to this House copies of all instructions to our Minister to Mexico, Mr. Gadsden, and of all correspondence between this Government and him, touching or concerning the treaty between this Government and Mexico, of the 30th of December last, and the subject-matter thereof.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to that resolution. It comes here too late for the House to act upon it.

Mr. PECKHAM. I move to suspend the rules, for the purpose of enabling me to offer it.

The SPEAKER. There is already a motion pending to suspend the rules to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, which will take precedence of the gentleman's motion. Both motions being of equal dignity, the one first made must be first put.

Mr. BENTON. I have a question to make which, I think, will take precedence of both motions. I propose now to make the motion of which I gave notice some days ago, of the privileges of this House. It is one which, I apprehend, takes precedence of all other motions, and especially does it take precedence of that now made, to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of taking up this bill. If I am right in my apprehension of the dignity and of the obligations which attach to the privilege I shall plead, I will go on and state my motion.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman's motion before he decides as to the question of privilege.

Mr. BENTON. I have reduced to writing the points of privilege which I make to the House, in order to avoid any misconception or misapprehension.

Resolved, That the House will not consider the question of appropriating $10,000,000 to carry into effect the Mexican treaty of December 30, 1853, for the acquisition of foreign territory, until it shall first have considered whether there was a breach of the privileges of this House in negotiating and concluding said treaty; nor until after the House shall have obtained full information on the negotiation and conclusion of said treaty.

Resolved, That the said treaty, depending for its execution on a law of Congress to be passed on a subject submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives to deliberate on the expediency or in expediency of carrying such treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good.

That is copied from the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives, in the year 1796, after President Washington had refused to communicate papers to the House on that subject.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman is through with his question of privilege—

[Cries of "Wait until he is heard on it!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. As far as the gentleman has gone, I desire the decision of the Chair.

[Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. I am in order, and I know what I am doing. I have a right to state my point to the Chair.

Mr. BENTON. Certainly.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, sir, I want the decision of the Speaker whether the question of the gentleman from Missouri is such a question of privilege as will arrest the privileged motion which I have submitted for the adoption of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair prefers first to hear the additional resolution. There were three of them, as the gentleman from Missouri announced. The Chair will then be able to decide at once.

Under the circumstances, the gentleman from Missouri will excuse the Chair from indicating that remarks should be dispensed with until the question of order or privilege is presented.

Mr. BENTON. Yes, sir; good. The third resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the admission of new States into the Union being a question exclusively granted to Congress by the Constitution, any treaty stipulation for the acquisition of foreign territory with a right to be admitted as a State, without authorization from Congress, is a breach of the privileges of that body, a violation of the Constitution, and illegal and void.

Resolved, That a purchase of foreign territory by the Federal Government not having been provided for in the Constitution, a concurrence of the legislative and executive departments of the Government—the former by an act of Congress, the latter by a treaty stipulation—is necessary to the consummation of the act, and has been so held in the purchase of Louisiana, Florida, and California.

Resolved, That the House of Representatives has a right to the information which would enable it to judge the merits of the Mexican treaty in its legislative consideration thereof; and that the President be respectfully requested to furnish to the House of Representatives a copy of the instructions under which the same was negotiated, and of the correspondence to which it gave rise, and of all other papers connected with the subject—the said copies to be communicated confidentially, if, in the opinion of the President, the public good may not admit of their present publication.

These are the points, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the matter introduced by the gentleman from Missouri is rather for the consideration of the body, in connection with the bill referred to, than for the decision of the Chair, as a question of privilege. If, for any reason, the gentleman from Missouri should propose to impeach the President of the United States, or any other officer, it would not be for the Chair to inquire into the validity of the reasons given; but the proposition itself would involve a question of high privilege, and would take precedence. The Chair, therefore, overrules the question of privilege made by the gentleman from Missouri, being unable to see in the papers presented any question of privilege, as the gentleman from Missouri has done.

The question now recurs upon the motion made by the gentleman from Alabama, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Would it be in order to move a suspension of the rules to enable the honorable gentleman from Missouri to submit his question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. There is already pending a motion to suspend the rules, which will take precedence of any motion to suspend for another purpose.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I suggest, then, that after that motion is disposed of, a motion be made to suspend the rules, to enable the gentleman from Missouri to submit his question of privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would inquire whether it would not be in order to move to suspend the rules, to enable the House to consider a resolution which may be offered?

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order. The Chair, upon a former occasion, stated that a motion to suspend the rules to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and a motion to suspend the rules for the introduction of a bill, or for any other purpose, were of equal dignity, and would be so considered by the Chair, and put in the order of time in which they were made.

Mr. WASHBURN. I would ask the Chair if he did not decide, that inasmuch as the rules of the House could not be suspended except upon Monday, a motion for that purpose would take precedence?

The SPEAKER. The Chair only indicated at the moment such a view of the subject, but corrected it very soon after he made the decision.

SWAMP LANDS.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. I desire the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] to yield me the floor for a few minutes to make a statement. It has no relation to the matter now before the House. I have received some information lately, which renders it necessary that I should go home at an early day. What I desire to say will not occupy more than four or five minutes; and probably I may not trouble the House soon, if at all, during the remainder of the session.

[Cries of "Agreed!" "Agreed!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection to the gentleman from Tennessee being allowed to make the statement he desires to make, if it gives rise to no debate.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. It is merely to make a statement.

General assent was expressed by the House.

Mr. ETHERIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House that I hold in my hand a paper which, had it been forwarded to me at an earlier day, I should have taken great pleasure in presenting to this body. It did not reach me, however, until this morning. It is the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, adopted in February, 1854. It relates to a subject which I shall bring before the House whenever I can do so consistently with the other public business which is now before us, and which, under the rules, will have to be first considered. I beg leave to state the contents of the paper very briefly, and let it go to the Clerk's desk. I will not insist on its being read.

The House will recollect that some time ago Congress ceded to the States of Missouri and Arkansas a vast quantity of low swamp lands. In consequence of such cession, these States have leveed the right bank of the Mississippi river, and the result has been to increase the amount of overflow on the left bank of the river. In consequence thereof, a large number of my constituents have been materially injured by means of the increased quantity of water thrown on their lands in that portion of Tennessee. The Legislature of the State has therefore adopted a memorial praying Congress to take the matter into consideration.

I will simply say that the action of Congress, in ceding these lands to Arkansas and Missouri, and which led to leveeing the right bank of the Mississippi river, opposite the State of Tennessee, has caused great injury to that portion of my constituents who own lands on the left bank of the Mississippi river; and at the proper time, when I can do so consistently with the other public business, I shall bring the matter before the House, and shall most respectfully ask the House to take the whole subject into consideration. In the mean time I content myself with simply presenting this memorial, and asking that it may be printed, and, for the present, referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

It was so ordered.

Mr. PECKHAM. I would ask the Chair whether, after we have got into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, either of these resolutions offered by the gentleman from Missouri and myself can be introduced or adopted?

The SPEAKER. Neither of them can be adopted after the House has gone into committee.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. Houston; and it was agreed to.

The House thereupon resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Disney in the chair.)

THE MEXICAN TREATY.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill be laid aside for the present, and that the committee take up bill of this House, No. 405, "to enable the President of the United States to execute the third article of the recent treaty with Mexico."

Mr. PECKHAM. I would inquire if that bill is the bill next in order upon the Calendar after the civil and diplomatic bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not.

Mr. PECKHAM. Then I ask if it is in order for the committee to lay aside all the bills before that one by one motion?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I inquire of the Chair whether it is in order to lay aside this bill, and take up the bill indicated by the gentleman from Alabama, without previously laying aside all the other bills, one at a time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark, that it will be found that, according to the 80th rule of the House, appropriation bills have precedence over all other bills on the Calendar. They stand in the position of privileged bills.

Mr. WASHBURN. I ask that the rule may be read.

The rule was read, as follows:

"General appropriation bills shall be in order in preference to any other bills of a public nature, unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House."

Mr. WASHBURN. My inquiry is, whether this bill is to be regarded in the light of a general appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has no hesitation in deciding that it is.

The Chair will hold, in the present case, that the first question pending before the committee is upon the motion to lay aside the civil and diplomatic bill. If that question should be decided in the affirmative, the question will then arise, according to the rule just read, upon laying aside such general appropriation bills as stand upon the Calendar, intervening between the civil and diplomatic bill and the bill indicated by the gentleman from Alabama; and all other bills, being inferior bills, will be passed over as a matter of course.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay aside the civil and diplomatic bill; and it was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I now move to take up bill No. 405.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is under the impression that the true construction of the 80th rule will require a special motion to dispose of the bills intervening between the civil and diplomatic bill and bill No. 405, to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think if the Chair will reflect a moment he will agree with me in my view of this matter. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or any gentleman who has the management of an appropriation bill, has been, by universal consent and the practice of this House, allowed to indicate the bill he desired to take up. Such has been the universal practice. The appropriation bills have precedence over other bills; and the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has always been allowed the privilege of indicating the order in which he desires to have them taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands what the practice has been; but objection being now made to such disposition of the bills upon the Calendar, the Chair is compelled to carry out the proper construction of the rule, as he understands it.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The latter clause of the 78th rule settles that matter. The rule says:

"In preparing bills of appropriations for other objects, the Committee of Ways and Means shall not include appropriations for carrying into effect treaties made by the United States; and where an appropriation bill shall be referred to them for their consideration which contains appropriations for carrying a treaty into effect, and for other objects, they shall propose such amendments as shall prevent appropriations for carrying a treaty into effect being included in the same bill with appropriations for other objects."

Mr. HOUSTON. I think there is no objection. I hope the Chair will put the question upon taking up the bill I have indicated.

The question was put; and the motion was agreed to.

House bill (No. 405) "to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic, of the 30th of December, 1853, as amended by the Senate of the United States," was accordingly taken up and read in extenso.

It provides that $10,000,000 be appropriated, to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the stipulation in the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic, of December 30, 1853, as subsequently amended by the Senate of the United States; of which sum $7,000,000 are to be paid on the exchange of the ratifications of said treaty, and the remaining $3,000,000 as soon as the boundary line shall be surveyed, marked, and established.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to amend the bill by striking out all after the word "treaty," in the eleventh line, as follows:

And the remaining three millions as soon as the boundary line shall be surveyed, marked, and established.

Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of opening up the bill, in the proper form, for discussion. The bill which has just been read, as well as the message of the President of the United States accompanying the treaty, were laid upon the tables of the members of the House on Friday or Saturday last; and, therefore, it would be useless for me to remind the committee that, according to the stipulations of the treaty itself, the ratifications have to be exchanged by the 30th of this month, thus leaving but a very few days for the action of this House in making the appropriation proposed in this bill, if the House intend to make it at all. I offer these remarks for the purpose of claiming the indulgence of the House for a speedy action upon the bill. If they propose to make the appropriation, it must be made before the 30th of June.

I have the right, under the rules, to open the debate on this bill, as well as to close it; but, considering the circumstances, and as I desire to make an appeal to the House to terminate general discussion on the measure so early as to-morrow morning, I shall forbear any remark now, in the commencement of any investigation which may grow out of this appropriation, intending to reply at the close of the debate to such objections as may be presented by gentlemen opposed to the bill. I have moved the amendment; it is now in order to debate the bill, and I yield the floor to other gentlemen.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I want to make one motion. I do not expect to make a speech on the bill; but I now submit the motion to strike out the enacting clause of it, not with any view of defeating the measure—for I expect to vote for it—but in order that no other motions may be made until we get through it.

I said that I expected to vote for this bill, not, however, because I believe that I am bound to vote the money because the President and Senate of the United States have made a treaty with Mexico, in which it is promised to be paid that nation. I entertain no such doctrines. I hold that I am as free, that every member of this body, and that the House itself, is as free in voting on this bill, to reject it if the treaty does not meet their approbation, as to reject the most trifling and ordinary appropriation which may be brought into Congress. I shall vote for it, not in consideration of the small amount of land that we are to get, but because the treaty abrogates the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of February, 1848, and releases us from all the obligations, real and supposed, and all the applications and harassments for depredations committed by the Indians from our side of the line. It is to get clear of our obligations under the eleventh article of that treaty of 1848 that I shall vote for this bill, and not because I feel myself at all bound to do it because the treaty has been made.

Mr. GROW obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. BENTON, who said he thought the points presented were entitled to the greatest consideration. He alluded to the fact that when the Federal Government was framed, many objected to the Constitution. The sagacious Patrick Henry said that it gave the sword and the purse to the Executive. He meant the unlimited power of raising money, and navies, and armies. With respect to the purse, there is a constitutional clause which confides to this House the power of originating burdens on the people. This power has existed in England from the time of the Saxon invasion. He was free to say he knew nothing worth saving in the Constitution, if the President and the Senate can take, when they please, the money of the people. Nothing, so help him God, is worth saving of the Constitution, if this power is taken away, as the bill before the committee proposes. If anything he could say would induce the Representatives of the people to think on this subject, he should think it one of the most glorious days of his political life, and should rejoice in the circumstance which brought him here this day to plead the privileges of the people and the Constitution; to plead for the only thing which, being lost, he held nothing in the Constitution was worth preserving.

He contended, in the course of his remarks, that when a treaty acts on a subject within the legislative power of the House, the House has the authority and duty to examine all the circumstances, and consider into the expediency or in expediency of the treaty precisely as the public good requires.

He argued the constitutional power in relation to treaties, severely commenting on the message of the President communicating the recent treaty, saying the message did nothing in the world but demand the check of the House for ten millions of dollars, and that at brief notice and without days of grace. Give me the money by to-morrow; that is like "stand and deliver." He considered that the President, in negotiating this treaty, had invaded the privileges of this House.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, obtained the floor.

Mr. BENTON. I move an amendment in relation to this $10,000,000.

Mr. BAYLY. I believe I have the floor; but I have every disposition to indulge the gentleman from Missouri, if it does not come out of my time. I have no objection to his continuing his speech, always supposing a similar privilege will be extended to me.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to that. I want no similar privileges granted.

Mr. BOCOCK. Has not the gentleman from Missouri a right to move an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has exhausted the hour allotted to him under the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Besides that, there is a proposition pending to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, which supersedes all other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee as making that motion, but merely as indicating his intention to make it hereafter.

Mr. JONES. I made the motion distinctly.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If that motion is pending, I wish to raise a question of order. I did not understand the gentleman from Tennessee as submitting it.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JUNE 27, 1854.

NEW SERIES.....No. 96.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised by the Clerk that the gentleman from Tennessee did make the motion.

Mr. JONES. I did make the motion, and I made it for the purpose of preventing any member, after making an hour speech, from moving an amendment, and thereby being enabled to go on and make another hour speech.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the motion is entertained, I rise to a question of order.

Mr. ORR. This question of order cannot arise now. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] is upon the floor, and the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] does not come up now for action.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the point of order, and decide it upon its merits.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My point is, that that motion to strike out the enacting clause cannot be made in Committee of the Whole, because it is in conflict with an express rule which provides that a bill shall be read over, and be subject to amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that the point of order cannot be considered now, because the motion to which the gentleman alludes was made some time since, and the question is not now pending.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not rise to a question of order at the time the motion was made, because the Chair did not state the motion to the committee, and because it was understood that the gentleman from Tennessee only gave notice of it; and the Chair has this moment said that he did not understand that the motion was made. And now, the very first moment after the Chair announces to the committee that such a motion is entertained, I raise the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to add, that so far as the merits of the point of order are concerned, the Chair rules it decidedly against the gentleman from Ohio. By the rules of this House, as well as by the lex parliamentaria generally, motions to amend all matters under consideration are in order at the proper times. A motion to amend by striking out the first section is also in order in its proper time; and a motion to strike out the enacting clause, covering all other amendments, is privileged, because it embraces them all in one question; and thus the motion to strike out the enacting clause being considered and disposed of, if in the affirmative, precludes the necessity of considering all pending amendments; if decided in the negative, it leaves the pending amendments for consideration, and leaves the matter open for discussion. Thus, in either case, motions pending are not prejudiced by first considering the privileged motion to strike out the enacting clause. The Chair accordingly rules that such a motion is in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I take an appeal from that decision of the Chair. I never have known any precedent for it, except upon the Nebraska bill, when the honorable gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] made the motion. I think it is an important point to have settled, looking to the legislation of the future. I ask that the rule may be read which provides that bills referred to the Committee of the Whole shall be read and considered section by section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, for the information of the gentleman, that the 119th rule provides, in express language, that a motion to strike out the enacting clause shall take precedence of all motions to amend.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish the rule read which provides that all bills in the Committee of the Whole shall be read, and then considered section by section. I have it in my hand, and, with the consent of the committee, will read it myself; and then I will show that the rule just cited by the Chair refers to the action of the House proper, and not to the action of the Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman desires to debate the appeal, the Chair will first state the question. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr.

JONES] moved to amend the pending bill by striking out the enacting clause. The gentleman from Ohio takes exception to this motion, upon the ground that there are no precedents, and upon the ground that it is in conflict with another rule which he read to the committee. The Chair overrules the question of order, upon the ground that a rule of the House expressly declares that the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee shall take precedence of all motions to amend. The gentleman from Ohio appeals from this decision, and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. CAMPBELL. I now read the 127th rule, to which I have referred. It is as follows:

"Upon bills committed to a Committee of the Whole House, the bill shall be first read throughout by the Clerk, and then again read and debated by clauses, leaving the preamble to be last considered: the body of the bill shall not be defaced or interlined; but all amendments, noting the page and line, shall be duly entered by the Clerk on a separate paper, as the same shall be agreed to by the committee, and so reported to the House. After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses, before a question to engross it be taken."—April 7, 1789.

Now, I desire to propound to the Chair the question whether it is not his duty, and the duty of the House, in giving a construction to its rules, to construe them so that all the rules may stand when there is a seeming conflict between them? Now, if the decision of the Chair, that a motion to strike out the enacting clause of a bill is in order in Committee of the Whole be correct, I ask if it does not amend and abolish the rule I have just read? I maintain that the 119th rule is applicable to the action of the House only, and not to that of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask how this discussion came before the committee? Is not my colleague [Mr. BAYLY] entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. There is an appeal from the decision of the Chair pending.

Mr. SMITH. Is the gentleman from Ohio in order in debating the question?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to debate the question.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, I wish to call the attention of the Chair to the connection in which the rule just read stands with the original rule of which it was formerly a part. I regret that this point has been presented to-day, although, believing that it is of very questionable propriety to allow the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to strike out the enacting clause of a bill referred to them, and thus to cut off all amendments, there was a consultation between some of the members of the Committee on Rules as to the expediency of reporting a new rule forbidding any such thing in Committee of the Whole, in case it should be decided that it may now be done. This is not the proper time for stating the reasons for our opinions.

But, sir, as the question is raised—a question involving the correct construction of the rules of the House—I beg leave to state to the Chair that the rule which was just now read was adopted as early as 1822. He will find by referring to it that the date of its original enactment is 1822. Now I shall read from Jefferson's Manual, or rather from the rules of the House bound up with Jefferson's Manual—the volume brought here by the honorable gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON]—I shall read, I say, the original rule, for the purpose of showing that from the whole context, that part of it relied on by the Chair was obviously intended to apply only to proceedings in the House, and not to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. BAYLY. Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to his colleague?

Mr. MILLSON. I wish first to read the rule to which I refer.

Mr. BAYLY. I beg to know how the floor was taken from me after I was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will explain. By his inadvertence the pending question was omitted to be stated to the committee. In endeavoring to correct that error, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CAMPBELL] rose to a question of order as to the propriety and legality of that question. The Chair decided the point of order against the gentleman, and the gentleman from Virginia has the floor, pending the appeal from the decision of the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. MILLSON. These rules are contained in a book printed in the year 1837. A part of the rule which I am now about to read will be found in the exact language of the rule read from the Chair, but is in a different connection. I read it merely for the purpose of showing that when that rule was originally made in 1822, it was intended to apply only to proceedings in the House, and not to those in the Committee of the Whole. It is as follows:

"When a question is under debate no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lie on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged. And no motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, or to postpone indefinitely, being decided, shall be again allowed on the same day, and at the same stage of the bill or proposition. A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be considered equivalent to its rejection."

Here, sir, it appears that the rule on which the Chair has just decided this motion to be in order, is found in immediate connection with provisions obviously applicable to the House, and not the Committee of the Whole.

Let me analyze its provisions for a moment. When a question is under debate, what is to be done? "No motion shall be received but to adjourn;" that cannot be done in committee. "To lie on the table;" that cannot be done in committee. "For the previous question;" that cannot be demanded in committee. "To postpone to a day certain;" that cannot be done in committee. "To commit;" that cannot be done in committee. "To amend;" that may be done in committee, but in the House also. "To postpone indefinitely;" that cannot be done in committee. "Which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged." And so the rule goes on:

"A motion to strike out the enacting words of a bill shall have precedence of a motion to amend; and, if carried, shall be equivalent to its rejection."

It is clear to my mind that the rule contemplated proceedings in the House exclusively, unless we can suppose that it intended to authorize a Committee of the Whole to adjourn, and demand the previous question, as well as to strike out the enacting words of a bill.

For these reasons, I contend that it is not in order, in Committee of the Whole, to move to strike out the enacting clause of a bill; and it was so held some time during the last Congress, when I myself inadvertently submitted such a motion. I regret that the question has arisen at this time; for I would prefer that the more important questions involved in the bill under consideration should be discussed without interruption. Believing, however, that the motion made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] is out of order, I shall vote to sustain the appeal which has been taken from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I should like to have the 34th rule read, which was adopted some twenty years after the 119th rule, and which seems to me to place this question beyond all doubt.

The 34th rule was then read, as follows:

"34. No member shall occupy more than one hour in debate on any question in the House, or in committee; but a member reporting the measure under consideration from a committee may open and close the debate: provided, that where debate is closed by order of the House, any member shall be allowed, in committee, five minutes to explain any amendment he may offer, after which any member who shall first obtain the floor shall be allowed to speak five minutes in opposition to it, and there shall be no further debate on the amendment; but the same privilege on debate shall be allowed in favor of and against any amendment that may be offered to the amendment; and neither the amendment nor an amendment to the amendment shall be withdrawn by the mover thereof, unless by the unanimous consent of the committee."

Mr. WASHBURN. It seems to me to be very clearly implied from that rule that any member in Committee of the Whole has a right to offer an amendment, and to speak upon it, which right he certainly cannot have if the 119th rule is to be construed as the Chair has now construed it. It is clearly inconsistent with the 119th rule. I would like to call the attention of the Chair to this fact, that if the decision of the Chair is sustained now, it is competent for a majority at any time, whether in committee or in the House, to suspend all debate upon any question, no matter how important it may be. In the House, the previous question can be called by a majority. In the House, by a majority, debate may be terminated at any time; and now, in Committee of the Whole, under this construction of the rules, all debate may be terminated under the five-minute rule; so that it is competent for a majority at any time, in the House or in committee, to stifle all discussion upon the most important questions that can possibly come before the House and the country.

This is a question of that character—a question upon which many gentlemen, undoubtedly, desire to speak, and many to obtain information. I would like to say something about it, and I do not like the reflection that a new decision made here would deprive me, and those interested in the question, of the right of expressing our opinions in regard to it, or of the privilege of deriving information from others. This treaty may be correct. It may be one which I ought to vote for; but I want to know what it is; and I want to know something in relation to the reasons which have induced the President and Senate to make it.

I have alluded to this thing, Mr. Chairman, not perhaps strictly in order, but as showing how important questions—questions of the deepest importance—may come up, and, if this decision is enforced, we will have to vote upon them without an opportunity being afforded to any man here to say one word in relation to them. Questions involving the existence of the nation; questions of the highest importance; questions of the greatest interest to the whole country, may be, if this construction of the rule be sustained, carried through this House without affording an opportunity to any man to say a word. For this reason, I think that the decision of the Chair cannot be consistent with the rules of the House—cannot be consistent with any rules which the House ever, at any time, meant to adopt, and cannot be correct.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The rule which the gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] cites—the 34th rule—has nothing to do with the merits of this case. That rule secures to every member, when in Committee of the Whole, the right to offer any amendment he may desire, which is in order, and make a five-minute speech upon it. It does not secure to him the right to offer any amendment which is not in order. Well, if this be the rule of the House, that a member may offer an amendment when it is in order, of course it does not follow that any such right is thereby secured to offer an amendment and speak upon it when it is not in order. So much for the argument of the gentleman from Maine. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MILLSON] says it is not in order to move to strike out the enacting words of a bill when in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The 119th rule, he says, does not apply to the Committee of the Whole. This is his position. He admits that it does apply to the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I beg to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia, and of this committee, to the 134th rule of the House, which expressly says that all the rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in a Committee of the Whole House so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking. Here it is:

"134. The rules of proceedings in the House shall be observed in Committee of the Whole House so far as they may be applicable, except the rule limiting the times of speaking, (April 7, 1789;) but no member shall speak twice to any question until every member choosing to speak shall have spoken."—December 17, 1805.

This is one of the oldest rules of this House.

Mr. WASHBURN. But I ask the gentleman from Georgia whether the 34th rule does not imply a right, on the part of any member, to move an amendment which is in order?

Mr. STEPHENS. It does, or at least it has nothing in it restrictive of such right.

Mr. WASHBURN. Then, if there is another rule which declares that no amendment shall be in order, are not these rules inconsistent?

Mr. STEPHENS. If the gentleman will allow me to say, if a member gets the floor, and makes a motion, under the rules, in order, which, under the rules, cuts off any other motion to amend, and brings the House to a vote on the question, of course there is no inconsistency in the rules which provide for this proceeding. That is my answer to the question of the gentleman from Maine. It would not be in order, after a member had got the floor, and, under the 119th rule, made a motion which would cut off a motion to amend, to make the latter motion, until the committee had voted on the first one; and if a majority of the committee should vote in favor of the motion provided for by the 119th rule, then all further amendments and motions to amend would be cut off. That is the rule of the House. Any gentleman has the right to offer an amendment, so long as it is in order under the rules of the House; but he is not permitted to offer a single motion which is not in order, unless by unanimous consent. Now the gentleman who preceded him in this argument [Mr. CAMPBELL] says, as did the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] that the 119th rule is only intended to apply to the House, and not to Committee of the Whole. I am astonished at that statement. Why, sir, here is the 134th rule. I have read it. The 119th rule is one of the rules of this House. Why is it not applicable in Committee of the Whole? Where is it excepted? Show the exception?

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is not for the reason that it conflicts with the 127th rule, and makes that void and of no effect.

Mr. STEPHENS. The 127th rule does not apply to the point in this controversy at all, and in no way conflicts either with the 119th or 134th rules. I will read it. Here it is:

"Upon bills committed to a Committee of the Whole House, the bill shall be first read throughout by the Clerk, and then again read and debated by clauses, leaving the preamble to be last considered."

That only directs the usual order of proceeding; what else?

"The body of the bill shall not be defaced or interlined, but all amendments, noting the page and line, shall be duly entered by the Clerk on a separate paper, as the same shall be agreed to by the committee, and so reported to the House. After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses before a question to engross it be taken."—April 7, 1789.

This whole rule only points out the order of proceeding in the Committee of the Whole and the House where no privileged motion under other rules shall or may control otherwise. Does this rule except the 119th rule? Why the 119th rule was adopted long after. And if there were any conflict, as there is not, the old rule would have to yield to the new or later one. Why, sir, if the gentleman's construction of the 127th rule should prevail, we could not move the previous question in the House on the report of the committee; for the rule says: "After report, the bill shall again be subject to be debated and amended by clauses before a question to engross it be taken."

And this is the legislative order of proceeding in this House, unless some other privileged motion, under the rules of the House, gives another direction to the proceedings—such as the previous question, moved and sustained by the House on the report—this would cut off debate and amendment, as all very well know. And every member knows that, notwithstanding this 127th rule, it is always in order to call for the previous question on the report of the committee. So, notwithstanding this 127th rule, it is always perfectly in order, when in Committee of the Whole, to move to strike out the enacting words of a bill, under the 119th rule, which cuts off amendments. This, sir, is the whole of it. And this is my answer to the gentleman from Ohio.

The 127th rule has not in it a single word which conflicts with the 119th rule. Each one of them has its appropriate action in its appropriate place, and harmonizes perfectly with themselves when properly administered. But, sir, I will not leave this matter to rest solely upon my argument that the 119th rule, by virtue of the 134th, is applicable to the Committee of the Whole as well as the House. We have direct and positive authority, and proof upon this subject.

Why, sir, the very history of the 119th rule leaves us without a shadow of doubt upon this point. What is that history? The note to the rule gives its history. It is this:

"In 1814 a Committee of the Whole struck out the first and only section of a bill, and so reported to the House. Mr. Speaker Cheves refused to receive the report, on the ground that it was tantamount to a rejection of the bill, which the committee had not power to do."

That was before the 119th rule was adopted. Under the parliamentary law the committee had done that. The note further says:

"After this, that the merit of questions might be tested in Committee of the Whole, rule 119 was adopted."

Such is the history of the 119th rule. It was adopted to meet this very case. The Presiding Officer had held that such a motion could not be made in committee. The House then (in 1814) had no such rule as the 119th, and it was afterwards adopted for the very purpose of allowing such a motion to be made in Committee of the Whole, expressly for this purpose.

This 119th rule has been standing upon our book of rules, with this record of its history, for years, and yet members who have been here long enough, one would suppose, to have read the rules, seem to have given it no attention; they seem to have been sleeping over their rights, not knowing the rules by which they were governed; and now, as if waked from a trance, they raise a cry against this rule, as if some new wonder had been brought to light, or some new monster brought into being, to oppress and crush them; they have, sir, still to live to learn, the rule is a good one—let it stand; the motion under the rule is a legitimate one; the decision of the Chair sustaining that motion is right—let that also stand.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Gentlemen seem not to understand the effect of the motion I have made, it appears to me; and certainly they do not understand the object I wished to effect in making that motion. Sir, the motion to strike out the enacting clause does not affect the debate at all, because it is itself a debatable question; and as long as that question is pending, it is debatable in this committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Will the gentleman allow me to inquire whether it is not competent for the committee to rise in one hour, and when in the House, to terminate general debate in five minutes; and whether, in that way, the gentleman does not accomplish the suppression of all debate upon this question?

Mr. JONES. Not at all. The making of this motion cannot preclude any gentleman from making a speech here, until the House first adopts a resolution to close the debate.

When I made the motion, I distinctly stated that I did not make it for the purpose of defeating this bill, but that I intended and expected to vote for the bill. My object in making it was to preclude another motion, by which a speech might be doubled—by which, after a gentleman had made a one hour speech, he could move an amendment, and then speak a second hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I hope the gentleman will now withdraw it.

Mr. JONES. No, sir, I will not withdraw it now; but I shall be willing to withdraw it whenever the debate is closed upon the bill. The motion is not amendable. It has the same effect in reference to other motions being made that an amendment in the second degree has. The gentleman from Alabama moved to amend the last clause of the bill. If a motion to amend that amendment had been made, it would have had precisely the effect with regard to other motions being made as that which I have submitted.

No motion to amend can be made while the motion to strike out the enacting clause is pending, as it could not, while an amendment to an amendment was pending, and, therefore, a second hour's speech could not be made by a gentleman upon a motion to amend.

Sir, that is the object I had in view in making the motion; and I so stated at the time I made it. Now, sir, if the motion to strike out the enacting clause be voted down, gentlemen can then go on with amendments and with debate, under the five-minute rule, the same as if it had not been made; or, as I said, I shall have no objection to withdrawing the motion when debate shall have been closed.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think no one would attempt to impugn the motives of the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, on my right, in making the motion which he has made. But, sir, the very reasons that have been assigned for making it, are those which would fail in justifying the decision of the Chair, to which decision I always bow with that respect which leads me to give up a large portion of my own predilections. I, sir, am one of those who have been "slumbering" over those rules, as the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] has indicated. I was not awakened to their destructive force until a few weeks ago, when the duties of the House of Representatives were, by a decision of the Chair, confirmed by the committee, transferred to the Committee of the Whole. Sir, these rules were made to defend the rights of the minority against the tyranny of the majority, on which side soever of the House that majority may be found—and I have seen it in its tyrannical forms, I believe, on both sides.

Mr. Chairman, if the intention of the gentleman was to prevent any amendment from being offered, and that motion should be sustained by the committee, we should at once become the mere recorders of the high behests of the Executive. How I should vote on that is a matter entirely different, so far as regards the merits of the case; but so far as regards the dependence of this House, its position as mere sayer of yea or nay to the behests of the Executive, it becomes us all, I think, to arrest, in some measure, the right of a Committee of the Whole to discuss the merits of a case, and to offer amendments to every bill, so long as any amendment may be suggested by any gentleman upon this floor. I have looked with some care at that rule which has been read here, and, taken in connection with all the other questions which are associated with it, as represented by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] who spoke so clearly on the subject, I have come to the opinion—which, indeed, I had always entertained—that it had no reference to the Committee of the Whole. It belongs to the House. It connects itself with other motions which belong to the House. It is not competent for this committee to enter on any destruction of a bill in the forms set forth there. That is the privilege of the House. This, therefore, connects itself with the high privilege of destroying, of killing a bill. It becomes in itself a measure to destroy the independence of the committee, from which must emanate all those amendments which connect themselves with fiscal appropriations on which the House is to act. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. CAMPBELL took the floor.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I object to the gentleman from Ohio proceeding. He has already spoken three times on this subject.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I did not finish what I got the floor to say. I yielded the floor for explanation to your colleague, [Mr. MILLSON,] and by some means or other I lost it entirely.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is not entitled to the floor, if his occupying it be objected to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio, obtained the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. My colleague will allow me to say one word.

Mr. BAYLY. I object to the gentleman's speaking any more.

Mr. TAYLOR. There seems to have been some misunderstanding in reference to this bill; for when the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means asked us to appropriate $10,000,000 without explanation of its purpose, he moved to amend by striking out the last three lines. Whether that motion of amendment was entertained by the chairman of the committee, I do not recollect. If the motion was entertained, the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] was out of order. If not out of order here, there are two gentlemen of the Committee of Ways and Means proposing amendments and getting us into difficulty, and squabbling about the rules of the House and the rules of the committee, while we are considering a matter of such vast importance as the one under consideration. It seems to me to be unusual to move to strike out the enacting clause before the bill is at all considered. I do not recollect such an instance during my short experience here.

I confess that I am a little troubled to understand, after the lucid exposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, what is his object. I do not understand it. I wish he would withdraw his motion, and let us have a free, fair, and full discussion of this subject. I for one am ready to say, that if I see the way clear, and feel it my duty, I shall vote for the money required by this bill; but without sufficient exposition of the necessity for it, without something more than the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means has given us, or than I have seen from the President, or any of the Departments of the Government, I shall feel constrained to vote against the allowance of $10,000,000 to carry out the treaty. I listened most attentively to the reasons given for this extraordinary position of two gentlemen who hold a most eminent position in this House, in making two such motions before we discussed this question at all. I do not yet understand the object of my friend from Tennessee, in moving to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, unless it be from a desire to prevent gentlemen from discussing it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a word. I distinctly stated that the only object, and the only effect of the motion which I had made, was to prevent a gentleman, when he had made an hour speech, from getting some one else to make a motion to amend, so as to enable him to have another hour upon that motion, thereby having two hours instead of one. I will say here, that whenever we shall close debate upon this bill, and whenever it may be the general wish to offer amendments, and to make explanations of them under the five-minute rule, I will withdraw the motion I made to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire simply to respond to the gentleman from Tennessee by saying, that I do not know that I should have raised the question I did, had the gentleman from Tennessee, when he made the motion to strike out the enacting clause, given the pledge which he now does, to wit: that he will withdraw the motion, so that the rule authorizing amendments may be in force. But the manner in which it was presented was simply this—

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Is this debate in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must remind the gentleman from Ohio that he can only make an explanation.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I cannot yield the floor longer. I shall not detain the committee long.

Mr. BAYLY. Will my friend from Ohio—my ancient friend from Ohio—[laughter] allow me to make an appeal to him? He has given the floor to his colleague; will he give it to me?

Mr. TAYLOR. I must respectfully decline yielding the floor to my more ancient friend from Virginia, because he did not yield the floor to one still more ancient, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] when he asked the gentleman from Virginia to give him five minutes of his time. I have very little to say upon questions of order; for, after having studied the rules of this House most diligently for seven years, I must confess that I know very little about them. I think the Chair is wrong in the decision he has made, and I must vote with my friend from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] because there are two amendments offered by members of the Committee of Ways and Means pending. But I will not trespass upon the kindness of the committee longer.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. I would ask the chairman, if it be in order, whether both of these amendments—the one offered by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HUSTON,] as well as that offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,]—are in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly. The Chair, with the permission of the committee, will remark, that any gentleman at all familiar with the common law, known as the parliamentary law, must be aware of the fact that there is nothing novel or unusual in the pending motion as made by the gentleman from Tennessee. It is a motion known to all parliamentary bodies; a motion known, I repeat, to the common law, as well as to the written rules of the House. Now, my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who takes an appeal in the present case, has laid down a true rule of construction with respect to the rules. The only question, and the one which has to be examined now, is, has he [Mr. CAMPBELL] applied his own rule—the rule of which he speaks—that is to construe these apparently conflicting rules together, and see what the meaning of them is? Let him apply that true rule to the present difficulty. One rule provides that a bill shall be considered by sections, and shall be open to amendment. Another rule expressly gives precedence to a particular motion—to the motion offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] Take the principle, then, suggested by the gentleman who takes the appeal, and suppose the two rules to form but one rule, the first being the body of the rule and the last to have been added to it by way of a proviso. And then we have a rule providing that the question or subject-matter shall be open to consideration and amendment, section by section, provided that that amendment which proposes to strike out the first section of the bill shall have precedence over all other amendments.

So stand the two rules when considered together; and the meaning and interpretation of them has been well illustrated by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS,] who has explained to the House that questions may differ in regard to rank and privilege, as between themselves, and yet that each, in its appropriate time, may be strictly parliamentary and in order. As thus: A motion to go to the business on the Speaker's table, is a parliamentary motion, and in order; but a motion to go into a Committee of the Whole House, being also a parliamentary motion, and one of higher privilege, it overrules and cuts off the other.

There is nothing better known to parliamentary lawyers, than that privileged questions—as in the case before us, the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee is a privileged question—outranks and overrides other motions; and the Chair would remark that he believes no evil can result from the practice either; because it will be observed, if the motion to amend by striking out the first section of the bill prevail, it is the decision of the majority—lex majoris partis—expressed against the merits of the bill. Because, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has explained, the motion to strike out the first section of the bill opens up the whole merits of the bill to debate, and if the House should decide generally on the merits of the bill adversely to it, there is no propriety in wasting the time of the House in discussing amendments which, being subsidiary questions, are, of course, of minor importance. If, on the other hand, the House should decide adversely to the motion to strike out the first section of the bill, then the committee can consider such amendments as may be proposed to it; and thus, in practice, all the benefits that can be derived from either of the rules will be obtained, and there will certainly be no conflict between them.

Now, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] who first addressed the Chair, quotes ancient rules of the House, in which he finds this rule giving precedence to the motion to strike out the first section combined with other motions which can be made in the House; but he omitted to state that there are also motions combined with it which can be made in committee as well as in the House. He quotes one of the ancient books to show that these motions can only be made in the House; and that, therefore, they are not intended to be applied to the Committee of the Whole. Now, one rule of the House expressly provides that the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole shall be governed by the same rules as those which govern the proceedings of the House, so far as they are applicable. But there are a variety of motions which cannot be made in the committee, to wit: a motion to adjourn, and so forth, as stated by the gentleman from Virginia. But if he had given an examination to the very rule which he cites, old as it is, and of no authority, in the present case, because obsolete, he would have found connected with it, also, motions which could be made in committee, thus showing that this rule applied to matters in order in the committee, as well as in the House; and therefore that the rule was as binding in committee, as it was in the House.

Mr. CHASTAIN. I desire to know whether the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] would have the effect of cutting off debate?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated that it would not.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, took the floor.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I am entitled to the floor, having only yielded it to the Chair. I will, however, yield it for a moment to my friend from Virginia.

Mr. BAYLY. I want, before I commence what I have to say on the question before the House, to correct an unintentional misstatement made by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. TAYLOR.]

He stated that I had refused to allow any part of my time to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] Now, sir, the gentleman from Missouri is within my hearing, and he will bear me testimony that I said that when a gentleman of his age and character came to ask me to yield to him a portion of my time, I did not know how to refuse him, although the time which I should have to give up would be the time of my constituents; but that, trusting to that indulgence which I have always had extended to me by my constituents, I thought I could do it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am glad I was laboring under a misapprehension, because I appealed to my friend to yield a part of his time to the gentleman from Missouri, and I understood him distinctly to say that he could not do it.

Mr. BAYLY. The gentleman stands corrected, and I would suggest that it would be better, between friends, to ascertain facts before making a statement of them.

Mr. TAYLOR. I was laboring under a mistake.

Mr. BENTON here made a remark substantiating Mr. BAYLY's statement, which was inaudible to the reporter.

Mr. TAYLOR. I will not detain the committee longer. I have tried hard to understand the true state of the question, and I am constrained to vote against the decision of the Chair, because I believe it to be contrary to the practice of the committee.

Mr. SKELTON. I will only add two or three words to what has already been said upon this question of order. I believe this question to be one of vast importance to the House, the committee, and the country. This motion was recently made, if I recollect aright, for the first time since I have been honored with a seat upon this floor, in the Committee of the Whole upon the Nebraska bill. I believe, sir, that it strikes at the rights of the members of this House, at the right of free discussion, and at the right of making amendments.

I agree with the Chairman in his remark, that the rules of this committee and of the House, must be taken collectively, and that we can only gain a knowledge of their meaning by comparing one with another; and that this especially is the case where there is an apparent clash of the rules of the House. Now, sir, the rules of this House declare, that in committee a bill shall be read through by sections. That rule is absolute and emphatic, and there is no other rule which abrogates it. Why is this privilege given to the committee? Why was this rule established at all? Was it not for the purpose of giving the members of the House, in committee, a privilege which can be denied them while in the House? This is the point upon which the case mainly turns. If this construction is correct, what advantage is there in having a Committee of the Whole? The Committee of the Whole is organized for the purpose of giving liberty to debate, full liberty to offer amendments to bills pending, so that we may not be compelled to vote in the dark, and without an opportunity to offer amendments. I hope, sir, that this decision of the Chair will be voted down.

Another point. This committee has no power to close debate, according to the rules of the House. Now, sir, if this practice is established, you can close debate in committee; you can cut off amendments; you can apply the previous question; and you can apply to the committee all the rules which apply to the House. Then what do we gain by going into committee? We gain no privilege of debate; we gain no more unrestricted privilege of expressing our sentiments; and hence the establishment of this rule, as construed by the decision of the Chair, will have the effect of effectually placing a gag upon the liberty of speech; upon the liberty of members in expressing their views upon questions which may arise. We have all of us felt the oppressiveness of the operation of the previous question in the House on many occasions. We have all of us, in many instances, been compelled to vote against bills because some provision in them did not meet the approval of our judgment, when, if some little amendment could have been made, we would have been glad to have sustained them.

Why, sir, this Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was established for the purpose of affording a larger latitude of debate, and of offering amendments, than the rules of the House would admit of. But if this decision is to be sustained, that privilege, which all of us cherish so much, will be crushed forever. It is for this reason that I shall be compelled to vote against the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise for the purpose of making an appeal to my friend on my right [Mr. CAMPBELL] to withdraw the appeal he has taken. I submit to him that this is a very unpropitious time for the discussion of this question. We have now a very important bill before the committee. My colleague from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] is waiting to make his reply to the gentleman from Missouri, or, at least, his remarks upon the bill. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] has already declared that it is not his intention to persist in his motion, but that he will withdraw it upon the termination of debate. And since it is within the power of the House, at some future time, when a bill of less importance is under consideration, to settle this question which I desire to see settled for the purpose, if necessary, of making some change in the rules of the House, I would earnestly appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw his question of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. If the committee will allow me for a moment to explain my motives, I will then withdraw my appeal.

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. CAMPBELL. When the motion was made by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee to strike out the enacting clause of the bill, it was not accompanied by any pledge upon his part that he would withdraw it, so as to allow of amendments and debate under the five-minute rule, and therefore it followed, as a necessary consequence, that it was bringing into practical operation the previous question in Committee of the Whole as efficiently as it is in the House proper. For the gentleman from Georgia might have made a motion in the House for the termination of the debate in the committee in five minutes, which, if carried, would have brought the committee to a direct vote upon striking out the enacting clause. If that vote was decided in the affirmative, it would carry the bill into the House, and, under the operation of the previous question, an important measure of this kind might be passed without any opportunity having been given for debate. It was for that reason that I deemed it to be my duty to raise the question of order which I did. But inasmuch as the gentleman from Tennessee has given his pledge that debate shall not be checked by his motion, and as I regard him as a man of honor, I doubt not that he will redeem his pledge and withdraw his motion. I therefore withdraw my appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I do not wish the gentleman to make that withdrawal; for he may afterwards be taken by surprise. I notify that gentleman, and this committee, that if hereafter, in the progress of this bill, I shall find it necessary to get a vote on the bill to make the same motion that I did on the Nebraska bill, I shall do so.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then I notify the honorable gentleman from Georgia, that if he attempts during the pendency of this bill, as he did on the Nebraska bill, to cut off debate, and his motion is sustained by the Chair before discussion is had, I shall renew the appeal which I now withdraw.

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia, resuming the floor, addressed the committee in reply to Mr. BENTON. His speech, withheld for revision, will be published hereafter.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania, obtained the floor.

Mr. HAMILTON. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee) having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 405, "to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic, of the 30th December, 1853," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. There is not a quorum present, and there is, therefore, no motion in order except a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. We have not ascertained that fact.

Mr. JONES. Well, I take it for granted that it is so; and I make the motion that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The fact whether there is a quorum or not present can only be ascertained by the House proceeding to business; and whenever it appears that there is no quorum present, then, of course, the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee will be in order.

Mr. JONES. Is it not in order now to move an adjournment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not when another gentleman [Mr. CURTIS] has the floor.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I object to the resolution. Mr. CURTIS. I move that the rules of the House be suspended to enable me to introduce my resolution.

Mr. JONES. I make the point of order, that the motion to suspend the rules is not in order, because there is not a quorum present. The Chair can make a count.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overlooks the point of order.

Mr. JONES. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and ask a vote upon that appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?"

Mr. DEAN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. JONES. Then the question on the appeal cannot be decided; and, of course, the motion falls to the ground.

The question was taken; and the motion of Mr. DEAN was agreed to.

The House thereupon (at ten minutes before four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate for the relief of James Jeffries and Jeremiah M. Smith.

The bill, as it passed the Senate, proposed to enact that the Postmaster General be "authorized and directed" to release the parties mentioned and their guarantors from the penalty incurred by their failure to carry the mail on routes 6268, 6269, 6277, according to the bid offered by them and accepted by the Department; and to refund to them the amount of any fine which has been paid by them in consequence of any failure.

The amendment of the House was to strike out "directed," and insert after "authorized" the words "in his discretion," so as to authorize the Postmaster General, in his discretion, to make the release and payment provided for.

On motion by Mr. RUSK, the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DODGE, of Iowa, presented the petition of John Shaw, praying compensation for his services as interpreter in the trial of certain Winnebago Indians, charged with murder, at a special term of the United States circuit court, at Prairie du Chien, in the Territory of Michigan, in 1828; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PETTIT, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred a bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Henry Lewis, of Clinton county, Indiana, reported it back with sundry amendments. He also submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred a bill from the House of Representatives, for the relief of Henry J. Snow, of Rome, in the State of New York, reported it back without amendment.

Mr. ALLEN, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred documents in relation to the claim of Sherman Pierce, to a pension for military services in the last war with Great Britain, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret Johnstone, widow of a soldier in the Army, who was accidentally shot by another soldier while on duty, praying a pension, submitted an adverse report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a petition of citizens of Knox county, Tennessee, praying that the officers and soldiers of the Creek war of 1814, may be placed upon the same footing with the officers and soldiers who served in any other war, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, on the ground that the petitioners are fully provided for in the existing general laws. It was so ordered.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth Monroe, praying that her pension may be extended and renewed, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the committee having reported a general bill providing for such cases. It was so ordered.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles Homer, praying remuneration for losses sustained in consequence of the delay on the part of the Government in selecting a site for the marine hospital at San Francisco, and for the execution of work thereon not required by the contract, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of Charles Stearns, praying to be allowed indemnity for expenses incurred by him in defending his title to certain lots of ground claimed by the United States, and for expenses incurred in two criminal prosecutions brought against him by the United States authorities at Springfield, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

COLLECTION DISTRICT IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a memorial of citizens of New Mexico, praying for the establishment of a collection district in that Territory, or in the State of Texas, have directed me to report a bill "creating a port of entry at Frontera, in the State of Texas." I ask that the bill may be considered at this time. There is no officer of the revenue now in that Territory.

The bill was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to create the county of El Paso, in the State of Texas, and the Territory of New Mexico, a collection district, to be called the district of Paso del Norte, the port of entry for which is to be Frontera. There is to be a collector of the customs, to reside at Frontera, at a salary not exceeding $2,000, including in that sum, the fees allowed by law.

The bill further provides that the district court of the Territory of New Mexico shall have, and exercise jurisdiction over all cases arising in the collection district of Paso del Norte, in the administration of the revenue laws, in the same manner as if the district were entirely within the Territory of New Mexico.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

RAILROAD IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. STUART. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the House bill to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad therein, to report the same back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider this bill now.

Mr. EVANS. I object.

Mr. STUART. I suppose it is in order for me to submit a motion to take up the bill, as it was twice read before being referred.

The PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it goes upon the Calendar.

Mr. STUART. Is it not in order for me now to submit a motion to take up the bill?

The PRESIDENT. The bill having just been reported, must lie over for one day, unless by unanimous consent.

COLLECTION DISTRICT IN CALIFORNIA.

On motion by Mr. GWIN, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill reported from the Committee on Commerce, creating a collection district in the State of California.

It proposes to constitute the counties of Humboldt, Trinity, Klamath, and Siskiyou, in California, a collection district, to be called the district of Humboldt; to make Union Town the port of entry, and Crescent City a port of delivery. The collector to be appointed for the district is to be allowed $3,000 per annum, with additional maximum compensation of $2,000 per annum, should his emoluments and fees, provided by law, amount to that sum. A deputy collector is also to be appointed, to reside at Crescent City, at a salary of $2,000 per annum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. MCKEAN, Chief Clerk, announcing that they had passed a joint resolution directing the connection of the public surveys in Alabama, with the boundary line between the States of Alabama and Florida, in which they requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—WASHINGTON AND ALEXANDRIA RAILROAD.

Mr. MASON. I ask leave to present a memorial of the corporate authorities of the city of Washington, asking for the passage of the bill now before the Senate "authorizing the extension of the Alexandria and Washington railroad into the District of Columbia." That bill was under consideration on Thursday last, and was then laid over until the next day. There are reasons which induce me to believe that the public interest and the public convenience are involved in its speedy passage. I therefore ask the Senate now to take it up and dispose of it.

Mr. PEARCE. I submit to the Senator from Virginia to allow me to make another motion prior to his. I am called away by peculiar circumstances from the city. I shall be obliged to leave this afternoon at an early hour. I am anxious before I go to induce the Senate to take up a bill which has been for a long time in my charge, and in which my State is interested. It is a bill directing a reexamination of the account between the United States and the State of Maryland.

Mr. MASON. I am very reluctant not to agree to the proposition of the Senator; but I ask him whether on his return it will not do as well to take up that bill?

Mr. PEARCE. I think it is very desirable it should be taken up now. It has been in my charge for about three months. I had hoped it would come up in its turn, but other bills have been taken up out of their turn, and now I am compelled to go away, and, therefore, I ask for the consideration of my bill.

Mr. MASON. I am sorry to decline acceding to the request, but I hope we shall have the pleasure of the Senator's company back with us very soon, and the bill which I wish to take up is really a matter of pressing emergency in which his constituents, as well as mine, are concerned.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the motion of the Senator from Virginia will not prevail. It is very evident that if that question be taken up, the day will be consumed in discussing it. I should prefer that the morning business be disposed of, and then that the motion of the honorable Senator from Maryland prevail. There is an urgent necessity for his leaving the city, and I think it is due to him after the morning business shall be disposed of, that his bill be taken up.

Mr. PRATT. After what has fallen from my colleague, I beg leave to say that I do not apprehend the bill which he asks to have taken up will lead to debate. I think it will only be necessary to state the grounds on which the Committee on Finance unanimously reported in its favor to induce the Senate unanimously to pass it. The bill which the honorable Senator from Virginia proposes to take up, however, will undoubtedly consume the whole day if it be taken up. It can be of no importance with reference to the Potomac bridge whether we pass to-day, or to-morrow, or next day, a provision authorizing a railroad to be made across it.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I dislike to oppose motions made by my friend from Virginia; but I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the House of Representatives, some days since, passed a bill fixing the time for the annual meeting of Congress on the first Monday of November, in lieu of the time now fixed—the first Monday in December. We amended their adjourning resolution of this session, and sent it back to them. They cannot act advisedly upon our amendment to the adjourning resolution until they see what the Senate does in reference to the bill which they have passed changing the time for the meeting of Congress.

I therefore desire that, in preference to all other business, we take up that bill and act upon it one way or the other, either pass it or reject it. For one, I shall vote against it; but yet I know it is important that we should act upon that question in some shape or other. In my judgment it is more important that the sense of the Senate should be ascertained upon that subject than almost any other before the body. I will not move to take up that bill now, because I am willing to accommodate the Senator from Maryland, and take up the bill which he wishes us to consider, and which I understand will not probably take any length of time. But the subject which the Senator from Virginia proposes to take up will consume the morning hour, perhaps the whole day; and therefore, I feel constrained to vote against his motion.

Mr. MASON. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] and the Senator from Maryland nearest me [Mr. PRATT] both object to taking up the bill which I propose to call up, providing for extending the Washington and Alexandria railroad into this District, for the reason, as I understand them, that they wish first to consider the bill proposed to be taken up by the Senator from Maryland who sits furthest from me, [Mr. PEARCE.] Under the circumstances, I will withdraw my motion, and yield that Senator the floor to enable him to have his bill taken up, with the understanding that the Senate, with the concurrence of these gentlemen, will then allow me to take up my bill.

Mr. ADAMS. With the understanding on my part that we shall take the sense of the Senate between the two propositions.

ACCOUNTS OF MARYLAND.

The bill to direct a reëxamination of the account between the United States and the State of Maryland, was, on motion by Mr. PEARCE, read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It is designed to authorize the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to reëxamine the account between the United States and the State of Maryland, as the same was, from time to time, adjusted under the act of May 13, 1826, entitled "An act authorizing the payment of interest due to the State of Maryland," and on such reëxamination, to assume the sums expended by that State for the use and benefit of the United States, and the sums refunded and repaid by the United States to the State, and the times of those payments, as being correctly stated in the account, as it has heretofore been passed at the Treasury Department; but in the calculation of interest due under the act of 1826, the following rules shall be observed: Interest shall be calculated up to the time of any payment made. To this interest the payment shall be first applied, and, if it exceed the interest due, the balance shall be applied to diminish the principal. If the payment fall short of the interest, the balance of interest shall not be added to the principal so as to produce interest. Second, interest shall be allowed the State of Maryland on such sums only on which the said State either paid interest or lost interest by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund. And if, upon such reëxamination of the account and application of the above rules, any money shall be found to be due to the State of Maryland, the same shall be paid.

The State of Maryland, during the war of 1812, borrowed large sums of money to be applied to the purchase of arms and ammunition, and the equipment and pay of the militia called into service for the defense of the State. Of the sums thus borrowed, $279,626 54 were admitted by the Government of the United States to have been expended for the use and benefit of the United States, and were subsequently repaid to the State of Maryland. The State paid interest on these sums for a considerable time, and then discharged the debt by a transfer of United States six per cent. stock, at that time held by the State; but no payment was made by the United States to the State, on account of the interest on the advances, until Congress passed the act of May 13, 1826, which directed the accounting officers of the Treasury to "liquidate and settle the claim of the State of Maryland for interest upon loans on money borrowed and actually expended by her for the use and benefit of the United States during the late war with Great Britain."

This act prescribed sundry rules for the government of the accounting officers, the first of which was to consider the amount of principal already refunded to Maryland, as evidencing the whole principal of the advances so made by the State. The second rule was that no interest should be paid by the United States, except where interest had been paid by the State. The third directed that "where the principal, or any part of it, has been paid or refunded by the United States, or money placed in the hands of Maryland for that purpose, the interest on the sums so paid or refunded shall cease," &c.

The accounting officers so construed this act as to allow interest to the State of Maryland only where such interest had been directly paid by the State, and to refuse it where the State had lost interest, as by discharging the debt by the transfer of an interest-bearing fund.

The injustice of this refusal has since been acknowledged by Congress in the case of the State of Alabama upon the advances made by her to the United States in the suppression of Creek Indian hostilities, and Congress has, by the act of January 26, 1849, provided for the payment of interest to the State where she had lost interest. This the State of Alabama had done by withdrawing her active capital from her State bank with which she made her advances. The State of Maryland lost interest by transferring to her creditors, in liquidation of the securities which they held, United States six per cent. stock, which the State then held, and on which she was regularly receiving interest.

The mode of computing interest adopted by the accounting officers, also, seems to have been manifestly unjust. The payments of the United States to Maryland were first applied by them to the liquidation of the principal instead of the interest accrued thereon. Whereas, in all transactions between individuals, or between the Government as creditor and an individual debtor, the rules of law require the payments to be first applied to the extinguishment of interest, and whatever remains of the payment, after discharging the interest, is then applied to the reduction of principal.

Mr. PEARCE. This bill, Mr. President, was recommended by the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Finance, and I trust that a very brief exposition of its character will equally satisfy the Senate of the United States that it should be passed. The claim is not a new one. The State of Maryland has persisted in it from the period named in the bill—13th May, 1826—down to the present time. Agents have been employed by her regularly to prosecute the claim before Congress during all that period.

The claim is for interest upon advances made by the State of Maryland to the United States during the war of 1812, which advances are acknowledged by the United States, and the principal of which has been paid by the United States. I may remark, that the State of Maryland claims of the United States over $400,000, alleged to have been advanced by her, and applied to the purchase of ammunition and the equipment and support of the militia called out for the defense of the State during the war of 1812. In the settlement of her accounts at the Treasury, that sum was not allowed; but the accounting officers did allow a sum of over $279,000; and that sum was paid by the authorities of the United States to the State of Maryland, but interest was refused upon it.

On the 13th of May 1826, Congress passed an act for the payment of interest to the State of Maryland upon these advances, and a portion of the interest has been paid; but either the terms of the act were such, or the construction given to the act by the accounting officers were such, that the State of Maryland has not received that interest to which she thinks she was entitled as a just indemnity, and which is always exacted by the Government in every other case, and exacted by the courts between individuals. The mode of settlement which was adopted I will explain. In the first place, however, I should remark that the interest allowed to the State of Maryland was only such interest as it was proved the State had paid. Now, it appears that the State not only paid interest on these advances up to a given period, but that, at that given period, the State began to lose interest, because she liquidated her own bonds, which she had given for the moneys thus advanced by her for the use of the General Government, by transferring to those creditors United States six per cent. stock—an interest-bearing fund—so that she not only paid interest up to about the year 1818, I think it was, but subsequently to that time she lost interest by liquidating those demands against her, by the transferring of United States six per cent. stock which she held, and on which she would have been continuously receiving interest but for the transfer.

The construction given at the Department was such that, instead of allowing interest to the State where she lost interest, they refused it, and only allowed her interest where she paid interest. And further, in making the calculations they adopted another course which is never allowed between individuals, and never tolerated by the United States where an individual is her debtor; that is to say, when the payments were made by the State of Maryland, they were first applied to the principal. The interest due to the State of Maryland at the time of making the payments was set aside as a thing not to be recognized at all, and the payments made were applied first to the principal, and after the principal was liquidated in that way, then such interest as they recognized to be due (that is interest which the State had actually paid, not that which she had lost by a transfer of her interest-bearing funds,) was paid as if it had been part of the principal. Thus, instead of applying the payments, as is universally done in other cases, first to the liquidation of the interest due, and then to the reduction of the principal as far as it would go, they adopted another principal which, as I have said, is violative of the law between individual and individual, contrary to the practice of the Government when the Government has claims against an individual, and directly in the teeth of the law as recognized in the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I have not put it in the bill, but I have stated in the report that the language of the rules which we have prescribed for the payment of interest in this case is precisely that which is used by the Supreme Court of the United States in a very well known case in 13 Peters. We have adopted the precise language of those rules, and all we ask is that the United States shall adopt, in regard to her creditor, the State of Maryland, that rule which she inexorably applies to her own debtors, and which the authorities always enforce as between individuals.

I know, sir, that some gentlemen think this matter of interest is to be looked at very differently where the Government is the party to be charged; but it is manifest that what the State of Maryland is entitled to from the Government of the United States is indemnity, full and perfect indemnity. That cannot be given unless the State be put in the same situation in which she would have been if she had not incurred these debts on account of the General Government. To do that, to give her perfect indemnity, to place her in the same situation in which she would have been if she had not incurred these debts for the benefit of the Government, it is necessary that she should be allowed interest in cases where she has lost it, and the rule of calculation should be that which I have mentioned. It seemed to the committee to be so perfectly equitable that they did not doubt the Senate would confirm their decision.

I beg leave simply to add, in conclusion, in regard to the payment of the interest, that, when interest has been lost, the Government has recognized the principle of paying it by the act of January, 1849. That was an act passed for the relief of the State of Alabama. Alabama had made large advances for the benefit of the General Government, in the suppression of Creek hostilities, and she had taken the money with which she made these advances out of her State bank, thus withdrawing so much from her active capital. In that way she lost the interest, and the Government of the United States, at the period I have mentioned, January, 1849, passed an act to pay interest to the State of Alabama for the interest which she had lost. This is a legislative sanction of part of the principle of this bill. The sanction for the rest I have already stated.

Mr. CASS. I do not exactly understand this bill. I must confess, I do not see the difference between paying a debt of $100,000 in a bond, drawing interest, and paying it in cash. I think the fact of paying a debt in a bond, drawing interest at the time, does not change the matter at all.

Mr. PEARCE. Why, sir, I supposed that principle would scarcely be disputed now, inasmuch as it has been solemnly recognized. I stated that the State of Maryland borrowed money for the benefit of the United States, and the United States has acknowledged it. The State paid interest on what she borrowed, up to a given time, when she ceased to pay interest, but liquidated the claims against her by transferring to her creditors United States six per cent. stock.

Mr. BADGER. Which was a fund-bearing interest.

Mr. PEARCE. Yes, sir; it was an interest-bearing fund. What we ask is, that we shall be put in the situation in which we should have been if we had actually paid interest instead of losing interest, and that the mode of calculation shall be that which is usual in all other cases. Why, sir, it is very easy to illustrate this matter. Suppose $200,000 were due to the State of Maryland when the first payment of $40,000 was made. Suppose there was an accumulation of $40,000 of interest. I ask the Senator's attention, inasmuch as he objects to the bill.

Mr. CASS. I did not object. I merely raised the question, and wished it explained.

Mr. PEARCE. Well, sir, here is the illustration: I say suppose that at the time the first payment was made by the United States to the State of Maryland, the principal had been $200,000, and the accumulation of interest $40,000; and suppose the Government of the United makes a payment of $40,000, what is the ordinary and proper mode of applying that payment of $40,000? Undoubtedly to the liquidation of the interest due. No such thing has been done here, but the accounting officer applied the $40,000 to the reduction of the $200,000, the principal, so that the interest ceased to be drawn upon the $200,000 of principal and was running on on the reduced amount of $160,000; and all the interest on the $40,000 was kept aside until the principal was liquidated by repeated payments, and then this Government paid such interest as it was willing to pay, such interest as the State of Maryland proved she had herself paid. I think that is perfectly plain. I think it is perfectly plain too, that it is entirely unjust, and that it will not do to say that the State of Maryland is indemnified for her advances to the United States, when they thus refuse to apply the payment to the interest due to her, but thought proper to reduce the principal at the time of that payment. Between individuals there could be no question about it.

Mr. CASS. I must confess I am not satisfied at all. If a man has a debt of $100,000 to pay, and he has $100,000 in cash in his strong box, or $100,000 in bonds or in bank stock, drawing ten per cent. interest, it is the same thing to him whether he pays the debt in one or the other. It is the same thing to him and to his creditor. If he chooses to convert his bonds into money and pay the debt in that way, very well. If he chooses to invest $100,000 of cash in funds, he can do that. But it seems to me that the mode in which he makes the payment makes no difference to the creditor. It strikes me that the interest stops at the time he makes the payment, whether it be made in one species of funds or another.

Mr. PEARCE. Well, Mr. President, if the observation of the Senator has any significance which I can comprehend, it amounts to this, that however the State of Maryland might have paid off these advances which she had made to the Government, however she might have paid the debts which she incurred in order to make these advances, she is entitled to interest, whether she paid in interest-bearing funds or in cash out of her strong box. That, I think, is the fair deduction from what the Senator said. The fact is, the Government has gone on the principle of not paying interest except where the party making advances to her has either paid interest or lost interest. That is the general principle.

Mr. CASS. The honorable Senator did not understand me. I did not touch the question of interest at all; I did not speak of how it should be paid. My difficulty is this: when a payment was made, under the circumstances, by the State of Maryland, no matter out of what funds it was made, the interest, it seems to me, should stop at that point. She cannot get up and say, "I have lost ten per cent., or fifteen per cent., or sixty per cent. by transferring to the creditors interest bonds which I held."

Mr. PEARCE. What payment does the Senator suppose was made?

Mr. CASS. I suppose Maryland paid the debt due from her in six per cent. stocks, and claims interest on account of losing the interest upon that stock. If that is not the case, I misunderstand it.

Mr. PEARCE. The State of Maryland did pay debts which she had incurred on account of the Federal Government. First, she paid interest for a series of years, and then she thought proper to liquidate the whole. When she liquidated it, she did it, not by a payment of money, but by a transfer to her creditors of six per cent. stock which bore interest. Now, the principle having been adopted by the Government of the United States on various occasions, that it will not pay interest except where a State has either paid or lost interest, it was necessary for me to show that the State of Maryland had lost interest. That I have shown by proving that she had transferred an interest-bearing fund.

Mr. CASS. And if she had $100,000 in her strong box, and paid the debt off the next day in cash, might she not be said to have lost interest upon that?

Mr. PRATT. Would she not be entitled to interest upon that?

Mr. CASS. I do not touch that question.

Mr. PEARCE. The statement of the Senator from Michigan may all be true. I am not vindicating the propriety of the action of Congress heretofore; but I say that Congress has decided the principle over and over again that the United States will not pay interest to a State, except where that State either paid or lost interest.

Mr. CASS. I do not exactly understand what the word "lost" means as there used.

Mr. PEARCE. That is the language of the law as it is on our statute-books.

Mr. CASS. I was not aware of that.

Mr. PEARCE. The illustration which I have given shows the meaning of the language. It means that when a State has paid money, not out of her strong box lying idle, but has paid away an interest-bearing fund, that constitutes an equity which entitles her to the indemnity which the State of Maryland asks in this case.

Mr. PRATT. I do not suppose for a moment that I can make the argument plainer than it has been made by my honorable colleague, [Mr. PEARCE,] but I think I can answer the objection of the honorable Senator from Michigan.

The State of Maryland, during the war of 1812, made certain advances to the Federal Government. This Government has recognized the obligation to refund that money. Now, the Senator from Michigan says he cannot see the difference between the obligation of this Government to pay, if the State of Maryland at once paid in cash the debts incurred by that State in advancing the money, or immediately paid them in stocks bearing interest, or deferred the payment for a number of years. He can see no difference between the obligation of the Government, whether the State paid interest on the debt for a number of years, and then paid the principal, or at once paid the debt in cash, or in a stock paying her interest. I concede that he is right. But here the United States concede the obligation to refund to the State the money advanced. Then if the State at the time paid the money, she is entitled to interest from the Government. The course of the committee and the argument of my honorable colleague have proceeded out of the act of 1826, which provides that this Government should pay interest wherever the State had paid interest. The Government has only paid to the State of Maryland the interest which the State showed she actually paid antecedent to the liquidation of the bonds which were given by the State for the obligations incurred by her on account of the Federal Government. Now, I submit to the honorable Senator from Michigan, whether, if the State of Maryland had paid the money at once, the same obligation would not have been imposed on the Federal Government to pay interest on the amount so advanced as would have been imposed if the State had neglected to pay the principal, but had paid the interest on it for a number of years, and then came to the Federal Government to refund that interest. She would have a right to do so, and the position of the Federal Government would not be changed one iota in either case.

The object of the committee, however, as I have stated, was to bring this claim of the State of Maryland exactly within the principle of the act of 1826. That act expressly declares that the Federal Government shall refund to the State the interest actually paid. Can there be ground for a distinction between the obligation to refund interest paid, and interest lost by the State? If the State of Maryland, instead of holding these bonds and leaving her indebtedness run on and paying the interest on it until the Federal Government had paid her, had transferred at once, for the purpose of liquidating the debt, the stock of the Federal Government, bearing an interest of six per cent., would not an obligation exist on the part of the Federal Government to return the six per cent. thus lost by the State of Maryland? Is not that this case?

My honorable colleague correctly stated the principle. The broad principle recognized by this Government is, that the Federal Government is bound to indemnify a State, to give her full indemnity. In this case the State of Maryland has not only lost the principal which she paid, but she has lost the interest which she would have received on this stock of the Federal Government, which she transferred for the purpose of liquidating the debt acknowledged to be the debt of this Government. I apprehend, then, there can be no difficulty on the part of my honorable friend from Michigan, or any other Senator in agreeing to the passage of this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I should like to understand exactly the effect of the principle of this bill before I vote on it. I do not know that I shall have any objection to it when I come to understand it, but I wish to know what it is.

I consider that this matter of interest is purely a conventional one, and that you may establish any rule you please. It ought to be stable, it ought to be certain, it ought to avoid the danger of discretion, I grant. But if I rightly understand the object of this bill, the effect of it will be to unsettle the account of every State which has been settled by this Government for any lapse of time back. The mode in which interest has been calculated has been adopted partly under various laws of Congress authorizing the payment of interest to a State. I do not care in what manner the interest was to be paid. It makes no difference to me whether it was to be paid in cases when the State disposed of an interest-bearing stock, or when she paid interest herself, and not in other cases. That is immaterial to this question. Under the laws of Congress providing that the accounts of the States should be settled and they be indemnified and interest be paid to them, a certain mode of settling their accounts has been adopted at the Treasury Department; and that mode has been carried through the account of every State with which a settlement has been made by the United States. I believe that mode has not hitherto been objected to by any State. The effect of this bill, however, is to apply a different rule of settlement in regard to the accounts of the State of Maryland from any that has hitherto obtained. The inevitable result is that if you change it in reference to the State of Maryland, every other State will call upon you to do the same thing. In other words, the object of this bill is to carry out what is called the legal mode of settling interest between debtor and creditor as individuals.

I do not think there is any incumbent pressure upon this Government to adopt any of the analogies between the transactions of individuals or the transactions of a State government with an individual. There is no analogy between the cases in other respects. In the case of an individual, the debtor is always bound to seek his creditor, and if he does not seek his creditor and pay him promptly, he is bound to pay interest until the debt is discharged. In the case of a Government, nobody ever heard of such a principle as that. Nobody ever supposed that a Government was bound to seek its creditor. The Government must be sought by the creditor, and he has no right to claim interest for his own neglect. There is a great variety of other differences in the nature of things between the rules which are to govern the relations of a Government and its citizen, and those which prevail between citizen and citizen.

Now, sir, unless very strong reasons are assigned to me why I should do this, I am not disposed to unsettle the accounts of all the States of the Union with the Federal Government. They have been adjusted on the principle of indemnifying them. I am not willing thus to reopen them. I am not willing to unsettle that mode in the case of one State, (for it leads to the same thing in all other cases,) unless very strong reasons are given showing the necessity of the change. To justify me in supporting it, I must have something more than a technical rule of law as adopted by courts between man and man, which requires a particular mode to be pursued in the calculation of interest.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, the technical rule of the courts as adopted between man and man, is founded on the principles of justice, sheer justice; and if it is not, this Government is an extortioner; and it exacts from individuals wrongly and meanly what it will be wrongful and mean in it to deny to a sovereign State which has advanced money for it. But, sir, it is not a mere technicality. I do not put this claim upon the ground of technicality; I put it upon the ground of indemnity. You cannot indemnify us, unless you pay us what we have lost; and you cannot pay us what we have lost, unless you pay us according to the principle of this bill.

It is said the Government must be sought. Well, sir, this Government has been sought and besought, for the last twenty-five years, but has been deaf to every call we have made. Some years ago, I introduced a bill, proposing to settle with all the States under similar circumstances, not knowing how many there were, or whether there were any. I do not know that any State is exactly in the condition of the State of Maryland. I do not know that any other State has liquidated its debts, occasioned by such advances, by the transfer of interest-bearing funds. I do not know but that they have liquidated all those advances out of the money lying idle in their Treasury, in which cases the Government refuses to pay interest. But, sir, I introduced a general bill providing for payment in all cases. I was then told "let every tub stand on its own bottom." A friend of mine, then a Senator from Alabama, a gentleman whom I much respected while living, and whom I honor now that he is dead, Mr. King, introduced in 1848 or 1849, a bill for the State of Alabama, and asked me not to mingle that up with the claim of Maryland; but to allow each State to stand by itself, and to let his bill pass separately from everything else. I did so. Now, I introduce a bill separately for the payment of Maryland, and I am told that it may open the door for all other States that have similar claims. What if it does? If other States have such claims, they have just claims which this Government ought to satisfy and adjust without regard to money. If it took every dollar in the Treasury, it ought to be done. It is no argument against a claim that we open the door to large claims of the same sort, if those claims are just in themselves.

Now, sir, it is clear that this Government has not treated us with justice. It has refused to pay the interest which we have lost. In the case of the State of Alabama, the Government has paid her interest when she lost it, not by the actual transfer of an interest-bearing fund, in the nature of stocks of this Government held by her; but when she took the money out of her State bank, where it was active capital, on which interest was being made. This was refunded on the principle of indemnity. That is all we ask. No technical notions of the right of the Government to be above the rule of justice which applies between individuals, and which is enforced by a State against individuals, can preclude us in the demand which we make. I trust the Senate will pass the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Sir, I never for a moment meant to intimate, as an argument here, that, if this claim were just, in the broad sense of justice, of moral obligation to pay, this Government ought not to pay to its last dollar, or to borrow for the purpose of paying. I admit that principle. But, sir, I have said in this body, and I say it again, (and, if it were not for the heat of the weather, I would endeavor now to illustrate it, and I could bring strong arguments in support of my view of the question,) that the obligation imposed on a Government, or on individuals, to pay interest is, in my judgment, a question merely of conventional law. There is no question of moral obligation involved in it. According to the principles of the canon law, all interest was usury, and the taking of it was absolutely forbidden, as an immoral transaction. In the progress of this commercial age, I am aware, courts and Legislatures have been disposed to extend the rule as to the payment of interest on money; but it is all conventional. After all, there is no obligation to pay interest beyond what the positive provision of law requires. Such is my judgment. There are a variety of cases in which it is never allowed now. This is what I meant by speaking of a technical obligation to pay interest.

Why, sir, in all the States of this Union there is a great variety of rules as to whether debts bear or do not bear interest. In some it is a question partly left to the discretion of the jury. In others, debts are said to bear interest per se. All these things are the result of positive legislation in the particular State in which the rule exists. The general rule as regards Governments is, that they do not pay interest. In my judgment, the wise rule would be that they should never pay interest except based on express agreement, not implied contract. By adhering to this rule, we should get rid of a great many difficult questions connected with this matter. This was certainly the doctrine of Mr. Jefferson, in the celebrated letter which he wrote to Mr. Hammond, the British Minister, that the obligation to pay interest was founded upon express agreement. That is the gist of the doctrine contained in the whole letter. Then it comes to be a question, not of a moral obligation to pay interest, but it is purely a question of conventional law. That is what I contend for. According to the usage of this Government, it has agreed to reimburse the States for the expenditures made on its behalf; and in the settlement of accounts in such cases, there has been a practice in the Executive Department applied to all the States of the Union. Now, I say I am not prepared to vote for this bill, which will unsettle that practice, and provide for a new mode of adjusting the accounts, unless some strong reason is given to me why the Government should alter its whole course of practice.

I do not think there is any justice in this matter at all; I speak of justice in the light of moral obligation. There always must be difficulties connected with the allowance of interest. In many cases it might be asked that the Government should pay interest on interest. If you were to go through the whole of these accounts, you would easily see that might result from the alteration now proposed to be made in the law. Yet there is no question of justice about it. There are cases in which men ought to pay interest on interest, and in which men are made to pay interest on interest, even in courts of equity, where there is fraud on the part of the trustee, in annual or semi-annual statements of accounts. The general idea of the community, however, is, that interest on interest is an immoral transaction. In my view, it is a question purely conventional altogether. The question, whether interest, as well as the principal, should bear interest, is purely a conventional question, dependent on positive law. There is no reason why it should not. There is no difference in point of justice between the two cases. When I owe a bond at the end of the year, and interest is due on it, there is no reason why, if I do not pay the interest when it is due, I should not pay interest on that interest as well as on the principal. It is not a question of moral reasoning; and I say there is no difference between the two cases; and yet, probably there is not a State in this Union in which a contract to pay interest on interest would not be invalid.

I mention this in order to show that the whole question of obligation to pay interest is a question of positive law altogether. As it is so, I am unwilling, on the application of a particular State, to change the mode of computing interest, or to allow interest in cases where it has heretofore been refused. If I had time to look into this measure, I might think the principle on which it is based a wise one, though it does go to unsettle all the State accounts which have been settled for years back. As yet, however, I have heard no sufficient reason for altering the established practice of the Government in reference to these accounts, as applied to the State of Maryland, which would necessarily lead to an alteration of the practice as to the accounts of all other States similarly situated; for I believe it is not alleged in this case that the officers of the Government, in settling the accounts of the State of Maryland, departed from the rule which has been established here in reference to interest. If there were any allegation that they did not apply to this case the same principles which they apply to all others similarly situated, I should not hesitate to vote for the bill; but no such allegation is made. The bill is based simply on the fact that the practice of the Department does not operate to allow interest in the legal mode which would be adopted in a court of justice between man and man.

Why, sir, merchants vary on the subject of interest. In the mercantile mode of stating interest, they calculate it on both sides of the account. The reasons for this could be given; but it is unnecessary to go into them now. The legal mode, I admit, is different. But the question now is, whether you are to unsettle the established practice of the Government in the computation and allowance of interest. Without very strong reasons being given for it, I cannot agree to it. After examination, I might be willing to yield my objections. I did not hear the first argument of the honorable Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PEARCE.] I should have to see a statement of the argument, and understand the operation of the bill, before I could make up my mind as to its propriety. But, at any rate, I am unwilling to alter a general practice which has obtained without objection to this day, unless some very potent reason be assigned for it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CHASE. I desire to ask a question of the Senator from Maryland. If the State of Maryland had paid in money instead of in stock, would the Government of the United States, under its usage, have been bound to pay interest?

Mr. PEARCE. According to usage, it would have refused to pay interest. It has paid no interest when a State, having cash lying idle in its vaults, paid out that.

Mr. CHASE. That is the point I wished to get at.

On the question of ordering the bill to be engrossed for a third reading, Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to submit a single question to the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PEARCE.] I want to know precisely whether I understand the grounds on which the claim rests. If I understand it aright, if this bill be passed, Maryland will receive from the General Government just what she has advanced, with interest thereon, liquidated according to the rules of law, and no more?

Mr. PEARCE. No more.

Mr. HAMLIN. I shall vote for the bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 36, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Badger, Bell, Benjamin, Brodhead, Brown, Butler, Clay, Clayton, Dixon, Dodge of Wisconsin, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Geyer, Gillette, Gwin, Hamlin, Houston, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Norris, Pearce, Pettit, Pratt, Rockwell, Rusk, Sebastian, Seward, Thompson of Kentucky, Toucey, and Wade—36.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Cass, Chase, Dodge of Iowa, Sumner, and Walker—7.

The bill was read a third time, and passed.

MEETING OF CONGRESS.

Mr. ADAMS. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill from the House to change the day for the annual assembling of Congress. I want a test vote upon that proposition.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I certainly should have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi at another time; but I understand the prior order of business is the motion to refer the petition presented on Thursday last, by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROCKWELL] praying for the repeal of the fugitive slave law.

Mr. GWIN. We can dispose of this bill in a very short time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If I am right in my impression, I ask that we may proceed to the consideration of that subject.

Mr. MASON. I yielded the floor, at the time I made the motion to take up the railroad bill, as a courtesy to the honorable Senator from Maryland, (who is obliged to leave the city,) for the purpose of allowing him to call up his bill. I understood that I had the implied assent of the Senate to take up the bill giving the right of way across the Long Bridge to the Virginia railroad, when the other bill was disposed of. I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to take up that bill now. I hope that the Senator from Mississippi will allow us to do it.

Mr. ADAMS. I desire a test vote on the two propositions. I understand the House wish to have the sense of the Senate upon their proposition to meet on the first Monday of November, before they can advisedly determine upon the adjournment resolution. I therefore desire a test vote between my proposition and that of the Senator from Virginia. It is wholly immaterial on which the question is taken first. If one falls the other will be made. As mine is before the Senate, I desire a test vote upon it.

Mr. WALKER. I have no objection to taking up the bill mentioned by the Senator from Mississippi, or any other matter; but, sir, the subject which was hurrying the Senate so much several weeks ago seems now to be forgotten—I allude to the message of the President of the United States, vetoing the indigent insane land bill. I believe it is the special order. The morning hour has passed, and I, for one, feel disposed to take it up so that we may have the discussion upon it concluded within some reasonable time. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROADHEAD] got the floor upon it some five days ago, but still the subject has been postponed, if not by the positive action of the Senate, by its negative action in refusing to take it up. I insist, if it is in my power, upon the special order.

Mr. SUMNER. I would ask the Chair what was the unfinished business of yesterday?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT in the chair.) The special order of to-day is the unfinished business of yesterday, which was a motion to refer to the Committee on the Judiciary a petition praying for the repeal of the fugitive slave law; but the Senator from Mississippi moves to postpone the prior order of business for the purpose of taking up the bill from the House changing the day for the annual assembling of Congress.

Mr. SUMNER. I suggest that the memorial from the citizens of Boston be taken up and acted upon. There are Senators here, doubtless, who desire to express their views upon it. I have something further to say myself. I think we had better proceed with it to-day.

Mr. BAYARD. I have but a single objection to the motion of the Senator from Mississippi. I shall be compelled to vote against the House bill for convening Congress on the first Monday in November, if we consider it before the House act upon our amendment to their resolution in reference to the adjournment. The object of the bill is to lengthen one session and shorten the other, and I am free to say that I am unwilling to lengthen the short session unless I see a positive disposition on the part of the coordinate branch of the legislature to shorten the long session. If they will pass the resolution adjourning on the 17th of July, I am willing to vote to take the bill up; but I do not want to give my vote on it now, for if I do, I shall have to vote against it, though I should otherwise be for it. I wish the adjournment resolution disposed of first.

Mr. GWIN. I suggest to the Senator from Delaware that they cannot reach that resolution in the House. I have no doubt that if we pass this bill they will take it up and act upon it, and meet the views of the Senate in regard to the adjournment, leaving out the recess.

Mr. BAYARD. I only state that if it is taken up now, I must vote against the bill.

Mr. GWIN. I do not desire to interfere with the Senator from Kentucky, who has the floor on the petition from Massachusetts. If he wishes to go on, I have nothing further to say, but if he does not, I wish to press this question.

Mr. DIXON. I desire to submit to the Senate some remarks on the question which the memorial brings before its consideration, but if the bill which the Senator from Mississippi moves to take up can be disposed of in a very few minutes, I am willing to wait.

Mr. ADAMS. I think we can dispose of it in a very few minutes. Every man has made up his mind.

Mr. GWIN. If the Senator will give way we can easily have a test vote whether the Senate is disposed to take it up or not. I would not interfere with the honorable Senator from Kentucky, but it is perfectly notorious that the question on which he is to speak is one of no practical benefit to the Senate or the country. It is a mere wasting of the time of the Senate, but the question about adjourning at an early day is a practical question. I ask the yeas and nays on the motion to take up the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. ADAMS's motion was agreed to by a vote, on a division, of yeas 22, nays 15.

The bill was accordingly read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appoint the first Monday in November as the day for the annual assembling of Congress.

Mr. WALKER. I move to strike out "November," and insert "October."

Mr. BAYARD. Under the circumstances, I shall vote both against the amendment and the bill as it came from the House, and for this reason: We have made an amendment to the House resolution for adjournment, in which we gave to them the guarantee of what our views were, viz: that we would adjourn from the 17th day of July to the third Monday in October. It was passed by a decided vote. The House of Representatives, therefore, have the evidence that the Senate is willing to prolong the next session of Congress by way of a recess—for it amounts to the same thing practically—that it is willing to throw in connection with the next session, a period of time abstracted now from the hot summer months. We have sent that resolution; there it lies. In place of acting upon it, they have sent to us a bill to lengthen the short session of Congress. They have an indication of what the view of the Senate is, but we have not got theirs; and, in my belief, you may pass this bill and have the present session extended as far as the 20th of September. If, therefore, the bill is pressed now, I shall vote against it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am opposed both to the bill and the amendment. Now, sir, the meeting of Congress is on the day fixed by the Constitution. I believe the day on which we now meet has been settled since 1787. From 1787 to the present time there has rarely been an attempt to change it. There was an effort made to limit the long session, and to equalize the two sessions; but it was vetoed by President Jackson, on the ground that there was a want of constitutional power; and from 1787 up to the present, the first Monday in December has remained the day for the assembling of Congress. We have passed through many exciting scenes since that time. We have had the war of 1812, the war with Mexico, and all the political wars which have been fought in both Houses of Congress; and now, in a state of profound peace, and when all the legislation of the country has been made in reference to the meeting of Congress, we are called upon to change the day from the first Monday in December to the first Monday in October, to suit the views of some, and to the first Monday in November to meet the views of others.

I would inquire what great pressing necessity exists for this change? Has there been any call throughout the country for a change of the day of meeting of Congress? Are there at this time more absorbing subjects demanding its early assembling, and the lengthening of the session, than have existed at various periods for about sixty-seven years? If there are, they have escaped my observation. With regard to the section of country where I live, I have read pretty much all the public prints, and I have an extensive correspondence from that quarter; but I have not noticed that a word has been said about changing the day of the meeting of Congress. I read the prints from other portions of the Union, which generally afford information from other sections, but not a whisper have I heard of the wish that Congress should assemble earlier. What is the pressing necessity for it? It seems to me that before Congress, in this hurried way, undertakes to establish an innovation upon a usage sanctified by the length of time which it has existed, the country should call for it. If the public interests demanded it at the hands of their representatives, I should not hesitate to yield to that demand.

Sir, the legislation in several of the States is made in reference to the time now fixed by law for the assembling of Congress; and by the proposed change you will unhinge the legislation of a large number of the States of the Union. My own Legislature assembles a week after the day proposed for the meeting of Congress. This change would be unexpected to my State, and I may say the same thing of Mississippi, and perhaps of Louisiana. The population of Alabama ranges from the seacoast to the mountains, and the representatives of a population thus situated cannot be expected to meet a day earlier than the second Monday in November. Those from the higher latitudes in my State, I feel assured, would be unwilling to go south at an earlier period than that, as they would have to do to get to the seat of Government. It has been the custom of the State which I have the honor in part to represent, never to elect her Senators so long in advance as two years; and the proposed change would deprive Alabama of a Senator at the commencement of the next Congress, or subject her to the onerous expense of a called session.

It seems to me that this matter has not received the due reflection which it should have received; and allow me to say to Senators from other portions of the country, that the bill, in its operation, will absolutely exclude every Senator and member of the House of Representatives who attends here from his right to vote at the election for President and Vice President of the United States; for we shall have to be here attending to our public duties when that election comes off, on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, in every State throughout the Union, which is a period after the time proposed for the meeting of Congress. Have Senators thought of this fact—that at every second Congress, the public men will be withdrawn to attend to their public duties here at that time, and will not be permitted to exercise the right of voting at the election of those officers? It may be said that we may modify the law in regard to the time of their election. That is true; but it only comes to what I have before said, that we shall, by this legislation, derange everything; and we shall have to go to a new system of legislation. We shall have not only to do that, but I will venture to say, that if the modification takes place, if the bill becomes a law, you will find that it will derange a large portion of the legislation of the country. I know it cannot be otherwise, and it would be onerous on a large portion of the public men of the country.

For a large number of members, whether engaged in professional or agricultural pursuits in the country where I live, October and November are busy months. I know that to be a fact in several of the States. It is true of Louisiana; it is true of Texas, and of many other States. It is a busy season with the planter in my own State; it is a season which engages the attention of the professional man. Adopt this amendment, and, as far as the agricultural interests are concerned, we could neither sow nor reap, nor gather our crops; and it will be conceded that public men, as well as those in private life, should not be unmindful of their private interests, especially when they can obtain spare time from their public duties.

There are many other arguments which I could urge against the proposed change; but I did not rise for the purpose of engaging in an extended discussion on this question. I, however, have deemed it due to myself, and those I have the honor in part to represent, to submit the views to which I have given utterance against the passage of this bill.

Mr. GWIN. I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate in the discussion of this question. I think it commends itself to every member of the body, except those who are interested in not meeting at the period designated. It seems to be a very inconvenient time to some members of the Senate. It is a very inconvenient time to me as it stands. I cannot vote at the presidential election now. I am as anxious as the Senator from Alabama to vote, but I shall never be able to do it, until the mode of communication be changed. When the great national railroad shall have been built, I hope to be able to leave California after the election, and be here in time for the assembling of Congress; but I cannot do so now.

As to deranging the order of business, what is the order of business now? We commence on the first Monday in December of the short session and take up the Calendar precisely as we leave it on the day of adjournment of the long session; and if the day of meeting should be on the first Monday of November, the order of business would be precisely the same. By our rules, all the business matured this session, and not disposed of, will be taken up in its order at the next session for consideration. This, therefore, will derange no order of business at all. On that point, then, the Senator is entirely mistaken. We can commence business on the first Monday in November, as we now can on the first Monday of December. It is perfectly notorious that no business matured at the short session, except the appropriation bills, stands any chance. At the short session we take up the Calendar as we left it at the adjournment of the long session.

As to the old, fixed policy of the Government, it is well known that when the day of meeting was fixed, the duties of the Government were not so great. They were not one hundredth part as great as they are now. What is the use of the short session? During the three months we do but little more than pass the appropriation bills. Owing to the agitation of a great question that has passed through Congress at this session, some of the most important questions connected with the future prosperity of the Government have not been acted upon; and they cannot be acted upon during the dog days, when we can scarcely keep together a quorum of the two Houses. We want an additional month added to the short session for the purpose of considering these measures. Mr. President, I think every consideration that should influence a public man, should induce us to bring this session to an immediate close; and to accomplish that, we ought to pass this bill.

Mr. RUSK. I do not like to change from old rules that have worked well, without some good substantial reasons. The meeting of Congress heretofore, since the formation of the Government, has been, as directed in the Constitution, on the first Monday in December. We are asked now, upon very short notice, and with very little deliberation, to change the day to the first Monday in November, according to the bill, or to the first Monday in October, according to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin. What are the reasons that have been offered for it? One is the dispatch of the public business; another is the shortening of the long sessions of Congress, which are admitted now to run to entirely too great a length. I do not think it will effect the first object. From the history of our legislation here, it is known that, at least in the Senate, in the early part of the session, there is a very thin attendance, and adjournments over take place from Thursday to Monday during the whole of the first month, so that, in fact, until about the first of January, little or nothing either of the remaining business on hand, or new business, is transacted by the Senate.

Then, I apprehend that, unless we should change this policy, which I do not see any reason to believe will be done, in place of consuming one month in doing little or nothing, two months would be consumed in that way; so that the idea is all imaginary that it would have any sort of effect in shortening the long session. It is true, there is upon your table a proposition to amend the joint rules of both Houses, by which to direct that Congress shall adjourn some time in May. That is a clear encroachment. It is clearly unconstitutional. The Constitution gives the power expressly to both Houses of Congress to adjourn, if they can agree upon the day; and in case of their failing to agree upon the day, the President has the right to adjourn them over. That is a right incident to every Congress that convenes. We have it; and the next that sits here will have it in the same manner, under the Constitution. Then we can accomplish nothing by a joint rule, because we assume a power never guaranteed in the Constitution to this Congress to prescribe a rule for the next Congress as to adjournment; so that, so far as it is concerned, I apprehend it will result in nothing, or worse than nothing. It is mischievous. It is an attempt to accomplish, outside of the Constitution, by a sort of agreement, that which the Constitution gives us no sort of power to accomplish.

I can see no good to result from the change of the day of meeting, but I can see a great deal of mischief in it, and a great deal of confusion that will result to the country from making a change so suddenly, and without any discussion and reflection upon the subject. All the legislation of the States has been had in direct reference to our meeting on the first Monday in December. Most of them have adopted in their constitution a provision only to meet biennially, and they have, therefore, arranged their meetings to conform to the regular meeting of Congress, on the first Monday in December. Their general election of members of Congress is regulated in that way. What would be the result of this? To change the day of meeting suddenly, and to require all the States to wheel into line and follow you, and change their legislation. Perhaps some of them will have to change their Constitution to accommodate themselves to your day of meeting, when no good reason has been given why it should take place at an earlier day than it has done heretofore.

I am not in favor of passing any law that shall require all the States to conform to it, unless there be some very good and substantial reason for it, and some great public benefit to be accomplished by it. Suppose they do not turn in at your beck and call, and assemble a convention to change the Constitution, or assemble the Legislature to change the law, what is the result? Some States would be unrepresented here. If you were to meet on the first Monday in November, the State of Mississippi would be unrepresented for some time, and there may be questions arising as to the right of Mississippi under the Constitution to be represented here. It is the right of every State in the Union to be represented on the floor of Congress; and it is no answer to say that little business is done at the beginning of the first session. Vital questions might arise, and they, in fact, do arise at the commencement of the first session of every Congress, because the election of officers is a matter of vast importance. Mississippi, Louisiana, and several other States, would have to change their time of election. I have not examined particularly, but I imagine most of them would have to do so; and they would be required to call a session of the Legislature to make the changes. It would put the whole country into a turmoil and confusion, and it would subject the people to a great expense; and for my life I cannot see the benefit to be derived from it.

But that is not all the mischief. In reference to the election of Senators I have not examined, but I imagine it will be found, upon examining, that perhaps one half or one third of the States would have to do one of two things, in order to conform to this new day of meeting: either they would have to elect their Senators to represent them upon this floor a long time in advance, or they would have to be for some month or two without representation here.

It is very important, in my judgment, that the elections should take place as near as practicable immediately preceding the commencement of the service of the Senator or Representative. Under such circumstances, this would, for a year or two, to say the least of it, derange the affairs of the country; and it would do another thing. If Congress meets at the time proposed, the election of members of the House of Representatives would have to be held in the summer time, when it is known that a large portion of the population who have wealth and ability to do so are traveling, some North to the springs, others South to other places, and you would not be likely to get as full an expression of public opinion at the general election as you do under the present arrangement. There are innumerable objections to this. Another is, that if you pass the bill, Congress will be in session once in every four years on the day on which the presidential election takes place. How much would be done during the excitement of a presidential election? How much interest would a member feel in an election of that description? He would have to be away from his district, if Congress was in session; and what would you accomplish pending the excitement? On the whole, I can see no good reason for, but very many serious objections against, it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I trust it will not be the sense of the Senate to pass this bill. There are numerous inconveniences attached to a proposition to change the time of meeting, in addition to those which have been urged by the Senators from Texas and Alabama. The object which gentlemen seem desirous of obtaining is to shorten the long session, and lengthen the short session of Congress; or, as the term is, to equalize more nearly the two sessions. It appears to me that the slightest reflection will make it obvious that that result will not be obtained by this bill. One thing is very certain that one month, under its operation is to be added to each session at its commencement. You begin them by adding two months to the sitting of each Congress—one month to the long session, and one month to the short session, at the beginning. How are you going to compensate this additional time. It can only be done on the supposition that you will strike off two months from the end of the long term, and even then we shall sit the same length of time that we do now. Can any gentleman, experienced in the legislation of the country, suppose for a moment that that is going to be the effect of the bill? Does any gentleman suppose that the legislature of the country will be so conducted as invariably under its operation to shorten the long session by two months? I do not think any of us suppose that that will be the practical operation of the bill. The result then would be to add, in the first place, two months to the first session of each Congress, and impose that additional burden upon the people. They already think, and many of us are disposed to share the opinion, that we sit here too long; that a great deal of the time we are passing here might be passed more profitably for the country at large if we were all at home. At all events, I believe, if the opinion of the American people were taken upon the subject, none would be in favor of lengthening the present terms of Congress. As regards almost the entire South, it is well known that the months of October and November, under the law as it now stands, are almost the only months during which gentlemen from that portion of the country have an opportunity of meeting their constituencies, and rendering an account of their action in this body.

The proposition is to take away from us those two months, the only two we have in the year. It may be perfectly indifferent to gentlemen from the northern, middle, and eastern States, at what period of the year we meet here, but, sir, we do not find our constituencies in the months of July, August, and September. From us, who cannot travel at that season, and are opposed to any exciting exertion, from us, as I have said before, who have no other period during which we can visit our constituencies, or attend to our private business, except the months of October and November, the proposition is to take that time and leave us no time whatever. I appeal to gentlemen with whom a mere matter of convenience is no consideration, who can get to Congress at any time they please, and get back home at any time they please, from the facilities of travel afforded by northern railroads, to take this matter into consideration. If the meeting of Congress takes place upon the first Monday in November, I am perfectly satisfied that during the first month of each session, barely one half of the southern delegation in either body would be present.

Take my own State—Louisiana. After an election, it takes something like three weeks before the members in the western part of the State know whether they have been elected or not. Our elections now take place in the beginning of November. They formerly took place in the summer months. It was found that an election at that period of the year had the effect of disfranchising a large number of the citizens of the State. They could not attend the election at that period. They could not travel to their precincts. It was inconvenient in every respect, and therefore it has been found necessary to change the time of the general election to the first Monday in November. I believe there is scarcely one of the southern States in which the election does not take place in October or November. In order to be here on the first Monday in November, nearly every gentleman from the South would have to leave home in the middle of October. He would therefore have to leave home every year at the very period when the elections come on.

I cannot conceive that gentlemen should attach so little importance to the objection raised by the Senator from Alabama, that every four years, Congress would be in session while the presidential election was going on. I for one desire to see no such experiment as that; I for one would be extremely loth to see Congress in session while the presidential election was going on. One of two things would result, either there would be no quorum, or those members who might be present would not only be deprived of the elective franchise, but they would also be deprived of that influence which we may fairly consider that gentlemen, elected by their constituents to seats in Congress, exercise at home; and besides, sir, it may not, perhaps, be improper to advert to the fact that nothing would be more fearful, and more to be deplored, than the schemes of corruption which would take place in case Congress was in session while the election was going on, giving room for the formation of cliques which are at all times detrimental to the morals of the public, and to the public interest.

If you change the time of meeting of Congress for the mere purpose of adding one month to the beginning of each session, you do it at the expense, I think, of something like twenty extra sessions—no, not twenty, but about sixteen—which would be required to be held in the different States of the Union. What is the cost to a State of an extra session of the Legislature? I do not know what it may be elsewhere, but in my State, I doubt whether it could be held for less than fifty or sixty thousand dollars. What is to be gained by this change? What is the great object which we are all to gain? Gentlemen who have had long experience on this floor, assure us—and I believe we all know the assurance to be well founded—that more business is done at the short session than at the long one. We are busy during the entire duration of the long session, making speeches to the country—not in conducting the legislation of Congress, not in passing laws, but, as my friend from Georgia said the other day, in writing essays upon political subjects, and putting them forth to the country. It is perfectly easy for us to write an essay at home, and address it to our constituents. If that is all we are here for, we could do it at a great saving, at a great economy, in the expenditure of the public money.

There are some other objections to this matter which have been touched upon by other gentlemen. Upon the whole, it seems to me that no one benefit which gentlemen expect to derive from it will be obtained. The sessions of Congress will not be shortened. We shall add, to a certainty, two months to the beginning of the two sessions. It is a matter extremely problematical whether we shall cut off a single week from the end of the long session. We shall throw the legislation of the whole southern country into confusion. We shall have, at the beginning of every session, barely a quorum. A large number of the Senators and Representatives from the South will be absent. And we shall impose a vast additional expense upon the whole of the southern States. I trust gentlemen will not insist upon the passage of the bill, or, at all events, that the vote will not be taken until we can have a fuller delegation than at present.

Mr. BADGER. I am in favor of passing the bill as it came from the House of Representatives. If I could gratify my own personal wishes, irrespective of other considerations, I should be for the proposition of my friend from Illinois; but the House has sent us a bill providing for the meeting of Congress on the first Monday in November instead of the first Monday in December. I wish to risk nothing as to the fate of that measure by incorporating any amendment upon it. I am in favor of securing what I consider a great desideratum—an earlier day for the meeting of Congress, with a view to its effect first upon the short, and, secondly, upon the long sessions of Congress. Every one who has been a member of either House of Congress, knows the inconvenience which results from the meeting of the body on the first Monday in December. The time is so short until the Christmas holidays, that no business of general importance is ever done until after the 1st of January; and we have then but two months in the short session left in which to consider, or to put by without consideration, every important subject which engages our attention, with the exception of the appropriation bills. Those we cannot put by, because the carrying on of the Government requires that they should be passed; the payment of our own compensation for attendance here requires that they should be passed.

They are passed. How? They are thrust into the last two or three days of the session without any opportunity for an adequate consideration, and are passed in the dark, passed by a blind confidence.

Then, with regard to the long sessions, we meet here in December. Business is accumulated upon us, which we must dispatch. Then we are kept here during the hot and exciting summer months. Cui bono? Who is benefited by it? Nobody; not the country, not ourselves. What do we gain by it? Everybody realizes that it would be an exceeding improvement in the system of congressional legislation, if a month or six weeks could be added to the short session, for, by that process, we could more nearly approach an equalization of the two sessions of Congress. What reason is there why we should not try and see if what everybody admits to be desirable in itself, cannot be accomplished? If it shall turn out that we do not shorten the long sessions by this process; if it shall turn out that we do not, in a better manner, satisfactory to ourselves, accomplish the transaction of the business at the short session, we can go back to the day fixed by the Constitution, and submit to an inconvenience, which, by experiment, we have found, and, so far, everybody has felt, to be an inconvenience. No attempt at remedying it has ever been applied. Once Congress endeavored, during the administration of General Jackson, to fix an earlier day for the meeting of Congress; but they undertook, also, to fix, by law, the period of adjournment, and the President vetoed the bill, and vetoed it properly, because that provision was in plain violation of the Constitution.

Therefore, Mr. President, I am in favor of an earlier day for our meeting. The House has indicated to us that they are willing to take the first Monday in November. I should be willing to take an earlier day, but I have to take them at their word. What is the inconvenience? My friend from Louisiana has mentioned the difficulty that arises in regard to the southern delegation. Why, sir, I think he is unjust to the southern delegation; I think he is unjust to himself, when he supposes that they will not have a sense of duty enough to bring them to the seat of government at whatever time it may be their duty to come. For one, sir, if I may be considered as belonging to the category of southern representatives, unless in case of death or illness, I shall be, as I have ever been, here at the time appointed for the meeting of Congress. So will the others. My friend talks about the difficulty that the elections are not held until November, and that the States would have to alter the time of holding the elections. He says that the States have regulated the time of holding their elections according to the meeting of Congress. What a strange argument is this! However mischievous, or however inconvenient I should say, it may be found, the time appointed by the Constitution for the meeting of Congress, according to this argument, we never can alter. Why? The States have fixed the day on which elections are to be held in them respectively with a view to the meeting of Congress on the first Monday in December! Select any day that you please, and you will interfere with some of the arrangements of some of the States. What is to be done? Fix upon a day, and let the State Legislatures regulate the time of holding the elections accordingly.

My friend from Louisiana says that formerly they held their elections in his State in the summer, but they found that it disfranchised a large portion of the citizens. Very well, let them vote in the spring, and they will avoid all the inconveniences he has mentioned, and will also select a season of the year when every citizen of Louisiana will be in his place and exercise his elective franchise. I declare to you, Mr. President, I do not see any reasonable objection to the bill sent to us by the House. Let us try the experiment. Let us see if we cannot have one session of four months and another of five or six months, instead of a brief session of three months, in which all is hurry and confusion, and when we necessarily break up as it were in a rout, and then a long, tedious, wearisome, protracted session extending to the summer solstice, in which everybody is broken down in mind and almost in body—a session extending to the length of nine months of the year? Let us see if something cannot be done to equalize them.

In connection with this subject, my friend from Illinois has submitted a proposed joint rule—for which I am inclined to vote—to the effect that unless either House shall otherwise determine the long session, as we call it, the first session of Congress shall be closed by an adjournment by the Presiding Officers of the two Houses, in the month of May. Let us try it. It is said by gentlemen that it is the same thing in its operation as fixing upon a time of adjournment at each session by a joint resolution between the two Houses. Mr. President, this is a mistake, and, in my opinion, a great mistake. It is one thing for the two Houses to agree upon a day to terminate the session; and it is another, and very different thing for one of the Houses to repudiate by vote a day fixed by a joint rule of the two Houses for that purpose, and I have no doubt that unless there be something extraordinary in the condition of the business before Congress, as an ordinary thing, under the operation of that joint rule, the Houses would regularly adjourn on the day named. At all events we suffer under an inconvenience. We have suffered under it from the commencement of the Government. We suffer under it more and more every year. Let us make an attempt to relieve ourselves from it. If we can, we shall have succeeded in a very desirable object. If we cannot we shall have but to fall back upon an inconvenience which we have honestly tried to get rid of, and found by experiment we are obliged to submit to; and, therefore, we shall have to endure with patience what we cannot get rid of.

Mr. STUART. I shall not discuss this question at length, but I think, sir, it is one of those cases that will be found, upon examination, to multiply in difficulties. The more it is examined the more will the evils increase that are anticipated. And, sir, it seems to me we might inquire for what object this is proposed? One would suppose, by the argument of the Senator from North Carolina, that it was a matter of no possible consequence at all how much difficulty was, by an act of Congress, fixed upon the States. The Senator treats it as a matter of no consideration that the States may be compelled to change the time of holding their elections. He says that if they find it inconvenient to hold their elections in the fall, they can call their Legislatures together and fix a day in the spring, and if that should turn out to be inconvenient they could change it again I suppose. For what object? I wish emphatically to ask that question—for what great object? To accommodate what is to-day supposed to be the convenience of members of Congress. That is all, sir.

Mr. BADGER. The Senator will allow me to say that I advocate it for no mere personal convenience of mine. Personally, I care little whether we meet in October, November, or December. I shall be here at whichever time is fixed.

Mr. STUART. So far as I have heard from Senators on the floor it is an inconvenience, greater or less, to every gentleman who has spoken. He admits that it is inconvenient to him personally; he admits that it is an inconvenience to the State he represents; and I say if there be no object in it, of course it should not be passed. So far as I can understand any assignable object, it is to consult the convenience of members of Congress. Now, sir, suppose we could succeed in passing a law which consulted the convenience of this Congress, is there any guarantee that it will consult the convenience of the next? If, therefore, the Legislatures of the respective States should be compelled to change their laws to suit this Congress, very likely the next would be entirely dissatisfied, and change again. Sir, the argument submitted by the Senator from Louisiana is unanswerable; that at every other Congress, under the law fixing the time of election of President and Vice President, you would be compelled to be at home on the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November, or else lose the right of suffrage.

I consider that a less evil, however, than that which will fall upon the States, the annual elections of which take place on the first Tuesday in November. The whole domestic policy of the State is made to depend upon the vote of that year; and, sir, I apprehend that there is no member of Congress who forgets or disregards the policy of his State at home, or is inclined to disfranchise himself, or lose all participation in fashioning its laws.

I wish to introduce an argument which was introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. Doug-LAS] before, and reiterated to-day by the Senator from North Carolina, for the purpose of showing, as I think, that it is utterly without foundation. It is conceded by both those Senators, that the veto of General Jackson, on a former bill, was well founded, because one Congress does not possess the power to determine when the next one shall adjourn at the long session. It is conceded that we have not that power; but, how is it sought to get over the difficulty? By a joint rule of the two Houses. Now, I will ask any constitutional lawyer, any gentleman who claims respect for his opinions, if he contends that the two Houses of Congress can do, by joint rule, what the Constitution prohibits both Houses and the President from doing by law? I apprehend there is no gentleman who will hazard his reputation by venturing any such opinion as that.

Mr. BADGER. If the Senator wants that question answered, I will answer it by saying that, by a joint resolution or joint order, we every year fix a day when Congress shall adjourn, which cannot be fixed by law.

Mr. STUART. That is an answer which will not meet the argument. We are not denying but that, by a joint resolution, we can fix the time when this Congress shall adjourn; but the object sought to be effected by the Senator from Illinois, and that just advocated by the Senator from North Carolina, is by a joint rule, to fix the time when the next Congress shall adjourn.

Mr. BADGER. Unless either House disagrees to it.

Mr. STUART. I will show, if Senators will indulge me one moment, that that is utterly impracticable for that purpose. Every joint rule expires with the Congress.

Mr. BADGER. Oh, no.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir, a joint rule of this Congress expires with this Congress.

Mr. BADGER. We did not readopt at the beginning of this session our joint rules. The joint rules of the two Houses of Congress are permanent. The Senator is entirely mistaken.

Mr. STUART. They are permanent for this reason: that at every meeting of the House of Representatives a motion is made and agreed to that the rules of the last Congress be the rules of this until otherwise ordered.

Mr. BADGER. Not the joint rules, the rules of the House.

Mr. STUART. But I say again, this Congress cannot pass a joint rule which can control the next Congress. It expires with the Congress, and if it remains, it only remains by toleration, and not by force. Why, Mr. President, is it admitted that it is not in the power of Congress by law, to fix a time when the next Congress at its first session shall adjourn? and yet is it contended that it is in the power of the two Houses by a joint rule to do it; that the Constitution can be made to fall before a joint rule. That cannot be contended for, for one moment. What is the consequence of this? It is, as Senators have said, that we shall only add to the commencement of the session without taking anything from its close. Experience has been appealed to. It has been but a few years since it was customary to adjourn in June. It is but a very few years back that Congress sat later than June. Why is it that it is now continued until September? We can ask that question of ourselves. It is only because we do not wish to close the session any sooner. The honorable Senator from North Carolina, as well as every other Senator, has answered the argument by saying that all the business of each session is crowded into the last few days, and is then done or not done at all. Suppose we crowded it into the first days of the session. It is equally within our power to do it. It could be done. If there be objections to sitting here in the warm weather, those objections are relievable and removable by ourselves, by just setting to work and doing the business, and adjourning before the hot weather. But Congress is not inclined to do it. There is not a Senator or Representative who is in a hurry to do the business. All are ready to put it off until a later day, until the close of the session; and the consequence is, that, at the last end of the nine months it is as true as at the last end of the short session of three months, that the appropriation bills go through the two Houses on the last nights of the session; and if it was nineteen months, I should not hope to see it changed.

Wherefore, then, I repeat—because I am not disposed to consume the time of the Senate—wherefore fix upon ourselves, individually, as members of the respective States, cherishing the right of franchise, wherefore fix upon the States themselves, so great an inconvenience as everybody admits is to grow out of this, for the mere purpose of an experiment. It seems to me it should not be adopted, unless the good to be obtained can clearly be seen to be paramount. It is a subject upon which I humbly submit there should be no experiment. It should appear clear in the minds of the Senate before they pass this bill, that it will remedy the evils that are now complained of. Of all the subjects that can be brought before this body, I respectfully submit it is the last one that ought to be experimented on.

Mr. PRATT. I desire to state simply the reasons which operate on my mind, as I apprehend that, if they are equally potential with other Senators they will of course have the same effect. The other day I voted for a joint resolution to adjourn the present Congress from the 17th of July, to the 16th of October. I am willing to agree to that now. The present Congress and each succeeding Congress will have the power to adopt such a resolution. Is not that much better than to pass a law by which we shall compel all subsequent Congresses, no matter whether the exigencies of the public service require it or not, to meet upon an earlier day? Here we are now in the month of June. We know that we have many important bills which the short session will not give us an opportunity of acting upon. This Congress has the power, without any public inconvenience, to determine whether we shall meet after a recess, at any day on which the public business in our judgment may require us to meet, and that produces no evil. Is it not better, therefore, to leave to our successors the same opportunity, when they shall find as we do now, the necessity—looking to the public business—to meet at an earlier day, so to do? The House may or may not act upon the amendment to their joint resolution sent to them. It is for them to act and decide whether in their judgment the public business will require at this session an earlier meeting than the usual day of assembling at the short session.

Now, I come to the reason which will apply to all the States, the sessions of whose Legislature are biennial. In Maryland, if this law be passed, it fixes not only for the next session, but for the sessions afterwards, that the meeting shall be in November. The Legislature of Maryland is not elected until the first Wednesday in November, which is, I believe after the day proposed for the meeting of Congress under the bill. The result will be that Maryland must either be unrepresented here at the meeting of Congress after the next session, or the Executive must call together the Legislature at the expense of some $60,000. That is the result in reference to Maryland. The same result must occur in reference to every State the sessions of whose Legislature are biennial, unless the election takes place prior to the first Monday in November. Is it worth while (when, already, without any inconvenience, either Congress will have the power of meeting before the short session, at an earlier day by a joint resolution, when they find the public business requires it) to subject the States, the sessions of the Legislatures of which are biennial, to this expense of $60,000 or $70,000, for the purpose of putting that in the shape of a law which we have the power to do now without inconvenience?

Mr. President, with this view I shall be compelled to vote against the bill. At the same time, I beg leave to suggest that I can see the importance of meeting here, after a recess, earlier than December. The bill of my honorable friend from California [Mr. GWIN] is one which the exigencies of the country require we should act upon; and I hope the other House of Congress will fix for the next session an earlier day of meeting, and agree to the amendment which we have sent to them.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I feel, certainly, very little interest in this bill. When I proposed that Congress should meet on the first Monday in October, it did not occur to me that there would be any serious inconvenience resulting from it. I think those that have been stated are more imaginary than real; but still I should press the bill with some earnestness if I thought we could fix upon October instead of November. I am satisfied that we have to take the bill with the first Monday in November, or lose it; and, therefore, I shall vote for it.

Most of the objections that have been urged to our meeting in November relate to the inconveniences that would exist rather in the House of Representatives than in this body. Inasmuch as this is a House bill, passed by what body first, I think it more respectful to them to leave them to judge for themselves of the inconvenience attending their action than for us to amend it out of kindness to them, because we know better what they want than they do. In that point of view, I shall vote to concur in the bill which the House has sent us.

In regard to another point that has been raised in the discussion, I have a word to say. I submitted some time ago a proposition to add a new rule to the joint rules of the two Houses, to direct the Presiding Officers to adjourn their respective bodies on the first Monday in May at the long session, unless each House should otherwise order and direct. Although that proposition is not now before the body, it has been discussed in connection with this bill, and properly so, because it relates to the same subject, and is intended to remedy the same class of evils. I do not see the force of the objection that has been urged by the Senators from Texas and Michigan against that rule. The Senator from Texas [Mr. RUSK] seemed to suppose that it was not competent under the Constitution to fix the adjournment by a rule of the two Houses, inasmuch as the Constitution has provided that each House shall agree upon the time of adjournment, and each may act for itself. I must remind that Senator that the only mode by which the two Houses can agree is by a vote of the one concurred in by the other. It then becomes a joint order of the two Houses, made in advance, and it becomes imperative upon the Presiding Officers of each, when the hour of the day fixed upon arrives to adjourn the two bodies.

Mr. RUSK. I desire to ask the Senator whether the action of this Congress fixing the time at which the first session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress should adjourn, would be of binding force?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I can answer that very easily. The Senator would have got an answer to it by reading the proposition that he made his speech against, instead of making his speech against it without reading it. The proposed joint rule is to the effect that, unless either House shall otherwise order or direct, the Presiding Officers shall adjourn them on the first Monday in May. That preserves to each branch the absolute control of its own proceedings. Either may otherwise order; either may fix another time. If they do not, they will adjourn on that day; if they do, they will adjourn on such other day as they may be able to agree upon in the mode prescribed by the Constitution.

Whether this joint rule will bind another Congress or not, I say according to our proceedings, and our usages, that when we adopt a rule it remains a rule until repealed. In the House of Representatives it is usual, at the meeting of each Congress, to pass an order that the rules of the previous Congress be adopted for the government of it until otherwise ordered. While that is the usage in the House of Representatives, there is no such usage here. When we meet here on the first Monday in December of each year, we come together with the rules in force. Taking it for granted that they are in force until repealed, we do not readopt them; they continue from year to year the rules of the Senate or the rules of the two Houses, as the case may be, until otherwise ordered. Then this joint rule once adopted, stands upon the record as the joint order of the two Houses, fixing the day of adjournment on the first Monday in May, unless one House or the other shall otherwise order. The objection of the Senator from Michigan, I apprehend will not be found tenable when you look into it. He raises the point that our rules cease at the end of each Congress. He finds himself mistaken when he comes to inquire into that fact. It is not so; but even if it were so it would not change the result, for in the House of Representatives the order universally is that the rules remain until changed. That would continue this joint rule with all others.

Therefore it is utterly immaterial whether the rule expires once in two years or not, because the formal order entered in the House to continue the rules until otherwise ordered would continue this. It would lead to the same result as if they remained permanent.

But, the Senator from Michigan has made a discovery, and he has amused himself exceedingly by it. That discovery is, that you cannot fix an adjournment by a joint rule, when it is unconstitutional to do it by law; and he wishes to know how it is you can do a thing by a joint rule that you cannot do by law. He holds it up as a discovery that is to amaze the world, that anybody thought that it could be done. My answer is, you are to do it by a joint rule, for the very reason that you cannot do it by law. There are certain things that are to be done by law, and those things must be done by law, and in that mode only. There are certain other things which cannot be done by law, but may be done by one House. There are certain other things that may be done by the other House, and cannot be done by law. There are other things that can be done by the two Houses jointly, but cannot be done by law. Each of these things must be done in the mode prescribed by the Constitution. The adjournment is to be made by the agreement of the two Houses, in case they are able to agree; but if they are not able to agree they are to be adjourned by the President. The objection then, to fixing the adjournment by law is that you have no right to call in the assistance of the Executive to secure an adjournment until a failure to agree between the two Houses. General Jackson vetoed the bill fixing a day of adjournment for the reason that Congress had not tried to fix a day, and had not come to a disagreement before the President was called upon to decide. He vetoed it upon that ground, and I think properly, but in this case, we propose by an order of each House, to fix the day when we shall adjourn. That is precisely what we do now. The two Houses have been at work two or three weeks trying to agree upon a day when the Presiding Officers shall adjourn them. When we effect that agreement by passing a resolution in one and having it concurred in in the other, it becomes a joint order with the same effect that a joint rule of the two Houses would have.

I think, when we come to look at it, there is no constitutional difficulty in the way of a joint rule for adjournment. Your resolution, when it is agreed to, fixing a day now is a joint rule, a joint order, only it expires with the session. Why could we not make it one of the joint rules as we do other rules until we find it necessary to alter it?

Formerly, at the expiration of the long session of Congress, all business pending before it, and not acted upon, became void. We passed a resolution, a few years ago, that upon the expiration of the first session, the unfinished business should be transferred to the next session in the same order and condition in which it stood in each House on the day of adjournment. That joint rule stands from session to session. I believe it has not been renewed from the time it was first adopted. It has not expired yet. Probably that will never expire as long as the Government lasts, because it is found to work well. So it will be with this joint rule. It will remain until repealed; and the question is then, what will be its effect on our adjournment? I say that if we meet under the joint rule, with it upon the record, that we are to adjourn on a given day, say in May, we shall act up to that rule; and the consequence will be that we shall adjourn on that day, unless sufficient reasons occur just at the time of adjournment for prolonging the session. I have no idea that such a reason would occur once in ten years. I believe it would be as imperative in its results as a law would be, if we had power to pass a law on such a subject. For that reason I deem it important that we should fix the day of adjournment by a joint rule, whether we change the time of meeting or not; for whatever may become of the bill from the House fixing the first Monday in November for the meeting, I intend to press to a vote the joint rule by which we shall determine the time of adjournment of the long session. If we meet in November, I shall urge the joint rule in the shape in which I have offered it, to adjourn on the first Monday in May. If we do not meet till December, I shall modify it to adjourn on the first Monday in June in the long session. I shall ask the vote of the Senate on that rule, after the vote has been taken on the bill.

Mr. BROWN. I certainly, Mr. President, should not ask the Congress of the United States to abstain from doing that which would promote a great public interest for the convenience of my State; but if this bill passes, my State is not only to be put to a very great inconvenience, but to a very heavy expense. Our elections are fixed by our Constitution. I do not mean our election for Congress, but our State elections. They are fixed to take place on the first Monday in November. We cannot change them, as a matter of course, without altering our constitution. By law, the election for members of Congress is directed to be held at the same time. We can change that election, but you see at once that it would devolve upon us the necessity of holding two political elections in one year. Not only are we to be at the expense of first convening an extra session of the Legislature to change the time of holding the election for Congress, but we are to undergo the additional expense of holding two political elections. Our people are to be put to the inconvenience of being called twice from their homes in one year, to attend to the elections, and why is this?

I say again, if there is any great public convenience, any great public interest to be subserved by it, let it be done, let the inconvenience and the interest of a single State be made subordinate to the interest and convenience of the whole Union; but if there is no great public convenience, no great public benefit to result from the passage of this bill, then, when my State, when the State of my friend from Alabama, when other States come up and protest against its passage, I do hope the Senate will pause before they force it upon us. If it pass, it will either deprive the State of Mississippi of all representation in the other House of Congress during the first two entire months of the session, or else it will put us to the inconveniences I have pointed out, and to the expense of certainly not less than $100,000 in the first two years. These are matters to be taken into account, and I am by no means convinced by the argument of the Senator from North Carolina, and the Senator from Illinois, that there is any public convenience to be promoted by the passage of the bill. I am yet to hear one single argument which carries with it anything like weight to convince me that by passing the bill you are going to shorten the long sessions. I am wholly incredulous upon that point.

As to the joint rule which the Senator from Illinois proposes to introduce, of what power will it be? It is not to be binding upon either House of Congress, if it simply dissents from it. All that the Senate or the House of Representatives has to do is to say we will not adjourn on that day, and there is an end to the joint rule. Unlike other joint rules it does not need to be rescinded to be got clear of, because its own friends admit it has no vitality; it will simply exist not by the toleration of the two Houses as other joint rules do, but by the toleration of each House for itself.

I apprehend joint rules, which govern the action of the two Houses, are binding until repealed by the order of both Houses; but this rule is to be so made that, if either House dissent from it, it goes by the board. Of what effect will it be? The time comes for adjournment. The Senate or the House says, "We are not ready to adjourn," and there is an end of it. It does not require the concurrent action of both Houses to get clear of it. I do think there is less in that proposition to secure an adjournment than any I have heard coming from any quarter. I can only express some surprise that my friend from Illinois thought of shortening the sessions of Congress upon such a process. No, sir, pass this bill, and the result will be, that the long sessions will be lengthened out to their present period. Two months will be added to the sessions of Congress, and those two months will ordinarily be spent as they are now spent, in passing the appropriation bills, and then adjourning.

Just imagine that Congress were in session while the presidential election was going on? As my friend from Louisiana has already said, what would be done? You cannot even hold a political convention to nominate a candidate for the Presidency without breaking up Congress. Who does not know that during the sitting of the Democratic convention, and again during the sitting of the Whig convention, both Houses adjourned? Can you keep a quorum here? Can you transact business when the more important operation of electing a President is going on? Every four years you will have no quorum. Congress will not assemble.

I know there are one or two Senators—the Senators from California—who cannot get here now without leaving home so early as to be deprived of their vote for presidential electors; but pass this bill, and none of us can come; and upon this point it is simply a question of convenience between two Senators and two Representatives and all the Senators and all the Representatives. I did not, however, rise to discuss this question; but simply to say what would be its operation upon my State, and to add my testimony to what other gentlemen have brought forward as to the inconvenience that would result to the States if the bill should be passed.

Mr. JOHNSON. I am very anxious that this Congress should adjourn at an early day. I am exceedingly anxious that the long sessions of Congress should be shortened. I think a majority of the Senate would be exceedingly glad to get home at the long session sometime within a period of seven months. At the distance which some of us live from here, we must necessarily consume one month in going and coming. Take almost the shortest session that we can now have, under the present system, and we are nine months in one year absent from home. Then in three months we are compelled to be back again at our posts.

Now, sir, I see no way, with any kind of certainty, by which this extraordinary long session, consumed, as it is, by long speeches and by discussions, (to shorten which there is seemingly no moral or circumstantial coercion,) can be closed, and the business considered and transacted, unless by adopting some such method as this. I feel that if the short session be lengthened by commencing earlier, we shall all of us be under the necessity of adjourning earlier at the long session, for the purpose of spending some little of our time at home. If this can be done consistently with the public business, why not do it? That it can be done, seems to me to be clear from this fact, that when we go to the short session, and contemplate it as it now is, we see that the first month is entirely lost in the mere act of reorganization, and in anticipation of the holidays. The whole of that month is wasted away, so far as regards public business.

I am asked, and I hear the Senate asked seriously, what object we have in view in this operation? Why do you want to lengthen the short session? Do state some reason why this should be done. Mr. President, one reason is shortly this: that when you have given yourselves one month more anterior to the Christmas holidays, you will have secured, as I believe, two months of actual work in place of no work at all. Why? Because neither this branch nor the other branch of Congress will consent to waste two whole months; but the holidays being long off in the distance, they will not lose the whole month of December, but will work up to the time when the holidays themselves are to commence. We may lose one week then; but we shall lose no more by the operation. So that by giving ourselves one month more at that particular period of the session, we gain two months of time. This is no slight thing in regard to business, as gentlemen wish to know for what object we would do this. It is no slight thing in regard to our business; for how are we now situated in regard to the long session? No one knows when it is going to close. No one will hasten any particular business. If a man does not understand a case, he says, "I do not understand it; I am against it, so lay it over for the present, until I can look at it." There is no particular necessity to look at it, and he does not look at it; and the time is wasted, and business is laid over, one thing after another, until we are forced by the hot weather, and by the necessity of spending some little time at home, to adjourn. But let them know that by shortening the first session they must go on at once and act upon business, and they will do so. Let them know that if they have not acted on it, and cannot act on it at the first or long session, there is a hope left that the business may be done in the second; when, in fact, as it stands now, we know that in the two months of the short session there is none at all. In that view of it, it seems to me that we gain in regard to the business which is transacted, and we escape one of the most serious objections brought up by the friends as well as the opponents of this measure. At the short session, under the change, there will be some time for consideration. There may be some debate upon subjects; there will be some time for discussion; and intelligible votes can be intelligently given upon the particular subjects that may be before us; whereas now they are voted upon, as it is said, on confidence, for there is no time for consideration. That, sir, is an object to me. The object is twofold. I want some chance at the second session to do that business that is neglected or rejected at the first. I want that there shall no longer be any excuse, but that we may have plenty of time to go on ad libitum in transacting our business. I want again to escape the hot weather of July and August. I have been here for the last six years; and I can say that in that time we have invariably sat out the month of July. I have never known an adjournment at the long session during that time earlier than the 7th of August. There is no hope entertained here, I imagine no Senator entertains the hope, that we shall adjourn at this session before the first of August. I have no idea of it. I do not think it practical. I do not think that it can be done; and, sir, I have no certainty in my mind that this body will adjourn before the 15th or 20th of August. We should have adjourned on the first of August, if we had fixed the day at the proper time, because Senators must go home; they are bound to do so, and attend somewhat to private business; for every one knows that the compensation which they receive here, under the costs of living and of incidental expenses, is not only nothing, but it brings upon them, when they live as gentlemen, a dead loss. They must attend to business at home to sustain them here in the discharge of the public service. It is purely a service of honor that we have here; and some consideration should be given to the fact that gentlemen have to live, and have families that they are bound to support.

I see no way in which coercion can be put upon that dilatory spirit which seems to afflict both Houses of Congress, but to compel them to come here at an earlier day. That will cause them to adjourn earlier in the long session, and we shall also equalize the two sessions, and afford at each very nearly an equal opportunity for the discussion of all subjects which will promote, materially, the public good.

The inconveniences spoken of, so far as my State is concerned—and it is one of the extreme South—I do not think we shall feel at all. The case of Mississippi is cited emphatically. It may be a little hard upon that State; but Mississippi is a patriotic State, and I have no doubt she will cheerfully conform her regulations to the state of things that may be adopted by the sense of right of the Congress of the United States.

But, sir, suppose that, as is alleged, the State of Mississippi should be deprived of her representatives here for a time, would that be anything very extraordinary? Not at all. Look, now, around this Hall, sir, and see how many seats are now vacant. I speak not merely of seats whose occupants happen, at this moment, not to be here, but I refer to cases where Senators are absent from the city, as some are, and to cases where a State has but one representative here. Why, sir, there are two States in the Union which have only one Senator each to represent them here. And some gentlemen are called away to attend to business matters elsewhere, and remain out of the city for some time. Do they consider the injury which their absence inflicts on the interests of their States? But Mississippi, even under the circumstances which have been cited, will not be compelled to be unrepresented, for she will have at least one Senator on this floor. The ground on which the argument that she will suffer in her representation is based, is that her Senators are to be elected after the time fixed by the bill for the actual meeting of Congress.

Mr. ADAMS. Her Representatives in the other House are elected after the day fixed by the bill, and that was what my colleague spoke of.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then it is said that, by this measure, Mississippi will suffer in her representation in the other branch of Congress. That is to be regretted. I believe that is a serious matter; and, in all candor, I must say it is the greatest objection I have yet heard to this bill. But, sir, you can make no change of this sort without conflicting with the interest of some State in the Union. If the result alluded to should happen, it would undoubtedly be an evil to the State of Mississippi; but that evil would only be temporary, and the remedy could be applied by herself at any time. For a temporary inconvenience to Mississippi, will she insist that the business of the whole nation shall forever be subjected to a practical inconvenience which is universally acknowledged? I think not. I think her people will not ask it; I believe her Senators will not. If other gentlemen entertained different views from them, if others prefer to carry out their honest convictions as to the general interest of the Government and people, those Senators will justify them, surely they will not censure them for voting in accordance with their deliberate judgments.

Another objection is urged to this bill, on the ground that by meeting on the first Monday of November we shall not be enabled to be at home at the period of the presidential election. Sir, the people of the United States have sufficient intelligence and virtue to know how to cast their votes for President of the United States, without the presence of Senators and Representatives to tell them for whom to deposit their ballots. Sir, our people do not submit to dictation in such matters; they make up their minds upon the merits and the principles of the men presented to them for support, and I do not think the presence of members of Congress at the polls would influence the convictions of our free voters. Still the time of holding the elections can be changed if necessary, so that, if this be an evil, it is one which can be easily remedied. The same may be said of the other evils said to be likely to result from this measure. They are of such a nature as to be easily removed.

For one, Mr. President, though I come from a southwestern State, though my home is a considerable distance south of this, I must say that I should prefer to be at home during the extremely hot weather. I do not look upon my home there as a land of death to be escaped from in the midst of summer. After spending the winter here, I prefer to fly to the land of the South, sickly as it is said to be. It is a home, and a healthy one to me. I am happy when I am there with my family. I wish to be relieved from what is the most uncomfortable service on the face of the earth—attendance on congressional duties during the months of July, August, and September. I have repeatedly sat in this Capitol as a member of the other House during at least two of those months; and I am sick and tired of them. I know that session during those months is of no benefit to the public service. I believe that if we were to adjourn regularly on the 1st of July at every long session, the business usually done in July, August, and September, would be done in the months of May, and June. I think no one here would regret such a change.

I hope the amendment to substitute October for November will be rejected. I think it is rather extravagant to commence our sessions two months earlier every year. I consider the one month proposed to be gained by the bill is sufficient for the public service. I hope that the amendment will be rejected, and that the bill will be passed precisely as it came from the House. When that is done, I wish to see the proposition of the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] to fix by joint rule the adjournment of the long session at an earlier period, adopted.

Mr. WALKER. I offered the amendment to strike out "November" and insert "October," because the distinguished Senator from Illinois gave us notice some days ago that he would introduce a proposition requiring Congress to meet annually on the first Monday of October, instead of the first Monday of December. But, sir, we heard from him this morning, and he did not seem to defend his own proposition. As that is the case, and as other gentlemen seem to treat it with disfavor, and as I do not wish to offer a proposition to be voted down, I will withdraw the amendment, and vote against the bill as it came from the House of Representatives.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President, I do not intend to detain the Senate, and I should not now say a word, but for the very disrespectful remarks, as I think, which fell from the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] I hoped that the time had gone by when that Senator, in discussing questions in this body, would undertake, at least as far as I am concerned, either a dictatorial or censorial course of argument. But, sir, it seems that a course of discussion which differs from his judgment cannot be carried on in the Senate without everybody so differing from him meeting with denunciation.

Now, why was it necessary for the Senator to seek to ridicule an argument which I had used, by saying that I had made a discovery, and had sent it out to the world? Sir, the "discovery" alluded to is one which every gentleman around me has made. It is a discovery in which almost every gentleman here participates. It consists simply in this: That the Constitution of the United States, having conferred upon each Congress the power to determine its own adjournment at the first session, you cannot, by any law, rule, or regulation, take away that right. Now, sir, with great deference, I would submit to any judicial tribunal—I would submit to the Presiding Officer of this body—that if the joint rule proposed by the Senator were adopted, no Presiding Officer of a Congress would undertake to adjourn either House without some further action. Why? Simply for the reason that the proposed rule is palpably against the Constitution of the United States, and therefore but as so much blank paper.

After the contemptuous manner in which the Senator sought to treat this argument—an argument which is conceded to be correct by every gentleman whose opinion I have chanced to hear on the subject—he undertook to tell the reason why it could be done, and he said that the reason why you can do it by a rule is because you cannot do it in any other way. There, sir, is logic for you! The Constitution of the United States prohibits this Congress from fixing a time of adjournment for the next one. The Senator undertakes to say that there is a power to override the Constitution by a joint rule of the two Houses, and that the reason of that power is because it is unconstitutional! I admire the logic no more than I do the manner in which it was given.

Sir, I think a pretty good argument can be made—and if it were an open question, I certainly should venture, with great respect, to make it—against the power of Congress to adopt a joint rule at all. The Constitution of the United States says that "each House may determine the rules of its proceedings." The question arose during the last Congress, in the House of Representatives, in respect to the power of the Committee on Printing; and the settled judgment of the House, after a long debate, was, that the joint Committee on Printing had no power at all over the business of that House; but that the committee provided for by the rules of the House held the power of the House in respect to its printing. That decision was undoubtedly correct. The Constitution contains the provision to which I have referred; but it nowhere confers on Congress power to make a joint rule for the two Houses. Notwithstanding this, when it was suggested today, as I thought, with a proper degree of respect for the opinions of others—certainly it was so intended—that a rule thus made could not have force to override a plain provision of the Constitution, the Senator from Illinois saw fit, in a very pompous manner, to say the least, to treat it with ridicule. I must say, sir, that I dislike that course of argument; I dislike it exceedingly; and whatever other Senators may think on the subject, so far as I am concerned, I will never submit to it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not mean to continue this discussion any further. I agree with the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] fully, that one Congress has no authority whatever to make any provision in reference to the time of adjournment of another Congress; and I am not willing to violate the Constitution of the United States in order to remedy what may be an evil; I prefer to pursue the course pointed out by the Constitution itself, and amend it if necessary. Without going into an argument, I will say, that I am perfectly satisfied, from the whole Constitution, from all its various clauses, that the power of fixing a day of adjournment is left by the Constitution in each Congress in reference to itself at its first session or any session other than its last. The time of meeting may be prescribed by law, but the time of adjournment is left to the individual Congress itself, and is dependent on the agreement of the Houses, or, in case of their disagreement, upon the act of the President of the United States. This seems to me so clear that I shall not enter into any discussion of it.

But, sir, here is a proposition to lengthen the short session. So far as the other branch of Congress is concerned, we have had no indication whatever that its effect will be to shorten the long session; nor do I believe it will. As I said when this question was up before, I believe you never will be able to shorten the long session until you alter the mode of compensating members. I am aware that there are difficulties about that. I am aware that the fact of the act of 1816, which did turn a per diem allowance into a fixed compensation, having been the cause of the great unpopularity of the individuals who voted for it, has its influence over the minds of members of both Houses, and that probably such a law could not now be passed, though I have hardly met a man who, in ordinary conversation, did not admit it to be a proper law to pass. I think gentlemen over-estimate the causes connected with the unpopularity of the act of 1816; and I believe that ultimately such a law may possibly be attained. The unpopularity of that measure arose from the fact the existing Congress applied the compensation to themselves, and, in so doing, actually doubled their own compensation. That was the reason why the people were against it.

Sir, the people of this country will understand any question that is fairly presented before them. It is so palpable that the compensation of members of Congress should be paid in such a mode as would superinduce the transaction of the public business in the shortest time in which it could be justly finished—and, in my judgment, it could be transacted in a short session of three months and a long session of four or five months, every Congress, quite as well as, if not better than, it is now done—that, in my judgment, the people would sustain a law altering the mode of compensation. I have nothing now to do with what should be the amount of the compensation; that is an entirely different question. I believe that until you alter the mode of compensation, you never will shorten the long session; and until you do shorten the long session, I am unwilling to lengthen the short session.

I do not know what may be the action of the Senate on this bill. It has already been passed by the House of Representatives. If, therefore, the Senate should adopt it, and the President should sanction it, as he undoubtedly would if presented to him—it being a question affecting the two Houses of Congress alone—it would become a law. If it is to become a law, I think another measure is requisite to be connected with it. Complaint has been justly made that, in some States, members of the other House are not elected until after the time fixed by the bill for the meeting of Congress; and, therefore, as that cannot be remedied until the next meeting of their Legislatures, you put them to the serious inconvenience and great expense of having a special session of their Legislatures, or of remaining unrepresented for some period of time. Sir, as we have, by the Constitution, authority to fix the time for holding the elections of members of Congress, or to change the time fixed by the States, and as I think it is desirable that all Representatives in Congress should be elected on the same day, I have prepared an amendment, which I shall offer to this bill, lengthening the sessions of Congress, providing that the time of electing Representatives in every State shall be on the first Tuesday of October, 1854, for the next Congress, and that thereafter every succeeding Congress shall be elected on the first Tuesday in October, bi-yearly.

To carry out this provision, no State legislation will be required; but the election for Representatives will be on the same day throughout the Union. Years ago, presidential electors in the various States were chosen on different days, prescribed by the respective States; but that has been changed, and they are now elected on the same day throughout the United States. If the argument was good in regard to presidential electors, it is good in regard to members of the House of Representatives. The Congress of the United States have an undoubted right, under the Constitution, to alter "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives." By my amendment, the time of choosing Representatives is alone changed; and it obviates the necessity of calling together the State Legislatures. I now offer the following amendment as an additional section:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Representatives in Congress from the several States of this Union shall be elected, in each State, on the first Tuesday in October, 1854, for the next Congress, and on the first Tuesday in October in every two years thereafter for each succeeding Congress.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If we are to have a lengthening of the short session, I wish, at all events, to provide against a lengthening of the long one; and I will therefore move an amendment to make the evil half as great as it will be under the bill as it stands. I move to amend by inserting after the word "Congress" the words "at each second session thereof," so as to make the first or long session of each Congress commence in December, as at present.

Mr. BAYARD. I must object to the amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. It will not be adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not know whether it will or not; but I am perfectly aware that these things are to be adjusted solely in reference to the convenience of certain States. Now, the effect of the amendment is directly to interfere with the election which takes place in my State during the present year, and every two years thereafter—in the even years 1856, 1858, &c. The effect of the amendment, if adopted, is simply to apply to those States which elect Representatives anterior to the commencement of the congressional term, and not to affect other States which do not hold their elections until after the term has commenced.

I am aware, of course, that the small States of the Union can expect little regard in matters of this kind from the vote of this body. Why, sir, we even heard the honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] urge as an argument on this floor that, in a matter which has no more to do with the House of Representatives than with the Senate, or with the rights of any citizen of the United States, (the time for the meeting of Congress,) because that House, which represents numbers alone, has pleased to pass a bill in reference to the time of the meeting of Congress, therefore this body, representing States, which was meant by the Constitution to operate as a check and balance in the Government, is to be entirely governed by the views of the House. Sir, I repudiate such a doctrine. I am unwilling that this amendment shall be adopted. If other gentlemen look to the convenience of their States, I have a right to look to mine. There are other States, large as well as small, which hold their elections at a time when this amendment would seriously interfere with them.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; and on the question of ordering it to a third reading, Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS stated that he had paired off with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS.]

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bell, Brodhead, Foot, Geyer, Gwin, Hamlin, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Seward, Sumner, and Thompson of Kentucky—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Brown, Butler, Cass, Chase, Clay, Dixon, Dodge of Wisconsin, Dodge of Iowa, Evans, Fessenden, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Gillette, Houston, Hunter, Mallory, Mason, Norris, Pettit, Pratt, Rockwell, Rusk, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Toucey, Wade, Walker, and Williams—33.

So the bill was rejected.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, June 27, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

LIGHT-HOUSES ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter addressed to the Treasury Department by Gibbons & Kelly, contractors for building certain light-houses on the Pacific coast, and of a report and resolution adopted by the Senate upon the subject of their claim for extra work done, expenses incurred, and losses sustained, for which they claim to be entitled to compensation to the amount of $59,434. The Secretary submits the expediency of making the appropriation required.

The communication and accompanying documents were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

EXPEDITION AGAINST CUBA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Mississippi. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to furnish to this House, as far as in his opinion may not be incompatible with the public interests, such information relative to citizens of the United States and others, residing therein, being engaged in organizing and fitting out a military expedition for the invasion of the Island of Cuba, as may have been in his possession on the 31st of May last, the date of his proclamation on that subject.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object.

TERMINATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I propose to the House a resolution to terminate debate on bill No. 405, the treaty bill, on the meeting of the House tomorrow, so as to give the House the entire day to-day for debating it, if they see fit, to a late hour in the evening. And if I am allowed to do so, I desire to say this in relation to it. It is the general desire, expressed all through this House and the Senate, that we should terminate this session of Congress on the 31st of July next. I am as much in favor of it as any member; and I say this to the House: on Monday next it will be in order to move to take up the resolution for adjournment; and if the business of the House shall progress from this time up to Monday, so as that I may, for a moment, believe it probable that there is a prospect of getting through the public business by the day indicated, I, as far as I am concerned, shall most willingly vote for that adjournment.

I therefore introduce, at this time, the resolution to close debate on the treaty bill; and on it I ask for the previous question.

Mr. EWING. Will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] allow me to make a suggestion? Why not move to close the debate in five minutes?

Mr. MACE. I desire to ask the House to allow the committee on ocean mail steamers a clerk for twenty days, at the usual rate of compensation. I would state to the House, that in order to get the report from that committee prepared, we have already a clerk actively engaged; and if the House will not allow us the clerk for twenty days, of course we shall have to make an appeal to them hereafter, or pay the clerk out of our own pockets.

Mr. HOUSTON. The resolution of the gentleman from Indiana will be in order after mine is disposed of.

Mr. MACE. Then I will not press it now.

Mr. HAVEN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his demand for the previous question, as I would like to say a word in reference to the closing of debate before the resolution is passed upon.

The SPEAKER. If no objection be made, the gentleman will be allowed to make his suggestion. No objection was made.

Mr. HAVEN. I was going to say this to the House, that from the turn debate has taken upon this subject, it is evident that if the House does not call for the correspondence upon this subject, and for the instructions to our Minister who negotiated the treaty, this debate may as well be closed as not; for it seems to be conceded upon all hands—by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BEN-TOX,] who asked for the correspondence yesterday, as well as by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BATLY]—that this House has the right, constitutionally, and as a matter of expediency, if it deems fit to do so, to withhold this appropriation. It becomes, therefore, not a constitutional question; for it seems that no one is desirous of raising and debating that question. Everybody concedes that it is the right of the House to withhold the money. If this is so, and if we are to dispose of this business upon the face of the treaty itself, let us proceed to do it at once. There is no use of talking about it, or of sitting here looking each other in the face. If the friends of the Administration, if the friends of the bill—and I do not desire to raise a political or party issue—are willing that the instructions to the Minister and the correspondence shall be laid before this House, so that we can act upon this subject as a matter of expediency and propriety, then the consideration becomes different, and debate ought not to be closed for at least two days. I suppose the correspondence is in such a condition that it could be got at immediately. It has been sent to the Senate; and I presume to get it would take no more time than to go to the other end of the avenue, break the seals which guard it, and bring it here.

I only desire to say to the House, and to the friends of this measure, that this treaty stands upon a little different footing from that of any treaty which has come to this House for a series of years. It is as well known as anything can be, though not before the House officially, that this treaty came here last winter, with a provision in it, by which, for substantially the same consideration as is contained in it now, we proposed to agree to pay the sum of $20,000,000 instead of $10,000,000.

It is well known that when the treaty was submitted to the Senate for their ratification, they, with the correspondence and the instructions to the Minister before them, saw fit to repudiate that agreement, and amended the treaty by striking out that portion of it which agreed to pay the sum of $20,000,000, and instead thereof, for substantially the same consideration, as the country understands, substituted an agreement to pay $10,000,000 only.

Mr. HAMILTON. I regret to be obliged to interrupt the gentleman from New York; but I believe the House did not understand that the gentleman was to be permitted to make a speech in opposition to the treaty.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from New York had a right to enter into the general discussion of the merits of the treaty. He supposed that the gentleman only desired and asked permission to make a few remarks in reference to the time of closing debate.

Mr. HAVEN. I was just rounding up my remarks, for the purpose of bringing them to a close. I did not, and do not, intend to raise any political question about it. I was simply saying that the House, seeming unanimously to have come to the conclusion that they had the power of disposing of this matter and withholding the appropriation, and that it becomes simply a question of expediency; I was only saying that the treaty did stand upon a little different footing from any other treaty in reference to which we have been called to act. Some suspicion had been thrown over the transaction. I have mentioned some of the circumstances, and I had intended to have mentioned one or two more; but if there is any impropriety in doing it, in the opinion of a single member of the House, I will not pursue that course of remark at all. I will only say, that if it is the intention of the House not to call for that correspondence at all, we had better close the debate at once.

Now, what I desire to say—and I intend to stop after having said it—is, that the indication seemed yesterday to be pretty clear that the House would not call for this correspondence. No renewed application has been made for it to-day, and it is useless for us to discuss the question whether the House has the right to reject the appropriation; for that seemed to be universally conceded; and that is the only question left to discuss, if we are not going into the merits of the treaty itself. I had a very few words in addition which I did intend to say when I rose, but as I make these remarks by the indulgence of the House, I will not attempt, by indirect means, to accomplish my object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, if the gentleman from New York desires to submit an amendment shortening the time mentioned. I named that time because, after having spent the morning hour in other business, there will be only time for two or three speeches before the usual time of adjournment. If the gentleman wishes to offer an amendment, I will withdraw the call for the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. Oh! no.

Mr. HOUSTON. Very well; then I ask for a vote upon the resolution.

The question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I demand the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Aiken, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Banks, Belcher, Bocoek, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Caruthers, Caskie, Chamberlain, Chastain, Churchwell, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Craigie, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Eddy, Ellison, Etheridge, Everhart, Faulkner, Florence, Gamble, Goode, Green, Greenwood, Grow, Hamilton, Wiley P. Harris, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Hillyer, Houston, Hunt, Johnson, George W. Jones, Roland Jones, Kerr, Kidwell, Kurtz, Latham, Letcher, Lindsley, McDougall, McMullin, McNair, Macy, Maxwell, Smith Miller, Nichols, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Orr, Packer, John Perkins, Phelps, Phillips, Pratt, Preston, Puryear, Ready, Reese, Richardson, Thomas Ritchey, Robbins, Ruffin, Seward, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, David Stuart, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Vansant, Wells, Witte, Daniel B. Wright, and Zollicoffer—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Benson, Benton, Campbell, Carpenter, Cook, Corwin, Crocker, Cullom, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Eastman, Thomas D. Eliot, Farley, Fenton, Flagg, Giddings, Aaron Harlan, Haven, Heister, Howe, Hughes, Daniel T. Jones, J. Taylor, Tracy, Upham, Vail, Wade, Walley, Walsli, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, Wheeler, and Yates—58.

So the resolution was passed.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table; which latter motion was agreed to.

CLERK FOR A COMMITTEE.

Mr. MACE. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the resolution which I indicated a few moments since.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the select committee on ocean mail steamers be allowed a clerk for twenty days, at the usual compensation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to that resolution.

Mr. MACE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question, if the House will allow me. Does he desire that this committee shall pay for the services of a clerk out of their own pockets? Because, if he does, I am ready to do it.

Mr. JONES. I will withdraw my objection to the resolution, though I do not see the necessity for it.

The resolution was then received and adopted.

Mr. ROBBINS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

MEMORIALS FROM TENNESSEE.

Mr. STANTON, of Tennessee. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to present sundry memorials and joint resolutions from the Legislature of Tennessee, merely for the purpose of having them referred and printed.

There was no objection, and Mr. S. presented the memorials, &c.; which were referred as indicated below:

1. Asking Congress to grant public lands for the benefit of volunteers from the State of Tennessee, mustered in obedience to the requisition of the President of the United States in 1836. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

2. For payment of horses and equipage lost by the mounted volunteers called into service during the Mexican war, from the State of Tennessee. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

3. For pensions to the officers and soldiers who served in the war of 1812, and in the various Indian wars. Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

4. For the construction of a railroad to the Pacific, commencing at Memphis. Referred to the Select Committee on the subject of a Pacific railroad.

5. In favor of repealing the duty on railroad iron. Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

6. For compensation to William Reed, of the State of Tennessee, for service rendered in the years 1792 and 1793. Referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to submit to the House a resolution.

Mr. ROBBINS. The debate is closed upon the treaty bill at twelve o'clock to-morrow, and I cannot yield further.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask the gentleman if he knows of a single gentleman who desires to speak upon that bill except his colleague, [Mr. Jones?]

The SPEAKER. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. FAULKNER. Well, sir, I desire to call the attention of the House to the necessity of fixing some day for the Army bill. There is a very great urgency for the more efficient organization of that branch of the public service.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks the unanimous consent of the House, and appeals to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion to go into Committee of the Whole that a special order may be made in reference to a certain bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I object.

Mr. FLORENCE. Last Saturday the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. Shower,] now absent, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Willis Wilson by mistake. That bill had not been considered, and he has requested me to move its recommitment to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, which I now do.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. FAULKNER. I reported, last Saturday, from the Committee on Military Affairs, a bill "for the relief of Helen McKay, widow and administratrix of Eneas McKay, late a deputy quartermaster in the Army of the United States," unaccompanied by a written report. I desire now, with the consent of the House, to submit the report, that it may be ordered to be printed, and be before the Committee of the Whole when the bill comes up for consideration.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The question was then taken on Mr. Robbins's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DISNEY in the chair.)

THE MEXICAN TREATY.

The CHAIRMAN stated that when the committee last rose, it had under consideration a bill "to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic, of 30th December, 1853, as amended by the Senate of the United States;" and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Jones] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. JONES, of Pennsylvania, said that the provisions of this treaty, being printed, were before the House. They were few, and so explicit and clear, that every member of the committee can easily comprehend them. The first position in the treaty is, that we are secured twenty millions of acres of land. This land is thought to be not of so much importance on account of its intrinsic value, but because it secures us now what we supposed was secured by the former treaty; that is, the right of a southern route for a railroad to our Pacific possessions.

Another provision is, the treaty releases us from the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which stipulates that the United States shall restrain the Indians from making incursions on Mexican territories; and, further, that in the event of being unable to do so, then the United States will punish the Indians, and exact compensation and justice to the Mexicans for the damage done.

Two different constructions had been put on this clause of that treaty. We contend that it stipulates nothing more than that if the Indians shall make incursions on Mexican soil, the United States, by an armed force, shall punish the Indians, and then exact from them precisely the same amount of justice we would exact for ourselves in similar cases. But this is not the construction of the Mexican Government, which construes the treaty to mean that where damage is done to them, we are to be held responsible for the damage, and make compensation out of the National Treasury.

NEW SERIES....No. 97.

It is known that the Mexican Government has already preferred claims to the amount of sixteen millions, and that ex-President Fillmore was willing to make a payment of six millions, to settle this very question. And not only sixteen millions, but rumor says claims have been made by the Mexican Government to the amount of forty millions. He did not say anything about their validity. According to his idea, Mexico has no claim at all. But by this treaty we got rid of the difficulty. Another point this treaty settles forever, at least it is hoped, is the question of boundary; and it proposes a perpetual peace. This should be an inducement for anti-war men to vote for it.

He then proceeded to reply to the remarks of Mr. BENTON, delivered yesterday, denying that a breach of privilege had been committed on this House by the negotiation of the treaty. [See Appendix for his speech.]

Mr. HAVEN said: I beg my friend from Alabama, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] who desired to get the floor, to feel assured that, so far as I am concerned, he shall soon be gratified; for I do not intend to address the committee at length upon the merits of the question before it. My only reason for addressing the committee now at all is, for the purpose of finishing a few sentences which I commenced communicating to the House this morning before we went into committee, and in which I was arrested (for which I make no complaint) by my friend [Mr. HAMILTON] at a point which I fancied he thought they sat rather too closely upon the friends of this bill.

I also desire a few words, by way of explanation, in regard to the statements and suggestions made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JONES,] who has just resumed his seat.

In what I may say, I beg the committee to understand that I intend to cast no censure upon any one in reference to this treaty; my difficulty is, that without the instructions to, and correspondence with, the Minister who negotiated this treaty, I have no knowledge upon which I can vote this money, or approve or censure any person connected with this transaction. I have nothing, sir, but the bare text of the treaty on which I can act. I shall not censure the President or the Department of State; for there is nothing on the face of the treaty, or in this very brief message of the President, which indicates whether the instructions to the negotiator were right or wrong.

I shall not censure the Minister who negotiated the treaty, because his acts have been adopted and ratified by the President; and I shall not censure the Senate, for it is a coordinate body, having functions in some respects higher than the House of Representatives in reference to treaties—certainly much higher in reference to treaties which, in their consummation, do not require legislative action, as this does. Like all fair and honorable men, all the parties referred to are entitled to the presumption that they have properly discharged their official duties in respect to the matter now in controversy. But, sir, whilst I intend to speak in this spirit, I also intend to press upon the committee, as well as I may, certain questions of expediency, of good faith, and of fair legislative dealing, which I think every true friend of the Administration, of the Senate, and the gentleman who negotiated this treaty, will do well to observe.

I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania to take the same ground on the question of the constitutional rights of this House to grant or withhold this appropriation, which every other member has taken who has as yet addressed the House or this committee on this subject. He concedes the right of this House to withhold this appropriation if, in their judgment, if, in their good sense, if, in the exercise of their best discretion for protecting the interests of the country, they should think they ought to withhold it, or that it is inexpedient to grant it.

Now, sir, that being so, I do not propose to say a word upon the constitutional right of the House in this regard; but I will assume what the House, so far, unanimously claims and insists to be its prerogative. Assuming the House, then, to be right in this claim, the only question left for it to consider is the question of expediency—an ordinary question in legislation; and the only information which we have to guide us on this subject, on which we can properly act as legislators, is that which we have on the face of the treaty, with the very elaborately short message which the President has seen fit to lay before us. In addition to the information contained in the text of the treaty, we find that it refers to two antecedent treaties; the one the treaty of peace after the late war with Mexico, called and known as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, and the other the treaty of amity, commerce and navigation, concluded between the two countries on the 5th of April, 1831. Now, what I desire to say, by way of explanation to what has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is particularly in relation to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. And in saying this, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the language of the eleventh article of that treaty, because, so far as that is concerned, almost every man on this floor, who undertakes to justify the payment of this large sum of ten millions, agreed to be paid by this treaty now sent us by the President—I do not now say whether it is proper or improper—puts it upon the ground that the claims which our sister Republic of Mexico has upon us by virtue of that eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo are here provided for, and we are forever released from the same.

Sir, I deny any particular pecuniary obligation on the part of the American Government under this eleventh article. And in this every gentleman who has so far addressed the committee seem inclined to concur. I have always understood that article substantially as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] says he understands it; substantially what the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] claims the proper construction of it should be, and is. Such was always, so far as I have known, and so far as I have been able to infer from documents, or otherwise, the construction put upon it by the last Administration, and by all statesmen who have expressed an opinion upon the subject. Now, the material words of that eleventh article I will read. They are as follows; and will be found in the ninth volume of the Statutes at Large, page 930. It commences:

"Considering that a great part of the territories, which, by the present treaty, are to be comprehended for the future within the limits of the United States, is now occupied by savage tribes, who will hereafter be under the exclusive control of the Government of the United States, and whose incursions within the territory of Mexico would be prejudicial in the extreme, it is solemnly agreed, that all such incursions shall be forcibly restrained by the Government of the United States, whosoever this may be necessary; and that when they cannot be prevented, they shall be punished by the said Government, and satisfaction for the same shall be exacted."

Now, let me ask gentlemen to notice particularly the precise language of the remainder of the article. The rest of the language measures the punishment this Government is to inflict, and the satisfaction it is to exact. The rest of the language gives the precise measure by which our exertions shall be controlled, and the extent to which we have agreed to carry them; and gentlemen will see that it was an argument in reference to good neighborhood and good feeling between the two countries. Here it is:

"All in the same way, and with equal diligence and energy, as if the same incursions were meditated, or committed within its own territory, against its own citizens."

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is what Mr. Polk's Administration, a good Democratic Administration, in and by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, undertook to do; and I submit to the friends of that Administration, to the gentlemen on the other side of this House, that it is unfair upon their part to press and force upon that treaty a construction which is unjust to him and to the gentlemen of the Senate who ratified it. It was a treaty of good neighborhood, and it was an undertaking with Mexico to do, in relation to the Indians who troubled her citizens upon the borders of the Mexican territory, precisely what we would do in reference to the Indians who troubled our own citizens in that vicinity; that we would use reasonable diligence in preventing their incursions into Mexican territory; that we would exact indemnity from the Indians—not pay it ourselves, but exact it from them; and do it all precisely as if the depredations were upon our own citizens.

Now, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] suggested that the last Administration took a different view of this eleventh article. I know the gentleman has no desire to make an improper suggestion in regard to that Administration, any more than I have in reference to the one which preceded it—Mr. Polk's Administration—or the present one. Who supposed, who ever believed, when the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was made, that this eleventh article of it would force this country into a position where we might be called upon, as stated or intimated by two gentlemen upon the other side of the House, to pay to Mexico a claim of $40,000,000.

Both the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] who addressed the committee yesterday, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JONES,] who addressed us to-day, put forth some kind of indefinite and shadowy suggestions that Mexico has formally claimed of this Government, as indemnity under this article, $40,000,000. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen both handled this point very cautiously; for they saw it was a Democratic Administration (Mr. Polk's) who got us into these magnificent difficulties of $40,000,000 under the eleventh clause of a Democratic treaty. And that was a rather dangerous foil to be used in favor of the present Administration, in professing to buy us out of them cheaply by the payment of this $10,000,000.

But, sir, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] thinks he has heard it said that Mr. Fillmore's Administration recognized the validity of this claim, and offered Mexico $6,000,000 to be released from it. I believe the gentleman is wholly at fault in his supposition. I am not aware any such offer was ever made whilst Mr. Fillmore was President. I am quite sure it was not his opinion, nor was it the opinion of his Cabinet, that any pecuniary liability rested upon this Government under that eleventh article. Whatever he would have been willing to see paid to Mexico in that behalf, to settle a controversy likely to arise between the two Governments, as an honorable man will sometimes buy his peace from a litigious neighbor, I have no doubt that he and his cabinet thought Mexico had no just or equitable claim to any pecuniary indemnity under this article.

Since the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] made the insinuation, I have sent for the message and accompanying documents of 1851-'52, and I find what I suppose to be the views of Mr. Fillmore's Administration on this subject, very pertinently stated in the report of the Secretary of War.

I desire to read an extract from it, in reference to our duties and the rights of Mexico under this eleventh article; for it appears to me to contain about the whole argument on my side of this question.

Mr. Conrad, after detailing with proper particularity the operations and results of the Army stationed in western Texas and New Mexico—for gentlemen will remember the vast trouble, difficulty, and cost of keeping up that frontier service, and to what an unfashionable strictness and responsibility we held the Secretary of War then, and how by his aid we reduced the extravagances that preceded that Administration in that regard—goes on to say as follows; and I ask attention to it:

"The United States have thus endeavored to fulfill to their fullest extent the obligations imposed upon them by their late treaty with Mexico.

"It surely was never contemplated that the entire expense and responsibility of defending her territory against these incursions should devolve upon us. The language of the treaty admits of no such construction, and if it did it would require of us what it would be obviously impossible for us to perform.

"As the United States have no right to station their troops within the limits of Mexico, how is it possible for them entirely to protect her against tribes, most of whom occupy the vast desert lying between the two countries? All that we can do is to make common cause with her, to make her wrongs our own; to chastise, if possible, the tribes by whom they are committed; to compel them, whenever it is possible to do so, to make restitution of Mexican prisoners and property; and finally, in our treaties with them, to guard the interest of Mexican citizens as carefully as those of our own, and to punish any violation of the one as severely as we do that of the other.

"It is manifest, too, that whatever efforts we may make for the protection of Mexico, will not only be fruitless, but absolutely prejudicial, unless they are aided by corresponding efforts on her part. The number of our military posts, the vigilance, activity, and courage of our troops, all tend to drive those marauders from our border towards that of Mexico, where they can carry on their depredations with almost certain impunity."

That, sir, was the view taken by the last Administration in reference to this subject. That was the view taken by Mr. Webster, and it is the view I have always heard put forth by the friends of the last Administration in reference to the pecuniary and binding obligations of that treaty. I never heard any other view taken of the subject by any well informed American gentleman until now, when some reason or pretense is sought for, as an excuse or justification for appropriating this $10,000,000. But, sir, I am bound to do the gentleman from Pennsylvania the justice to say, that whilst, like an adroit counsellor, he insinuates that others may take such a view of the eleventh article, he boldly and honorably disclaims any such construction for himself, and declares he holds the same opinions I hold on the subject.

Now, sir, I shall not discuss this treaty further upon its merits or its obvious demerits. I have not, this House has not, any of the information necessary to such a discussion; it is withheld from us. Pretty much all the value that any gentleman here perceives, or pretends we get by the treaty, is the release from the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. Some gentlemen, it is true, pretend to see value in the territory as a route for a railroad to the Pacific. As to the value of the soil, the formation of the country, and its eligibility as a railroad route, I know but very little. I know that Colonel Cook, who led a regiment through the country from El Paso on the Rio Grande to the Pacific, but a few years ago, was entirely unable to get over the almost interminable deserts and fearful mountain ranges himself with his regiment or his teams, without going into Chihuahua and Sonora, south of the line fixed by this treaty, several miles from the Guadalupe Pass, by a circle sweeping south of this line, and striking San Bernardino, and coming back north on to this line again at about the one hundred and tenth parallel of longitude west of Greenwich. North of that route he could not pass with his wagons or mules; so that any railroad track upon this newly-acquired territory, must run up square against, or directly into, mountains that a brave and enduring man, skillful in expeditions, could not drive his mules or wagons over.

Where, then, sir, is there any consideration in our favor, on which we can justify ourselves in voting this immense amount of money, under these extraordinary circumstances? Still, Mr. Chairman, I do not undertake to say, acting in the dark as I am, that circumstances may not exist which render this appropriation of $10,000,000 proper. But I do say, and here I plant myself, that this House has no means of determining whether it is proper or not. We are left entirely in the dark. We are required to vote this large amount of money upon a blind confidence, and without a reason rendered to us, or that we can render to the country. I will vote cheerfully for this treaty, if it is a fair one, made without fraud, and not controlled by stock-jobbers, land sharks, and speculators. Sir, for one, I want to see the instructions to the negotiator, and the correspondence with him, which this House has, in my judgment, most improperly refused to call for. What I might do if I could peruse that, I cannot say; but I can say, if I found it all correct and fair, I would cheerfully vote for this appropriation.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from New York certainly does not intend to say that the House has refused to give a call for this information.

Mr. HAVEN. I shall be very glad to listen to any suggestions upon that subject; but certainly the gentleman from Alabama does not intend to say this House has made the call; nor does he intend to say that very strenuous efforts have not been made to procure it. I did understand my colleague [Mr. PECKHAM] to make an effort to obtain the passage of a resolution calling for this information, and I understood, also, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] to make a very decided demonstration for the purpose of obtaining this correspondence.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is true, and at a time which they themselves knew had been set apart for the discussion upon this measure. If they really desired to have this correspondence, they should have called for it at the time the treaty was sent to the House; and that is the time they would have called for it, if they had really wished to have it.

Mr. HAVEN. I am glad that my friend from Alabama manifests some little desire to set himself right in reference to this transaction. It argues that he begins to feel the impropriety of being so far wrong.

Sir, does not the gentleman know that the message communicating the treaty to this House bears date only one week ago this very day, on the 20th instant; that it was not received or opened here until Wednesday the 21st instant, and that when, on the next day, being only Thursday last, he reported this bill, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] instantly arose and informed the House that he wished to be heard in the matter, and that, in his opinion, the privileges of this House had been violated? Did the gentleman not know then, sir, that this correspondence was wanted here by the gentleman from Missouri? And does he not now know that yesterday only, Monday only, sir, was the very first day when, by the rules of this House, it was in order to offer the resolution calling for this correspondence? Nay, more, sir; has he forgotten in one day that almost immediately upon the House convening on Monday, he took the floor and moved to go into committee on this bill, and that then, which was the first moment in order, my colleague [Mr. PECKHAM] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] offered their resolutions, and desired him to withdraw his motion to enable the House to adopt them; and that he himself refused to withdraw his motion to go into committee; and holding the power in his own hands, absolutely used it to exclude the call? But sir, I leave this subject.

I do not know what I ought to do in reference to this treaty and this appropriation. I cannot know without some further light. I am told by gentlemen here, the most learned in constitutional law, both Democrats and Whigs, that this House has the power to grant or withhold this appropriation as it sees fit; that it is a question of expediency, which we must decide in good faith to the country and to our constituents. But, sir, the only information I can get, upon which to base my action, is the simple, single, solitary text of the treaty, and the message which the President has just sent to us in relation to it. Now, sir, here let me say that, under ordinary circumstances, I would take that and be satisfied, if I had heard nothing against it; for I have no sectional or other jealousies or feelings to gratify in reference to this matter. I say I would take that and be satisfied, if there were no suspicions in connection with it. I do not know what disclosures may be made in reference to it by the correspondence, if we had it. I do not know but such disclosures may yet be made as will lead me to vote for it. But, sir, most unfortunately, it does not stand alone. Most unfortunately, it comes to us with a knowledge on our part of certain facts which throw grave suspicions upon it, which attack its honesty and good faith, and which most strongly tend to sap the confidence of the public in persons connected with the transactions.

And here I desire to take up and finish what I desired to say in the morning, when I had the floor in the House. No, sir, this treaty does not come before us unaffected or unassailed, or with many presumptions in its favor. On the contrary, we know, and we know this as well as we know anything which is going on in this country; and if I trespass or go too far in reference to this matter,

I hope gentlemen will correct me: we do know, sir, that this treaty came here in January last, with a provision for the payment to Mexico of $20,000,000 instead of $10,000,000. We do know that, for certain reasons, but for what reasons we do not know, the Senate refused to pay $20,000,000; that it struck off $10,000,000 of the $20,000,000, and made some other alterations in the treaty; and that, as fast as post-horses and expresses could carry the negotiator back to Mexico, he went there, and submitted this new concern, this treaty, to Santa Anna, who, without one word of question or remonstrance, so far as we know or are informed, accepted half of what he was to have under the treaty, as originally ratified by him. With the same fearful haste it is then posted and expressed back to this place; and all we certainly know further about it is, that here it is for the payment of $10,000,000, instead of $20,000,000, on the thirtieth of this month. I will not stop to philosophize upon, or to discuss these strange diplomatic maneuvers. I will not say that it is wholly unexplainable, although it certainly is to me somewhat unaccountable. It may be one of those contretemps which will sometimes happen in diplomacy; but, in connection with certain other facts I am about to mention, it ought to have some explanation; and before plain men, like myself, can yield their assent to this appropriation, it seems to me that it must have some satisfactory explanation.

But, sir, although we know so much about this treaty, as I have mentioned, yet there is reason to believe "the one half has not been told us." Certain things have leaked out here—things which are whispered in this Hall, and which have found their way into the newspapers. The atmosphere is loaded with them; and it is known that certain persons connected with the treaty-making business are proverbially leaky. These things, sir, which have so leaked out are anything but creditable to some of the parties concerned, and they throw great suspicion on this treaty. I put it to gentlemen whether they had not better call for this correspondence now, and clear them up at once and forever; or, if the correspondence will not clear them up, then reject this bill, and repudiate the treaty.

Sir, I will recount some of these leading points; and I ask, in behalf of this House, light upon them.

We are told that the negotiator went out to Mexico with his instructions properly framed, and was making progress in negotiating a proper treaty, and with no unusual appliances. We are further told, that after he had gone, and whilst he was so engaged under his instructions, certain persons—certain sets or cliques of men here and in the United States—stock-jobbers and hungry politicians, who are interested in some way in the Garay and Sloop grants, which are considered by many as improper things to control our foreign intercourse—made a descent upon the Administration, and placed their affairs before it in such a light that it became willing the negotiator might agree to pay, on account of these men—some of whom are well and personally known in this Hall—$10,000,000 of money, provided Santa Anna would acknowledge it as paid to him, or to his order, as an indemnity for pretended or prospective losses under these Garay and Sloop grants; and provided further, that it could be done in such a way that no hand at this end of the line could be traced in doing it.

To accomplish this purpose, we are told that some gentleman from Pennsylvania (a Mr. Ward, I have heard; but in all this we may be mistaken) was selected to go out to Mexico as a kind of secret special agent, and to carry verbal instructions to the negotiator how to act in the premises. These instructions are said to have been verbal, and outside of any record. We are further told that this secret special agent was instructed to tell the negotiator at Mexico that he might add $10,000,000 to what was provided in his regular instructions, for the purpose of making the indemnity I have mentioned. We are further told—it is in the atmosphere about us; I do not know whether it is true or not; but I ask gentlemen to give us the correspondence, that we may determine the fact—we are further told, I say, that the negotiator, a gentleman and an honorable man, said at once he would not do himself dishonor by undertaking to negotiate outside of his written instructions and the record. And when it was found that the plan must fail unless he had written instructions, we are told that the special agent undertook to, and did commit to paper, and say on paper what he had been told here he should only verbally communicate to the negotiator there; that this became satisfactory to the negotiator, and acting upon these instructions of the special agent, the negotiator put on the indemnities for the jobbing companies of Garay and Sloo. Now, I do not know that this is so. We are told when it came back, the Senate, looking at the correspondence—and it is well known that the correspondence went into the Senate—the Senate, the friends of the Administration, honorable men—as the Administration is composed of honorable men, and I am speaking on their behalf to-day, and not on my own or that of the opposition here—the Senate at once put the knife to the treaty, and cut off these excrescences.

Mr. BOCOCK. I want to know of my friend from New York, as he seems to insist so much on a call for this correspondence, how the correspondence and papers will enable us to see that the verbal instructions conflict with the written ones; for the verbal instructions are those which do not appear in the papers? My friend ought to know that calling for the papers will do no good.

Mr. HAVEN. The inquiry is a pertinent one; and though I do not claim to know anything more than what is reported and circulated here and in the newspapers, yet I will answer the gentleman how that is stated to be. I endeavored to unfold it in what I have already said.

The instructions to this secret or special agent, it is said, were verbal instructions, and verbal only; that he went out to Mexico to the negotiator and told him verbally what he was required to do. The negotiator, as I have already said, refused to act upon these verbal instructions. The agent then, to induce the negotiator to act, puts in writing and delivers to the negotiator what he was directed here that he should communicate to the negotiator only verbally. The negotiator then having the writing from the secret or special agent, concluded to act upon it as authority; and his subsequent correspondence with the Government here referred to these instructions, as well as to his original ones, in such a manner that, upon the Senate's call, they could not be separated without making an awkward show; and so the whole had to be sent in together. Does my friend from Virginia [Mr. BOCOCK] understand it now? Whether all this is true or not, I do not know—I have no means of knowing; but I will venture to say that many, if not most of the members on this floor, has heard it over and over again.

Having said what I have said, I desire to say this further, that I wish to do no injustice to any man or set of men; and I ask my friends in all parts of the Hall if it is not due to all those gentlemen who are engaged in this transaction, more particularly if it is not due to that eminent gentleman and citizen from South Carolina who negotiated this treaty, that this correspondence should be laid before the public, or before this House in confidence, if not before the public, so that the names of honorable men who are connected with these rumors and reports may be saved from dishonor and reproach, and these slanders, if not true, may be put to everlasting silence, or, if true, that this treaty may receive the unqualified reprobation of this House?

Mr. BAYLY, of Virginia. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAVEN. I will with great pleasure, although I fear by so doing I shall be obliged to trespass a little more upon the time of the committee than I intended to do when I commenced my remarks.

Mr. BAYLY. Does the gentleman from New York know of a case where the correspondence in respect to a treaty has ever been made public? If he will inform me of a single case, it will give me information which I do not now possess.

Mr. HAVEN. A reference to the gentleman's own knowledge is much better for him than any reference to knowledge that I may have upon this subject. He has more experience than I have in regard to questions of this kind. I do not know, nor do I profess to know, much about it. If the inquiry was for information, I cannot enlighten the gentleman. If it was by way of reply to the argument I was making, then I desire to say to the gentleman that his own argument, made on yesterday, was conclusive that, where a treaty trampled upon legislative ground, it could not be binding and operative until the Legislature had acted upon it. If it cannot be binding until we act, I would like to know if the House of Representatives must act, are compelled to act, in the dark?—if we must act upon the message of the President only, in which the only material fact stated is that he must have the money, and this treaty must be exchanged by the 30th instant?

Mr. BAYLY. Will my friend allow me a further remark? I think the treaty speaks for itself in connection with the history of our diplomacy connected with Mexico. If it does not, the call unquestionably ought to be made for a confidential communication. But I do not think there is any occasion for that, for the reason that the treaty speaks for itself.

Mr. HAVEN. I would like to know what legislative discretion this House exercises when it undertakes to say that I have the right to vote for or against the appropriation of this money, but that I have not the right to know anything of the grounds upon which I give my vote. I may vote one way or the other, but I am not to know why; I am not to tell the country why. Here is the State Department, or the President, sending down their decree here, to be registered in this House. We are ordered to act upon it; and all we can do is to register it according to order. Sir, can presumption go further? I would put it to my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY],—for I have great confidence in his judgment, in his patriotism, and discretion in these cases—if he had good reason outside of the message to believe that the treaty was fraudulent, and that it was adverse to the best interests of the country, and calculated to promote the schemes of stock-jobbers and speculators, would he vote for it, notwithstanding it spoke for itself upon its face?

Mr. BAYLY. Does the gentleman desire a reply?

Mr. HAVEN. I do.

Mr. BAYLY. I believe, in the negotiation of a treaty, that the explanations which are given to it by correspondence are to be considered rather in the light of arguments of counsel, and not as the judgment of the court. Knowing the terms of the treaty, and if my judgment was satisfied as to its antecedents, it would be all the information I should desire to construe it.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Chairman, I knew that my friend from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] would agree with me in such a case. So will I vote for it, after my judgment is satisfied. But, in addition to the treaty, I, too, would have the antecedents of the treaty; in addition to the text, I would know what the protocols were, what the instructions were, what the correspondence preceding it was.

But, Mr. Chairman, I have said more than I intended to say on this subject. I did not intend to hold the attention of the committee more than five minutes.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. HAVEN. The gentleman from Ohio will excuse me one moment—

Mr. TAYLOR. I wish to ask the gentleman a question before he concludes.

Mr. HAVEN. Very well. I give way for that purpose.

Mr. TAYLOR. In the debate, to which I have listened very attentively, I understood my honorable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. JONES] to assert that he believed, or that he had some intimation of the fact, that President Fillmore, within the term of the last Administration, had offered to the Mexican Government, in a negotiation in respect to the question which we are now to settle, the sum of $6,000,000, to get rid of the obligations of this Government under the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. I may have misunderstood him. I have no official information of the subject; nothing further than the declaration of my friend from Pennsylvania. And therefore I wish to ask the gentleman from New York, whose relations to the late President are well known, whether he ever understood, officially or otherwise, that such offer had been made by President Fillmore, for the purpose of getting rid of the obligations of the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo in an honorable way if we could? for I have always stood for the honor of the country. On so important a piece of information as that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania asserts, I suppose he has some official information, either from the present Secretary of State or from the President, or from somebody else.

Mr. HAVEN. I have no hesitation in communicating to my friend from Ohio [Mr. TAYLOR] all the information that I am in possession of; but he will excuse me if I state that I know no secrets of the last Administration. One of the merits of that Administration was, that it always remained sole master of its own purposes. President Fillmore had no kitchen Cabinet, and no way into his office by the back door. Hence I was never possessed of any of his peculiar secrets, nor of any revelation of its negotiations with foreign Governments. But I can truly say, sir, that I never heard it officially, I never heard it secretly, and I never heard it openly, or in any way alleged, that such an offer was ever made or contemplated; and I do not think or believe that such an offer was ever made. In this I may be mistaken; but I feel quite confident that I am not. I have already read to the committee the opinion of one member of Mr. Fillmore's Cabinet on that subject, officially addressed to Mr. Fillmore himself as President. It repudiates all idea of our obligations under the eleventh article.

I have said all that I intended to say on the subject as to the propriety of our knowing more in regard to what my friend from Virginia [Mr. BAYLY] calls the antecedents of this treaty—the correspondence and the negotiations that took place. Now, I desire to say—

Mr. BAYLY. I dislike to interrupt my friend from New York, because I do not like to be interrupted myself. When I spoke of the antecedents of this treaty, I did not mean to speak of the diplomatic correspondence between the two Governments; but I meant the relations which existed notoriously and openly between the two Governments. I took it for granted that my friend from New York understood me in that light.

Mr. HAVEN. Mr. Chairman, I see I did misunderstand the meaning of the gentleman. And my judgment is, that my friend from Virginia had better have left the case standing where it stood before. So far as he is concerned, he has sufficient information on all matters connected with the subject to enable him to vote understandingly, without getting any more; whereas I have not. I want to know, not only what I understood him to speak of in regard to the antecedents of the treaty, but I want to know all the correspondence—all the concomitant circumstances, and everything connected with it, to enable me to vote intelligently; and such, I think, are the wishes of many other gentlemen here. There are many men who are able to vote without any additional information—men of experience, who, like the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY], has been long in public life; who has been at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, transferred there from the head of the Committee of Ways and Means of a former House, and who may be well supposed to have more information than perhaps the entire negotiating force of the Government on such matters. Such men may have sufficient knowledge, but I want some other explanation. I must vote, to some extent, on my own judgment, and not on his.

But I now go back to the point from which I have been drawn, by these kindly meant interrogatories and suggestions. With the atmosphere of this Hall, and of the rotunda and avenue, loaded with these detailed and pointed rumors and reports that I have mentioned against the fairness and good faith of this treaty; and with the papers here and abroad giving them publicity and circulation more or less; and with the other suspicious circumstances I have detailed, I ask my friends upon the other side of the Hall—for, if I know myself, I am no enemy to this Administration in its proper and just endeavors to discharge its great and difficult trust and duties—I ask them if it is not due from them to their friends at the other end of the avenue, that this correspondence should at once be called for and produced, and these charges be thereby put at rest forever; and that honorable men may be vindicated; or, on the other hand, if they should unfortunately be proved true, that this treaty shall receive the seal of the reprobation of this House, and be put to rest? Sir, secrecy is a badge of fraud. If a man stands silent when he is arraigned in any court, (except in capital cases,) and refuses to plead, it is equivalent to a plea of guilty. Do not let it be said in this case that the silence of the Administration, when called upon under these circumstances to speak, is an admission of these charges.

Mr. Chairman, I have confidence and faith to believe that if this correspondence is called for, and comes out, the public mind will be put into a state of peace; and had I the control of this matter, as the friends of this treaty and this appropriation have, certainly it seems to me I could not perform a wiser or a better service for all parties connected with this transaction, than to ask to persuade them to put this correspondence and information before the country, or in the confidential possession of this House, and let the Administration justify itself upon its record, and put its slanderers to shame. Let it not be said that an opportunity has not been given to bring forward those papers. The gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] with thirty years legislative experience upon his head, has beseeched, I had almost said besieged, this House to let him have this correspondence. Yes, sir, that gentleman, with more experience and energy than any other legislator I can call to mind, called for those papers. He asked for this information, and he told us what results would be likely to flow from their production, in his judgment; whether right or wrong, I do not know. But I do know, that after gentlemen concede our power to legislate here, and legislate with a wise discretion, it does seem to me they take a most indefensible course in refusing this correspondence. Sir, we must vote now; we must vote by yeas and nays; we cannot have the correspondence; we cannot know the circumstances; we must vote blindfolded, and in the dark at that; and we must take the responsibility of justifying ourselves to the country and our constituents, and to our own consciences, for our votes so given. Sir, I cannot vote for this treaty without this required information. I would be glad to vote for it; but I dare not without the explanations and justification that the correspondence may show, but which, if refused, I shall fear does not show. I did not intend to say half I have said. I should not have said it, had it not been for the fact that gentlemen in various parts of the Hall desired to call me to account as I went along. I thank the committee for their attention, and yield the floor.

Mr. PHILLIPS rose to reply to the remarks of Mr. BENTON, delivered yesterday. The gentleman from Missouri declared that he could not vote for this bill, because it would be sanctioning an invasion of the privileges of this House. He [Mr. PHILLIPS] was struck with the use of the word "privilege," especially as employed by the gentleman, who is notoriously particular and choice of the terms, which he selects in discussion. He denied that the House has any privileges to be invaded. This House possesses certain constitutional rights. The Constitution imposes on the House certain functions and duties, which we are obligated to perform; but he denied that we have any privileges, used as the word is with regard to the legislation of the country. Where do we find those privileges? By looking at the British authorities, we find that the King is the fountain of honor, office, and of privilege. He then proceeded to argue that no constitutional right of the House has been invaded, and replied generally to the speech of Mr. BENTON. [See Appendix for his speech.]

Mr. RICHARDSON called the attention of the committee to a matter personal to himself, and reflecting upon him, and charging him with a transaction for which, were he guilty of it, he should be expelled from the House. There was circulating throughout the entire North a telegraphic dispatch purporting to have come from this city. He referred to the following dispatch in the Weekly Times, of New York, of the 14th instant:

"An astounding fraud has just been discovered by CAMPBELL, of Ohio, BENSON, MACE, and others, in the Nebraska bill. It seems that RICHARDSON stated to the House that his substitute was the Senate bill, simply without the Clayton proviso, when, in fact, he had inserted a clause providing that no person other than a citizen of the United States should hold office and vote, until he had sworn to support the principles of this bill."

Mr. CAMPBELL (interrupting) said that he regarded the passage of the bill as a great fraud, and thought that its passage had been procured in violation of the rules of the House; but at no time had he charged the gentleman from Illinois with having perpetrated a willful fraud. He thought the gentleman's course on the Nebraska bill was open, frank, and manly.

Mr. RICHARDSON expressed himself perfectly satisfied with the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, and was sure that the person who sent the dispatch had no authority from him to make this charge. He desired now to brand the authors and indorsers, whoever they might be, and wherever they might be, as base, and infamous liars, and proceeded at length to prove it. [See Appendix for his speech.]

Mr. SMITH, of New York, obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Chairman, I regret the necessity of making any remarks upon this subject. I intended to quietly give my vote when the bill was put upon its passage; but some of the remarks of the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] induce me to trouble the House with an observation or two in reply to him. Whenever the character of my State, or the official character of any of her public men, is assailed, I will promptly repel it. Sir, the character of a State is invaluable; and the character of her public men is a large portion of her wealth.

The gentleman from New York (and I may here say that I acquit him of intentional misrepresentation) uttered to the House certain newspaper rumors to the effect that General Gadsden had written and specific instructions from the President, limiting him to the offer of $10,000,000 for the negotiation of a treaty; and that, upon declarations made by an individual, a bearer of dispatches, he violated his instructions, and gave $20,000,000. I believe this rumor to be unfounded in fact; and, although not so intended, it is calculated to injure the official character of General Gadsden. I repel this newspaper gossip, and state the impression on my mind, from a casual conversation with General Gadsden, that he did not violate his instructions. Of course I had no conversation with him about the character of his instructions, or the conduct of the negotiation. Nothing more was said than any one could legitimately infer from the fact itself, viz: that he had not violated his instructions.

Sir, I know General Gadsden to be a man incapable of a dishonest act; and a man of too much intellect to be the tool of any ambidextrous intriguer. With full confidence in his character and ability, I repel these vagrant rumors; and I regret that they have acquired an accidental respectability by their enunciation upon the floor of this House. The gentleman from New York says that the atmosphere is charged with these rumors. Well, sir, what if it is? Whoever carries about an alembic to dissolve newspaper rumors, in times fruitful in important events, will engage in an impracticable undertaking. I knew, sir, that when all the facts of the case were made public, these rumors would either be verified, and thereby live, or that they would collapse and putrify in their dishonor. To that ordeal I was willing quietly to subject them. I regret, sir, that they have been galvanized into a mimicry of life.

I do not mean to debate the provisions of this treaty. I do not mean to discuss the constitutionality of acquiring territory under the treaty-making power. If it were a case of novel impression, I should not hesitate to express my views; but repeated acts and decisions foreclose the argument. I shall vote for this bill for the following reasons:

It secures the right of way across Tehuantepec, for which I understand Mr. Polk offered fifteen millions. It reacquires from seventeen to twenty millions of acres of land, embracing the Mesilla Valley, which Mr. Fillmore relinquished. He relinquished it by recognizing the act of the commissioner against the surveyor, by which act our claim was abdicated. It abrogates also the eleventh article in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, for which abrogation, I am credibly informed, that Mr. Fillmore offered the Mexican Government five millions of dollars, and subsequently, it is affirmed, seven millions.

Now, sir, I recommend to gentlemen who, with kindly courtesy, volunteer to utter newspaper rumors upon the floor of the House, in order that the Administration may have a chance to defend itself against vagrant gossip, to call for the papers connected with this alleged offer of Mr. Fillmore, and see whether it be a fact or not. When I say that I believe Mr. Fillmore did make this offer, I do not mean to disparage his Administration or his services. He has been truer to his own State than his State has been to him. I opposed his election, and I opposed his Administration; but, sir, that cannot cloud my sense of justice. I apply to his, what I apply to every Administration, the standard of right and wrong, in my own judgment. If right, I will support the measure, irrespective of party auspices; if wrong, I will reject it in the same spirit.

Thus, sir, I will not say that Mr. Fillmore was wrong in offering five millions for the abrogation of a harassing and embroiling stipulation in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. I do not know that he was, and I make no random charges, and I wage no partisan warfare. I shall discuss now no question about railroad routes, nor shall I comment upon sectional issues. Whoever pleases may raise the red flag of the amphitheater and plunge into the contest; but I will enter into no barren fight. Sir, I do not profess the broad sympathies which many gentlemen here delight to vaunt. No, sir; I am a southern man, and I always mean to be true to the South, covered all over as she is by the Constitution. To my own State first and foremost, I shall ever stand, whether she be right or wrong. But, sir, I do not conceive that any sectional issue is properly involved in this question.

Mr. HAVEN. I know that my friend from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] does not intend to impute anything intentionally wrong to me. What is more, I am quite certain that what he has said does not contravene the remarks I made this morning. This thing works very well so far. Light is gradually dawning upon us. It seems that there is another gentleman in this House who is willing, from the knowledge he has obtained from personal intercourse with the negotiator of his treaty, to vote for this appropriation. Let me ask the gentleman from South Carolina if he will join me in giving the remaining members of this House information in reference to all these matters? My friend undertakes to say, upon good authority, what the Administration of Mr. Fillmore offered in reference to this treaty; I will join him in getting the papers. This information is altogether new to me. It may be true; the gentleman from South Carolina may have sources of information upon that subject which to me are wholly inaccessible.

I desire to say to my friend from South Carolina, in all good feeling, that I do not want to put him or others to the trouble of hiding behind Mr. Fillmore in voting for this treaty. Give us the documents, and let us see, when we get them, whether they will sustain the gentleman in what it has been doing, without going behind a previous Administration for protection. I say this in no offensive sense. I believe my friend from South Carolina will join me in undertaking to shed light upon this transaction. Let me say one thing further, and I am done. I did not intend to attribute anything wrong to General Gadsden. I think I did not attribute anything wrong to him. I thought I was doing him but justice, when I said that a special agent was sent to Mexico with verbal instructions, and that General Gadsden, like an honorable and high-minded man, refused to act upon them; refused to compromise his good name and standing as a gentleman. I said more—that the special agent committed the instructions to writing, which had been trusted to him verbally by the Administration at this end of the line, before General Gadsden would condescend to regard them. And I appealed to my friends on the other side of the House, that, in justice to an honorable man from South Carolina, who was engaged in this negotiation, they should join me in having this information laid before the House, so that General Gadsden might be fully acquitted and sustained in reference to this negotiation; and those who are endeavoring to do him injustice might be put to shame. Or, if the correspondence did not justify the parties to this negotiation, that then this House might put its seal of reprobation upon the treaty, and withhold the money.

Mr. KEITT. Will the gentleman from New York allow me one minute in order to put myself right?

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

Mr. KEITT. I said, Mr. Chairman, that I had no connection with any of the Departments. I said that I had had a conversation with General Gadsden, which, however, was casual, and had no relation to his instructions. I am giving no vote upon any information communicated to me by that gentleman. I merely gave his declaration, that he had not violated his instructions, against the newspaper rumor that he had. If I had not had his declaration, I should as quickly, and to me as satisfactorily, have given his character as a pledge against this scandal. Sir, General Gadsden communicated nothing to me about the character of his instructions, or the negotiation of the treaty. Nor have I said anything which would authorize any one to infer that General Gadsden violated his official honor or his diplomatic functions by giving me any private information. He gave me none such; nor did I say that I would vote upon any such information. I have no sources of information which other gentlemen have not. Sir, I simply repelled a newspaper rumor, that he had violated his instructions, by his declaration that he had not. I then stated that I had three grounds for supporting this bill.

The first of these grounds was the Tehuantepec route; the second, the twenty millions, or thereabouts, of square acres of land given to us under the treaty; and the third the abrogation of the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, for which Mr. Fillmore had offered, as I was informed, $5,000,000 or $7,000,000. These were the three grounds on which I said I would vote for the bill. General Gadsden and his friends hide behind no man. I appealed to the act of Mr. Fillmore, only to show that the $10,000,000 was not given for the land embraced in the treaty, not to show that Mr. Fillmore had done wrong. Sir, whenever General Gadsden and his friends hide behind any man, not even newspaper gossip shall say it was behind a political opponent.

Mr. SMITH, of New York, then addressed the committee for one hour. His remarks will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. GIDDINGS obtained the floor.

Mr. PECKHAM. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to allow me a single moment?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will, certainly.

Mr. PECKHAM. It has been suggested here by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOUSTON,] that the resolution submitted by me, and that submitted by the distinguished gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON,] were not submitted in earnest; that they were not intended in sincerity to obtain the correspondence; that we really did not wish it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I said no such thing.

Mr. PECKHAM. Oh! there is no occasion for the interruption. I do not mean to impute anything wrong to the gentleman. But I desire distinctly to say that I offered the resolution for no other purpose than appears upon its face. I offered it for the purpose of obtaining information which should guide this House in its action, and for no other purpose whatever. And I now will renew the proposition, if I can get the floor for that purpose, and will ask that the committee rise, solely to enable me to submit that resolution; and I will then immediately move again to go back into committee. It is not too late, even now, to get the information.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is due to myself that I should say, because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] is not in his seat, and my remarks applied as much to him as to the gentleman from New York, that I meant to say, if I did not do it, that it was an indication that the papers were not desired, the proposition was made at so late a period. It was an induction which I suppose that I had the right to draw.

Mr. PECKHAM. This correspondence has, beyond all question, been laid before the Senate; and, therefore, it would require but ten minutes to send it here. I make the motion that the committee do now rise, so that we may go into the House and pass the resolution which I introduced. We can then have the correspondence to use to-morrow in the five-minute debate, with the same force and effect as if we had it before. I will say that this motion, founded on rumors of wrong and fraud, is met and answered simply by rumors; and thus is this House engaged, instead of having facts, when facts are within our reach. It does not become the House, when the fact is conceded that we have the right to exercise our judgment in voting or withholding this appropriation. Indeed, it seems to me to be wholly improper, that fact being conceded, for us to say that we shall blind our eyes; that we shall have no sort of light; that we shall go on in darkness on the question, and that we shall vote without knowing one word of the grounds or reasons of our vote. I am not prepared to go for this appropriation as a matter of faith. I have not sufficient faith in the Administration.

Mr. KEITT. Will you go for it at all?

Mr. PECKHAM. I shall go for it if satisfied that it is for the benefit of the country. I hope the committee will rise, and the resolution calling for the correspondence may be adopted, so that we may have it to use to-morrow.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I yield for that purpose, and with the understanding that I shall not lose my right to the floor.

Mr. McMULLIN. I understood that the gentleman from New York yielded the floor to the gentleman from Ohio, to occupy the remainder of his time.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I only yield to the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken; and Mr. PECKHAM's motion was agreed to.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the Chairman of the committee reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and especially House bill No. 405, "to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic, of the 30th December, 1853," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. PECKHAM. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if not inconsistent with the public interests, to communicate to this House copies of all instructions to our Minister to Mexico, Mr. Gadsden, and of all correspondence between this Government and him, touching or concerning the treaty between this Government and Mexico, of the 30th of December last, and the subject-matter thereof.

Mr. McMULLIN. There is no House here, and I move that we do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. MILLSON. There is no quorum here, and I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PECKHAM. I submit that my motion takes precedence.

The SPEAKER. The introduction of the resolution depends upon the will of the whole House. If objected to by any single member, it cannot be offered under the rules.

Mr. PECKHAM. I do not understand any gentleman as objecting to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. PHELPS. I object to the consideration of this resolution, because the President is not in the city.

Mr. PECKHAM. I do not design by the resolution to postpone in any degree whatever the passage of this appropriation.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is utterly impracticable to get that information and not delay the business at this late period of the session.

Mr. PECKHAM. The resolution can do no possible harm. If the information is not obtained, we shall have been heard, at least; and if it is obtained, why, then we shall have the light we are seeking.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made substantially, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] who moves, as he has a right to move, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MILLSON. I desire to say a single word, and explain the reason why I made the motion that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I regard this as a very important question, and I think we have a right to call for the correspondence relating to this treaty, if we please. I certainly shall never surrender this right, if ever this question is put to a vote, and I desire that a full vote shall be taken by the yeas and nays. In any question connected with these points raised here, I should like to have a full vote upon the yeas and nays. But we should not proceed to a vote upon the resolution now; for the result will be to break up the committee, and bring this debate to a sudden close; and unless we now return to the committee, we shall be compelled to adjourn.

Mr. McMULLIN. In casting my eye around the Hall, I saw that there was hardly a quorum present, and consequently I moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not know whether there is a quorum present or not. If there is, and we can get the information, let us have it; but if we cannot get it, let us return to the committee, and resume the consideration of this subject.

Mr. McMULLIN. I submitted a motion that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion made by the gentleman would not be in order; for there is a motion pending that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was then taken upon Mr. MILLSON's motion; and there were—yeas forty-four, noes not counted.

So the motion was disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is now in order.

Mr. PHELPS, (at half past four, p. m.) Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and, on a division, there were—ayes 18, noes 41.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HAVEN. I hope the House will consent to go quietly into committee, and that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and other members of the House, will withdraw their opposition to the motion to return into committee. If they will not give us information, we had better go back into committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from New York certainly needs information when he makes such a statement. I voted to go back into committee. If the gentleman had paid attention, he would not have charged me with a violation of the rights of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] I insisted on my friend from Virginia [Mr. McMULLIN] withdrawing the motion to adjourn, for the purpose of our going back into committee, and allowing those members who desired to speak to do so; and I voted to go back.

The SPEAKER. The discussion is not in order.

The question was taken on the motion to return into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DISNEY in the chair.)

Mr. GIDDINGS. Amidst the general anxiety of gentlemen on both sides of the House to explain the reasons which are to govern the votes they intend giving on this important question, it is my intention to occupy no more time than to assign briefly one or two points which will control my own action.

I had supposed the doctrines which control the different departments in negotiating, approving, and sanctioning treaties under our Government, well settled and well understood. On this point I can add very little to what was so well said by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.]

It is the duty of the President, by his commissioners appointed for that purpose, to negotiate treaties with other nations. When that is done, it becomes an inchoate treaty, of no validity whatever, until sanctioned by a two-third vote of the Senate.

The Senate in approving the treaty are as independent of the President as the President is of the Senate. They act their judgment; and having approved the treaty, it may be perfected by such approval, and it may not. If it be a mere release of claims, or rights over which this House have no control, it becomes the supreme law of the land at once upon its ratification by the Senate.

But if it depend on the payment of money by this Government, it can have no effect until the appropriation be made by this body. Nor can any hardship attend this rule; for the Constitution provides that all appropriations shall originate in, and pass, this body. And our Constitution enters into, and constitutes a part of, every national compact. In such case this body must act; we must grant the money. In doing this, we must act from knowledge, and not from the want of knowledge.

At this point I take my departure from my excellent friend from New York, [Mr. SMITH.] He says that the treaty becomes the supreme law of the land when approved by the Senate; that it is binding upon the nation. I surely so understood him. Although, before he closed, he seemed to say that we must pass upon it, and, that he would in this case vote against it; and to use his own words, would render it null and void. But he surely declared the treaty to be perfect and binding on us, as soon as the Senate approved it. Why, sir, will he admit that we come here to carry out the behest of the President, or of the President and Senate combined. He paid a glowing tribute to freedom; he discoursed eloquently upon the liberty of our people, and then he seemed to admit in his remarks that we were the legislative servants of the President. I cannot think he expressed his views as he intended; for he afterwards substantially admitted the doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.]

To me, nothing can be plainer than the principle that when we are called on to act, we are to exercise our own judgment—that we act upon the dictates of surrounding circumstances. This is a treaty for the purchase of territory. Is the territory needed by us? What use do we wish to appropriate it to? What benefits can we derive from it? Why, the gentleman from New York said he would not vote for more than $5,000,000 for all the benefits we shall derive from this treaty. Now, as it was originally negotiated, we were bound to pay $20,000,000. But that sum shocked the conscience of the Senate. They let it down one half, and agreed to pay $10,000,000; and now my friend from New York would divide it again, and pay $5,000,000. But I would not pay $10,000 for all the benefits we are to derive from it. But perhaps I am not possessed of all the information necessary to act upon the subject. Indeed, I know such to be the fact. I am called upon to vote for or against the treaty; but the necessary information to enable me to act understandingly is withheld by the Executive.

The gentleman over the way [Mr. PECKHAM] moved a resolution to obtain the information, but the friends of the Administration objected and defeated it. They say we should have called for this information at an earlier day. It was the President's duty to have sent us all the necessary intelligence in his office when he sent us the treaty. The papers should have come to us at the same time. But it is quite certain we have not the proper intelligence, at least I have not. It is said that one great object of this treaty is to rid ourselves of the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, which binds us to protect the Mexican frontier from Indian incursions; but no one, it would appear to me, could suppose us liable, under that article, to do more for the protection of the Mexicans than we do for the protection of our own people, and that we have done; yet the friends of this bill insist that there were large claims presented by the Mexican Government on account of our failing to protect their people. Well, sir, of those claims I know nothing; but I see the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. HOUSTON,] who reported this bill, in his seat. I will ask him if he knows the amount claimed?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know the precise amount that is claimed. The claims filed are said to be very large. I understand that Mexico originally demanded as much as $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 for our release from liability under the article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, to which the gentleman alludes. My information, however, is not authentic. I have not examined the papers, which I suppose are on file in the State Department, and open for the inspection of the public. I suppose anybody could ascertain by going there, and I think, perhaps, I will to-morrow. I understand, however, that as much as $100,000,000 have been presented under that article of the treaty.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Does the gentleman know the number of claimants who call for indemnity?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Does he know the amount claimed by any individual?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not.

Mr. GIDDINGS. This shows the degree of intelligence possessed by the committee who reported the bill. We cannot act upon the understanding of that gentleman, although I admit him to be usually very accurate. He says we might all have obtained the same intelligence which he possesses. True; but I really would not be willing to vote for $10,000,000, upon the same vague understanding which he appears to possess. It would not have been very convenient for two hundred and thirty-four members to have thronged the Department for information, and then we should have obtained nothing on which we could have safely acted. Why, sir, we want official data; we want the documents to consult. But as it is, I know nothing on the subject; the honorable chairman knows nothing definite; nor, so far as I can learn, does any member of this body possess the requisite intelligence to act understandingly. In short, sir, we appear to be a political convention of "Know-Nothings," so far as this treaty is concerned.

I repeat, I see nothing in this treaty that would induce me to vote $10,000, much less $10,000,000, to carry it into effect. This is the people's money, and when my friend from New York shall return to his constituents, they will inquire for what did you vote away $10,000,000 of our money? He may be able to answer the question. I should not. Nor shall I place myself in a situation to have that interrogatory propounded to me.

But it is said we get from seventeen to twenty millions of acres of land. Had the word territory been used, it would have been more appropriate. We get that quantity of land and rocks, volcanic mountains, precipitous bluffs, &c., &c., but we get very little land that is capable of cultivation. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] says he would be willing to purchase lands for that purpose, either North or South. Why, sir, a railroad through that region will be as much an object of solicitude to the Mexican Government as to ours; for they will derive the same benefit from it that we shall. That Government would be glad to furnish the land for such a road. Indeed the Mexican Government, by her treaty of "Guadalupe Hidalgo," was bound to aid in such a road, provided one could be built along the valley of the Gila. The Mexican commissioners who negotiated that treaty, thought it a great object to get such a road, and so did the Mexican Government; and no one can doubt that they would unhesitatingly have given what territory they cede to us by this treaty, could they have obtained a road through that country by so doing. We have, however, by the present treaty, released Mexico from this obligation, and have agreed to pay her $10,000,000 for the privilege of performing that act of generosity. Now, sir, for these reasons I shall not hesitate to vote against the appropriation.

It has been remarked that when this treaty was before the Senate, there were such evidences of fraud and corruption that the Senate refused to ratify it until the amount was diminished one half. I verily believe that if we were now to divide it again the Mexican Government would accept it just as quick as they would in its present shape. But we must leave it for time to develop the true character of this treaty. At this moment we can only say that we see no justice or propriety in it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, said: Mr. Chairman, I listened to the remarks which fell from the distinguished and learned gentleman from New York [Mr. GERRIT SMITH] with astonishment. He undertook to show that this House was bound to vote, without investigation and without question, any money necessary for carrying out a treaty entered into by the President and the Senate; that a treaty formed by the President and Senate was perfect and complete in its obligations; that the House had nothing to do in regard to it, except to vote the money; that it had no right, moral or legal, to question or inquire concerning it. I had supposed, sir, that that heresy was exploded more than fifty years ago, in the discussion which took place in the House of Representatives on Jay's treaty. The position was taken by Mr. Madison, Mr. Gallatin, Mr. Livingston, and other able and distinguished gentlemen, among the first statesmen of this country of that day—the cotemporaries of the Constitution—that in all cases where treaties connected themselves with the legislative power of the Government, there should be legislation by Congress; that where money was to be appropriated, or where the revenue, the trade, or the commerce of the nation was in question, then the consent of Congress must be obtained, otherwise it would be very easy to deprive the House of Representatives of nearly all its power in the Government. It would be easy for the President to form alliances, treaties, and conventions with foreign Powers in relation to duties on imports, taxes, in relation to commerce generally, and so take away from the House all right to legislate in reference to these great questions. It would not be difficult for the President and treaty-making power to form alliances with foreign nations, by which this nation would be bound to furnish them arms, aid, and supplies, in all their wars, and thus compel us to make appropriations annually without other cause or reason for an indefinite term of years. Although the Constitution provides that no appropriation for the support of the Army shall be made to continue for more than two years, yet, sir, under the gentleman's construction, it may be in the power of the President and Senate so to involve this country in alliances with other nations as to bind us to make appropriations for an indefinite period of time—not for two years merely, but for ten or twenty years. Sir, the doctrine is a heresy, from the beginning to the end. We are under no such obligation. We have a right, in all these cases, to inquire, and are bound to decide upon our own judgments, formed upon the best information we can obtain. But, sir, the gentleman seems to deny his own doctrine, when he says that he will not vote for this bill. Why? Because the treaty provides for the payment of too large a sum. So he exercises a discretion, acts upon his own judgment, at the same time denying the right of the House to call for information which might satisfy him that the amount to be paid to Mexico is not unreasonable. The House of Representatives are the immediate representatives of the people. They hold the purse strings of the country, and they are directly responsible to the people for the manner in which they hold them. The House of Representatives is now the conservative branch of the Government. It is the great branch, I may say the power, in the American Government. Strip it of this right to examine into treaties, and deny it the power to refuse to make appropriations, and you practically annihilate it. I listened with amazement to the doctrine—I will say the monstrous doctrine—of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SMITH.] I am happy to know that that doctrine meets with but little favor in this Hall. I believe, with the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. BAYLY,] who is at the head of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, when he gave us his construction of what the right of this House was in connection with treaties—if I have been correctly advised in relation to what he said, for I did not hear him—a doctrine consistent with the republicanism of the better days of the Old Dominion.

Believing that we have a right to investigate this matter, that we have a right to all the information the Executive can give us concerning this treaty, that we are not bound to vote upon a measure of this importance and magnitude, without we know all about it, without we know all the circumstances attending it; have the aid of the correspondence, the papers, the documents, and every thing which can shed light upon it, I am not prepared to vote for it upon the mere text of the treaty. For one, as I must vote upon my own judgment, I require information upon which to give my vote. I do not know how it is. This treaty may be right, may be proper, and just, and fit to be made. If the correspondence and papers in the case shows it to be so, I will vote cheerfully for it; but it may be otherwise. There may have been frauds—I do not charge that there were—there may have been corruption permeating it through and through. I do not charge that there was. I do say, however, that I have a right to know whether there was or not. I know that there have been charges of this kind made in the streets and through the papers, that the air is full of rumors upon the subject, and I want to know whether there is any foundation for them. This information is in the Senate, and it may be sent to us if gentlemen please to ask for it. Will they not, then, give us that information so easy of access? If it is improper to give it to us in open House, let them give it to us confidentially. We may, I hope, be trusted with the secrets of the State as well as the Senate upon questions where our action is as necessary as theirs. If I had the information, I could then know whether there is any truth in the suspicions in connection with this treaty, which have been given to the winds, and are floating through these Halls. If there have been any frauds—if this work is full of jobs, and the creature of infamy—we had better know it at once, and we ought to know it; and we would, in such case, reject the treaty. When there are suspicions abroad of a most serious character, coming, it is said, from quarters which should be well informed, can I, and ought I, to give a vote of which I shall be ashamed hereafter, and for which I can give no excuse except that I had no knowledge in the premises? No, sir. For that reason, and until I have information which can be readily given, and which, if not given, leaves strong implication in favor of the suggestions and suspicions, I shall refuse to give my vote for this bill. And yet the treaty may be just, expedient and wise; but it is not of that transcendent interest—the advantages to be secured by it, or to be lost in case it fails, are not of that high and controlling character—so far as I believe, which can justify me to overlook the objections which, I fear, exist, or to give any possible sanction to this sweeping and blindfold manner of voting away the people's money.

Mr. BOYCE. This is a subject of great importance in two points of view. First, in reference to the power of this House over the subject of appropriations required by treaties; and second, in regard to the expediency of passing the appropriation bill for $10,000,000, now before the committee. The first question is, what degree of discretion has this House the right to exercise when a bill comes here asking an appropriation to carry out a treaty? I have no doubt but that the House has a right to exercise a full discretion, a free and entire discretion on the subject. I have no doubt but that we are at liberty, if we think proper, to reject the bill, and to refuse the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, it has been well said that ours is a Government of checks and balances. Its whole organization is such. The House of Representatives represent the people; the Senate represent the States; the President represents both the people and the States. By one form of election he is elected by the people. In the event of a choice not being made at first, he is elected by the States. Therefore, I say, our whole political system is one of checks and balances. In construing the Constitution, we are not to construe any one clause by itself, but to construe it as part of a whole. We are to look at all the clauses, to put them all together, and, if possible, endeavor to draw a harmonious conclusion. Let us do that in this instance. In the first place, we find in the Constitution, with regard to the House of Representatives, two important provisions: that no revenue bill shall originate except in the House of Representatives, thereby giving to the Representatives of the people the full, absolute, and entire power to place all pecuniary burdens on the people. Then, again, it is provided that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of an appropriation to be made by law, to the passage of which the action of the House of Representatives is, of course, absolutely necessary. Therefore no money can be taken, first, from the people but by the action of the House; and secondly, no money can be drawn from the Treasury but by the like action of the House.

If there is any principle in the Constitution more important than another, more characteristic of the whole tenor of our Government, more essentially American, it is the great principle that the Representatives of the people are to act on all subjects involving the raising of money or the appropriation of money. I take it, then, that this is the great principle which is impressed on the Constitution. And if we examine that instrument by the light of history, we see the importance of this principle. Our ancestors derived it from England. It was the principle which secured the liberty of the English people. It was the great principle which they had struggled for for centuries—the right of the Commons to decide upon the pecuniary burdens of the people, and whether they should give money to the King or not. We derive that great principle from the history of England; and it is the same for which our fathers struggled in the American Revolution. It is the principle on which the Revolution was successfully carried out, and on which its battles had been fought—the right of the Representatives of the people to tax in the first instance, and to appropriate the money from the Treasury. Without it, liberty cannot exist. Therefore it is the fundamental principle of our Government; and we are bound to construe the Constitution so as that this principle shall at any rate have its full force. However any other principle may suffer disregard, this principle must have efficacy. Let us now construe the Constitution in that light. We find another clause in the Constitution with regard to the treaty-making power. The President and Senate are authorized to make treaties. Well, cannot these two powers stand together? Undoubtedly they can. When the President and Senate make treaties which do not require the legislative action of the House, and are not prohibited by the Constitution, they are the law of the land; but any treaties which they make involving appropriations of money require the legislative action of the House, and cannot be operative and in full force until the House passes the necessary appropriation.

Suppose, Mr. Chairman, that we transpose these different clauses of the Constitution. Suppose we put this clause which restricts any other body than the House of Representatives from raising money in the first instance, and that clause which requires appropriation bills to be passed through both Houses. Suppose, I say, we put these clauses together, alongside of the clause giving the treaty-making power to the President and Senate, how will it read then?

"He (the President) shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties; provided two thirds of the Senators present concur;" "but" or "and"—use either conjunction, or neither—"all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives;" "No money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law." Certainly if the clauses stood in this juxtaposition in the Constitution, the construction I contend for would be conclusive; but the effect of the various clauses of the Constitution are in no degree dependent upon their local position in the Constitution, nor are they in any degree affected by it. To all intents and purposes the money clauses I have just referred to are as efficacious where they now stand as if they had a local position in immediate connection with the treaty power clause.

The President, with the Senate, two thirds concurring, have the right to make treaties; but where any money is to be drawn from the Treasury, the bill for that purpose originates in the House of Representatives; and no money can be drawn from the Treasury but by appropriation made by a law, in which both Houses must concur. If both clauses of the Constitution which govern this matter stood together, side by side, there would be no doubt about this question. If these clauses were in juxtaposition, there would be no room for doubt.

But there is no locality in the Constitution. One clause has as much force as another, as far as construction is concerned. I take it, then, that there is no doubt that this House has the right to pass and act freely upon money bills which come before it for its action, whether that money is to carry out a treaty or not.

In construing the Constitution, I think it is proper that we should endeavor to throw around it every possible security in relation to the expenditure of the public money. If we secure the public money against being wasted, we accomplish a great result. The construction which I contend for does accomplish that purpose, as far as it can be done. If treaties are the law of the land, and obligatory upon the House without its action, we have no discretion, but must make the appropriation from the public Treasury; and the President and Senate may determine how much shall be expended in that way, and for what purposes.

We are, therefore, bound to give that construction to the Constitution which will secure the money of the people; and the construction I contend for is the one best adapted to accomplish that object.

Again, we should so construe the Constitution as to be in harmony with the genius of our institutions. The whole genius of our institutions looks to the fact that the money of the people shall be expended but by the consent of the Representatives of the people. That fact has been alluded to by every one who has written upon the Constitution and laws of England, as the great safeguard of the English people; and they maintain the doctrine that the Commons, who are the representatives of the people, have a right to pass upon all questions involving the expenditure of the money of the people. And that is the spirit of our institutions. It cannot be supposed that we have fallen behind England in that respect, and that we are placed in a less favorable position than the people of England occupy.

I beg leave here to read a few lines from the celebrated work of De Lolme on the Constitution of England, who, considering the powers of the House of Commons, says:

"In reading the foregoing enumeration of the powers with which the laws of England have intrusted the King, we are at a loss to reconcile them with the idea of a monarchy which, we are told, is limited. The King not only unites in himself all the branches of the Executive power; he not only disposes, without control, of the whole military power in the State, but he is, moreover, it seems, the master of the law itself, since he calls up and dismisses at his will the legislative bodies. We find him, therefore, at first sight, invested with all the prerogatives that ever were claimed by the most absolute monarchs, and we are at a loss to find that liberty which the English seem so confident they possess."

"But the representatives of the people still have—and that is saying enough—they still have in their hands, now that the Constitution is fully established, the same powerful weapon which has enabled their ancestors to establish it. It is still from their liberality alone that the King can obtain subsidies; and in these days, when every thing is rated by pecuniary estimation; in these days, when gold is become the great moving spring of affairs, it may be safely affirmed that he who depends on the will of other men with regard to so important an article, is, whatever his power may be in other respects, in a state of real dependence."

"The King of England, therefore, has the prerogative of commanding armies and equipping fleets; but, without the concurrence of his Parliament, he cannot maintain them. He can bestow places and employments; but, without his Parliament, he cannot pay the salaries attending on them. He can declare war; but, without his Parliament, it is impossible for him to carry it on. In a word, the royal prerogative, destitute, as it is, of the power of imposing taxes, is like a vast body which cannot, of itself, accomplish its motions; or, if you will, it is like a ship, completely equipped, but from which the Parliament can, at pleasure, draw off the water and leave it aground, and also set it again afloat by granting subsidies."

Sir, that is the great basis of the English Constitution—the right of the Representatives to determine the pecuniary burdens that shall be imposed upon the people. And shall it be said that the Representatives of the American people have less power than the Commons of England? Certainly not. I consider, then, this right of the House of Representatives to pass upon all money bills as the very corner-stone of this Constitution, and the great safeguard of our liberties; and, I for one, will never consent to abandon it. I cannot agree with the opinions on this subject expressed by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. PHILLIPS.] I know that some of the ablest writers upon constitutional law have held different doctrines—Federal doctrines which were promulgated by the earlier fathers of the Federal school—that this House have no right to pronounce upon appropriations required by a treaty—that the treaty-making power is absolute and unlimited; and that, after a treaty has been ratified, this House is under an absolute and peremptory obligation to make the appropriations required. That is, I think, the doctrine set forth by the gentleman from Alabama. But, sir, I hold that the House has a perfect, full, and free discretion; that we are to do as we think best according to our honest judgments; not that we are wantonly to reject a treaty appropriation without a sufficient cause, but that we have the right to exercise a sound discretion as to whether we will pass or reject it.

Why, sir, what was the practice of the British Government at the time our Constitution was formed? for the practice of that Government at that time is of much importance in giving the proper interpretation and meaning to our own Constitution in reference to this subject, because it was from that source our ancestors, in a great degree, derived their ideas of government. It was from that source they drew the very life-blood of our institutions.

Now, sir, what was the practice in England at the time of the formation of our Constitution? According to Blackstone and other elementary writers, the King is invested with the absolute right to make treaties. But, in point of fact, all monetary propositions, or propositions affecting in any way the internal regulations of the country embraced in treaties, had to be submitted to the House of Commons.

Well, sir, our ancestors, in framing our Constitution, could not but have been governed, in a great degree, in framing the treaty-making power, by the practice then in existence in England, and which is still in existence there. With the practice then existing, that all propositions involving the appropriation of money must be submitted to the House of Commons, is it to be supposed that our ancestors were ignorant of that practice? Or, supposing them to be acquainted with it, is it to be supposed they were blind to its force? Sir, when they, in imitation of the practice in England, constituted the President and two thirds of the Senate the treaty-making power, and when that practice gave to the House of Commons the right to refuse appropriations if they thought proper, it cannot be supposed that the founders of our institutions would endow our House of Representatives with less power, with less authority, than was given to the British House of Commons—a body which nominally had a very large constituency, but which really had a very small one. I must conclude, then, from these circumstances, if from none other, that the true interpretation of the Constitution is to give to this House the power for which I have contended. I cannot conceive that our fathers, in forming our institutions, would have given to this House fewer rights and privileges than was given to the corresponding body in England, but I must conclude that while they gave to the President and Senate the power of making treaties, they gave to this House the right to grant or refuse appropriations.

Again, Mr. Chairman, the Constitution says, in one clause, that Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper to carry into effect the expressly enumerated powers conferred on any department. It does not say that they shall pass such laws, but that they shall have power to do so. Well that meets this particular case. The treaty-making power is conferred on two departments of this Government. It comes, then, expressly under this clause of the Constitution. This clause of the Constitution then grants to Congress, which includes this House, the power to pass such laws as may be necessary and proper. It does not say that they shall pass such laws, but it says "they shall have power" so to do. This implies discretion. They are at liberty to pass these laws or not, as they think proper. If they have any discretion on the subject, they must have a full discretion. You cannot have a half discretion. Such a thing is metaphysically impossible. You cannot draw a line of 360° 30', or any other line, through a discretion. It must be an entire discretion, or no discretion. It is an unlimited discretion. A reasonable discretion, I grant you—one to be exercised under a just sense of the responsibility weighing on this House. It is an unlimited, but rational discretion; and it is for that discretion I now contend.

There is another clause of the Constitution which, it seems to me, is full of meaning on this subject. It is the clause which has been just alluded to by the gentleman from Maine, who preceded me in this debate, that all appropriations for the support of the Army must be renewed every two years. So jealous were our ancestors of a standing army, or permanent military establishment, that they required appropriations for the support of the Army should pass before the people every two years, which was the limit of the term of the members of the House of Representatives; so that every time the Representatives of the people come fresh from the people, with the ideas and instincts of the people, they should have the right to pass on the subject as to whether the Army should be longer continued or not. If we were to admit this unlimited power in the President and Senate to pass treaties, and we were bound to make the appropriations, what would become of this great power by which our ancestors intended to preserve their liberties and to put it out of the power of any ambitious general or chieftain, at any future time, to have a standing army. If you permit this absolute power, contended for by the gentleman from New York, the President and Senate may enter into treaty stipulations with some foreign nations and engage to give subsidies or keep up standing armies for any length of time, and this great clause intended to secure the liberties of the country would be nugatory. I cannot consent to any construction of the Constitution which would lead to such disastrous consequences.

Again, may not this House refuse to make appropriations which have been commenced by a previous Congress? Suppose laws were passed by a previous Congress by which it was enacted that certain appropriations should be made for certain works, or any particular purpose, has not every House of Representatives, as it comes here, the right to determine whether it shall carry out those appropriations or not? Undoubtedly they have. The law requiring them to do so is the law of the land. Treaties can be no more at the utmost than the laws of the land; but the law of one Congress is not irrevocably binding on another. One Congress may enact that there shall be appropriations, but the next Congress may refuse to make these appropriations; if, therefore, we have the right to refuse to make appropriations, though called for by the President, House of Representatives, and the Senate, how much more have we the right to refuse to make appropriations under a treaty ratified by the Senate and the President? I think this view of the subject is conclusive, for even admitting treaties to be laws in reference to all the subjects of which they dispose, yet this House would not even then be absolutely bound to make treaty appropriations. But I cannot and do not admit that treaties are laws where they undertake to provide for the payment of money. They are not fully operative and efficacious on this point until they have been affirmatively acted upon by the House.

I would beg leave to call the attention of the committee to this important fact, that the restrictions upon the powers of the Government contained in the Constitution, are restrictions on the legislative powers of the Government, not on the treaty-making power. The Constitution, for instance, prescribes that Congress shall pass no bill of attainder, and that no preference shall be given to the ports of one State over those of another, and that no laws shall be passed concerning the establishment of religion. All these great principles of liberty which are embodied in the Constitution are, in form, restrictions only upon the legislative power of the Government. They are not restrictions upon the treaty-making power. What follows, then, as a consequence? If the legislative authority granted to this House to lay taxes and pass appropriation bills is no restriction upon the treaty-making power, much less would the exceptions to the legislative authority of this House be any restriction on the treaty-making power. And thus you would arrive at this monstrous result, that the treaty-making power was an unlimited power, and the President and the Senate might do what they thought proper, without being bound by the limitations of the Constitution. It is impossible that such a construction of the Constitution can be sound. And, therefore, we must admit what I have been contending for, that the legislative powers granted to this House over the purse are limitations on the treaty-making power.

I was surprised to hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. SMITH] give the treaty-making power so broad a construction as he did; but his conclusion is entirely at variance with his argument. After assuming that treaties place us under a moral necessity to vote the money they require, he tells us he will not vote for this appropriation. It is contended by some that the Constitution imparts a peculiar sanctity and vigor to treaties, when it declares they shall be the supreme law of the land. But in what sense does the Constitution say that? Supreme over what? Not over Congress, and not over the House of Representatives, but they shall be supreme—I mean in the last instance, when they become laws—supreme over State laws and constitutions. That is the meaning of the word "supreme," in this connection. For instance, after this treaty shall have been passed upon favorably by this House, if it is so favorably passed upon, it is to become the supreme law of the land in reference to State laws and State constitutions. The word "supreme," as it is found in this connection in the Constitution, is not intended to mean that the treaty-making power shall be supreme over the legislative power; and that the action of the Senate and President, upon the subject of a treaty, shall be supreme over this House, where it concerns any matter over which this House has legislative discretion. No such thing. Suppose the ground contended for by the honorable gentleman from New York, is correct, that treaties are supreme, and that we are bound to execute them under all circumstances, what limit would there be to the power of the President and the Senate in making treaties? They would have a carte blanche to do whatever they might think proper to do, there would be no barrier to their discretion; and where there is no limit to discretion there is no liberty.

The object of free constitutions is to throw around Governments the barriers of laws and restraints. I think there is danger that this treaty-making power may be carried too far. It is the tendency of power constantly to increase; it is continually stealing from the many to the few. The tendency of this treaty-making power is to absorb all other powers, and it behooves us, the Representatives of the people, to see that it does not transgress beyond its proper limits. Take the instance of this treaty. If the treaty-making power can appropriate money, and we are bound to carry out their will, what limit will there be to the treaty-making power? None, none whatever. For there is no legislative power in all the grants of the Constitution so closely hedged in, so carefully protected, as the money power. That is expressly confided to this House. They are the trustees of the people. They stand between the people and all pecuniary oppression, or extravagance, or prodigality.

If, therefore, the treaty-making power can invade this great principle, where is it to stop? Who can place bounds to it at all? We are at sea, then, without chart or rudder. I say, then, that we are bound to take our stand upon this point; that the House has a right to exercise a fair, rational, and reasonable discretion on this subject, and to say whether they will or will not pass any appropriation bill which may be required to carry out the provisions of a treaty. The power of the House on this subject is not an injurious power, as has been said by some. It may be said, as it has been said by some of the elementary writers on this subject, that if the House of Representatives have a right to pass upon the subject of treaties which come before them in their legislative capacity, that the business of making treaties would be greatly perplexed and entangled, that the President and Senate would be shorn of their strength, and that the treaty-making power would thereby lose much of its efficiency and force. No such thing. The power of the House in this regard is simply a negative power. The House cannot initiate a treaty. Nobody pretends that it can do any diplomatic act. It cannot take the first step in such a matter. It may express an opinion, but it can do nothing in the way of action. The House may pass resolutions which may induce the President to make treaties, but it can do nothing in the way of opening negotiations or closing them. Its power is simply a negative power; and a most useful power it is. It is a beautiful illustration of the workings of the concurrent majority principle on which Mr. Calhoun constructed his profound theory of government. The very fact that the House of Representatives have this negative power to refuse to make appropriations, if they, in the exercise of their best judgment, think that the appropriations ought not to be made, may be used as a very powerful weapon of negotiation, by the President and Senate, because, if foreign Governments require too much money in the treaties we are forming with them, they may say to them, "we, ourselves, might be willing to accept your offer, and give this amount of money, but this treaty has to pass through the ordeal of the House of Representatives. The representatives of the people have to be satisfied on the subject; and they are a little particular about the money of the people. They might refuse to pass the appropriation bill to enable us to comply with the terms of the treaty, and thus the treaty would become null and void." So far, then, from the power of the House of Representatives to pass upon this point being injurious, it is a power which might be of the greatest benefit, as it can be used by the President and Senate as a powerful argument to resist the demands of a foreign Power for an exorbitant sum of money, in the negotiation of a treaty. On all these accounts, then, I conclude that the House of Representatives, on the question of appropriating money which is required by a treaty, has an entire and free discretion in the exercise of a sound judgment. They are not bound to appropriate money, unless in the exercise of a reasonable discretion, they think that the best interests of the country require that they should.

On this point I beg leave to read a passage from Mr. Madison, as embracing very fully my views on this subject. Mr. Madison says:

"He came next to the fifth construction, which left with the President and Senate the power of making treaties, but required at the same time the legislative sanction and co-operation, in those cases where the Constitution had given express and specific powers to the Legislature. It was to be presumed, that in all such cases the Legislature would exercise its authority with discretion, allowing due weight to the reasons which led to the treaty, and to the circumstances of the existence of the treaty. Still, however, this House, in its legislative capacity, must exercise its reason; it must deliberate; for deliberation is implied in legislation. If it must carry all treaties into effect, it would no longer exercise a legislative power; it would be the mere instrument of the will of another department, and would have no will of its own. Where the Constitution contains a specific and peremptory injunction on Congress to do a particular act, Congress must, of course, do the act, because the Constitution, which is paramount over all the departments, has expressly taken away the legislative discretion of Congress. The case is essentially different where the act of one department of Government interferes with a power expressly vested in another, and no where expressly taken away: here the latter power must be exercised according to its nature; and if it be a legislative power, it must be exercised with that deliberation and discretion which is essential to the nature of legislative power."

I have said thus much upon this branch of the subject, not so much because I considered it necessary upon the present occasion, as because I desired, for one, to put upon record my opinions of the power of this House over the appropriation of money where it is required by treaty; and because I cannot foresee what may occur hereafter, and I do not want to act blindfold upon this subject.

I will now, for a few moments, turn my attention to the consideration of the particular treaty now before us, and give the reasons which induce me to vote for this appropriation.

In the first place, the fact that the treaty has been negotiated by the President, with the consent of two thirds of the Senate, is a strong recommendation in favor of the treaty. So far as the President himself is concerned, I have much respect for his judgment, and great confidence in the correctness of his purposes. I repeat, then, that the fact that it comes with the recommendation of the President, is an argument to my mind in its favor. The fact that it has received the approbation of two thirds of the Senate—a body composed of men as patriotic and intelligent as can be found in the country—after mature deliberation; and the further fact that the treaty is of their own making, they having refused to adopt the first treaty, which they rejected and sent back to Mexico. I say that these facts afford a strong argument in its favor. But while I say this, I do not say I would yield my views to any such authority when they come in conflict.

I look to the treaty itself in the next place, and I find enough in that instrument to satisfy me that I ought to vote for the appropriation. The first point I notice in it, is, that it settles the Mesilla Valley difficulty. There is no doubt that a serious difficulty exists between this country and Mexico in regard to that territory. In running the boundary line between the two countries, according to the terms of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, our commissioners and surveyors did not agree. Our Government contended for one boundary, and Mexico for another. The American commissioners did agree with the Mexican commissioners in the first instance.

I have read, with some degree of care, the views of those who understand this subject, and I must confess the argument, to my mind, is strongly in favor of the American claim. And I so look upon it, not because it is the American argument, but because it is based upon the rules which should have governed the commission in settling the boundary. But, sir, we do not want to go to war with Mexico. I would rather, much rather, give up the Mesilla Valley than to go to war with that nation in her weak and distracted condition; much rather would I yield to her demands, unreasonable though they may be, than to go to war with her. I would shun war at any time by all honorable means, but if we must have it, let us go to war with a nation from which we may win glory, with a nation equally powerful with ourselves, and not a weak, distracted, convulsed, and tottering power like Mexico. Sir, I am glad of the opportunity to settle, by treaty, our difficulties with Mexico, in a manner honorable to both parties; which will satisfy the demands of that nation without too great cost on our part.

Further, I think we have gained an important point in obtaining a release from our obligations on account of the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. I think, on referring to the language of that treaty, it will be found that there is strong ground for giving it the construction which the Mexican Government claim for it. Here is the language:

"ART. 11. Considering that a great part of the Territories which, by the present treaty, are to be comprehended for the future within the limits of the United States, is now occupied by savage tribes, who will hereafter be under the exclusive control of the Government of the United States, and whose incursions within the territory of Mexico would be prejudicial in the extreme, it is solemnly agreed that all such incursions shall be forcibly restrained by the Government of the United States whenever this may be necessary; and that when they cannot be prevented, they shall be punished by the said Government, and satisfaction for the same shall be exacted, all in the same way, and with equal diligence and energy, as if the same incursions were meditated or committed within its own Territories against its own citizens."

Now, sir, this is the language selected by the Mexican commissioners who made the treaty. And, I ask, what could be more apt, more full, more comprehensive, in conveying the idea of obligation upon our part to protect the citizens of Mexico to the fullest extent? We are to extend to them the protection which, if placed under like circumstances, we should extend to our own citizens. And what degree of protection is necessarily implied in this idea. Why, sir, when we consider the power of this Government—a nation of twenty-five millions of people, able to send one million of soldiers into the field to protect the rights of our citizens—what sort of protection is it to be supposed they would afford? Why, sir, the most perfect the wit of man could devise. And the Mexican commissioners, when they inserted this clause into the treaty, meant to stipulate for the utmost possible degree of protection that human power could afford. And this is the provision of a treaty extorted from that nation when they were prostrate in the dust; when their energies and means had all been exhausted; when our victorious armies traversed their country in every direction, and their beautiful capital itself was in our hands; when Mexico lay under our feet, bleeding at every pore, this was the treaty we forced upon her. And the question now is, shall we screen ourselves from the obligations of that treaty by a mere play of words? On such a play of words as the honorable member from Missouri [Mr. BEXTON] used yesterday, that we were not bound to extend to them any more protection than we had extended to our own citizens; that we had showed no energy or zeal in protecting our own citizens, and that the want of energy we showed in protecting our own citizens, was the measure of energy that we were under obligations to bestow in protecting the people of Mexico. Why, sir, has it come to this, that we shall use our own wrong to relieve ourselves from the obligations of treaties? Has it come to this, that we shall use our own want of duty to our own citizens as a reason why we should not do a duty which we bound ourselves by treaty to perform to a foreign nation, and a weak and defenseless nation, over which we had triumphed? I am against that sort of morality. I would not learn morality in such a school. I say, those words bind us in the strongest way in which language can bind us, to have protected the border provinces of Mexico. And if we have failed to do so—a fact about which there is no dispute—then we are bound to make indemnity. We should put them in the same condition in which they would have been had we performed our part of the treaty. That is what I contend for. I would perform a treaty with the weakest as with the greatest power, and of all powers the Mexican the most—that weak, that distracted, that discordant power, which has been in a state of chaos since it first struck for liberty; the Government of which has been occupied by one military despot after another; which has been torn and convulsed with civil discord, and whose ruin has been almost completed by our own arms. I say that if there is any power on earth for which I would go further to perform treaties with than another, it is this Mexican Power. I would act towards her with generosity, good faith, justice, and magnanimity. If we adopt the construction which the member from Missouri puts on this treaty, and say that we are not liable, the name of America will become a by-word. American faith will be worse than Panic faith. One will be ashamed to acknowledge that he was an American, if we thus play on words with a weak and defenseless Power.

On the ground of obligations under this treaty and the liabilities which we assume under its eleventh article, I am in favor of voting this appropriation, in order to get rid of them. It is an article which, so long as it exists, may subject us to great expense, and what is more, if we refuse to perform its obligations, we shall strike a blow at the reputation of our country, which should be dearer to us than money. There is a clause in the treaty, too, which says, that on any violation of it, in any particular, either Government shall have the right to refer the matter to arbitration, with the exception that the other Government may refuse to do so if it deems it utterly inconsistent with its safety or interest. Then we should be bound to refer this matter to arbitration. Who would we refer it to? I doubt whether there could be found a Government who would go into that arbitration, who would not go into it with all its sympathies on the side of Mexico, and we would come out of the arbitration with ten, twenty, or thirty millions of dollars due to that nation. I am unwilling to run the risk of that arbitration. I think it wise to settle the matter by the treaty.

It has been said that the late Administration offered $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 for the abrogation of that eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. If that be true, then we have an additional reason for this treaty. That would be an interpretation of our own on the treaty, and we would be estopped from denying our own liability.

There is one remaining view of this treaty that recommends itself to my mind. It secures a railroad route to the Pacific. I do not desire this route simply because it is a southern route, for I am willing to see a road established at the North and in the center. I look upon the prosperity of the country with pleasure, and the making of these great improvements, as so many indications of the progress of the country. The Legislature of the State of Texas have granted immense tracts of land to enable a railroad to be run through that State from the Louisiana line to El Paso, and to secure its construction. From El Paso to the head waters of the Gulf of California, or the navigable waters of the river Gila, is not more than four hundred and fifty miles. The construction of this road would connect the Atlantic and Pacific, but of course this road would pass on to San Diego and eventually to San Francisco. I think, therefore, that the southern route is the best route for a railroad to the Pacific, for this reason, among others which could be given, that it would be the shortest route. This treaty is really valuable to the whole country because it secures this great route. And for the reasons I have thus hastily given I shall vote for the appropriation to carry out the provisions of this treaty.

Mr. PECKHAM then obtained the floor and addressed the Committee. His remarks will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am not in the habit of taking up the time of the committee in repeating what has been said by others; and if any gentleman desires to speak upon this subject, I will yield him the floor in ten minutes. I merely wish to assign the reasons—though they have been for the most part assigned by gentlemen who have spoken before me—which induce me to vote against the bill.

It has been denied in some quarters, and particularly in the Union, which claims to be the mouth-piece of the Administration, that when a treaty is made it is the law of the land, and that we are bound to carry it out. Whether the Administration has authorized or directed the Union to make an announcement of that kind I do not know. If it has, that would be a sufficient reason with me to resist this treaty, unless it be one indispensable to the security of this Government. But I trust the Administration has not authorized the Union to make any such statement, and to advocate the treaty upon that ground.

The position has also been taken by one gentleman [Mr. PHILLIPS] in this House, that we have no right, or, at least, we ought not to reject the treaty unless we have a clear conviction that it is wrong. Now, my position is, that when the Government brings forward a measure for us to act upon, by appropriating as in this case $10,000,000, it is for them to show that it is right, and not for us to show that it is wrong.

But, it has been said here that we get twenty millions of acres of land by this treaty. Now, sir, I submit that we have no knowledge of that fact. You do not know that you are getting one acre of land. All we get by the treaty is sovereignty over a certain tract of land; but is there a particle of evidence that it has not, every acre of it, been granted away long ago? So far as the Mesilla Valley is concerned—and that is all, or most of all, this treaty comprises, of any value from the accounts we have—it is a settled country, and, if settled, it has passed from the ownership of Mexico. Now, sir, all the right we acquire over it, is that held by Mexico; and, I ask, is there a particle of evidence, is there an allegation even, that every foot of this Mesilla Valley has not been sold out? Or suppose it has not. All the right Mexico ever had in or over it was that of eminent domain, and is there a particle of evidence that she has ever extinguished the Indian title to one single foot of it? I therefore say that, so far from being certain that we are to get this land, the facts before us are prima facie evidence that we shall not get one foot of it.

Mr. HAVEN. Why a man served a notice to every member of the House that he had a mortgage on the whole of it.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, that would be some sort of evidence that it had passed from the Indians. [Laughter.] Now, sir, in relation to this call for information, I appeal to the opponents of this call. They tell us we are too late, that we did not call for it in time. I desire to make a single remark upon that subject. My colleague [Mr. HAVEN] has already alluded to it, and I shall not present the facts as strongly as he did, but I think there are one or two considerations which did not present themselves to his mind. Sir, this treaty was formed with a stipulation that the ratifications should be exchanged within a little more than a week. I do not recollect the precise time, after it could have arrived here. I do not remember how long it was before the Senate.

Mr. BOCOCK. I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman, but I desire, in good faith, to make a statement upon this point. The treaty came here some months ago, when the time for exchanging the ratifications were fixed. The Senate had it under consideration for a very long time, made some alterations in it, and sent it back to Mexico, where the Senate amendments were accepted, and the treaty returned without changing the time for its ratification. That is the reason why it comes here so near the time fixed for the exchange of ratifications. The time itself was fixed some months ago.

Mr. PECKHAM. That is, of course, what the gentleman infers; what he imagines was the fact. Of course, he does not know.

Mr. BOCOCK. How, do not know? Do not I know that this is the treaty which came to the Senate several months ago, that the Senate put in an amendment, that it was sent to Mexico, and returned as I have stated? If I do not know that, how did the gentleman and his colleague [Mr. HAVEN] know all they have told the committee about it to-day?

Mr. PECKHAM. Did the gentleman ever see the treaty before it came to this House?

Mr. BOCOCK. I ask the gentleman if, with all his sophistry, he does not believe the facts I have alluded to as much as he believes anything?

Mr. PECKHAM. The gentleman puts a question to me instead of answering the one I put to him. I ask him if he ever saw the treaty before it came to this House?

Mr. BOCOCK. I never saw it before it came here.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, I will make a single suggestion. This treaty was communicated to the House on Wednesday last. I suggest to the gentleman whether, if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, or the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, had been disposed, as they would seem to imply, or as the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would especially seem to imply in his answer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HAVEN] to-day, that the House should have the knowledge if there was time, it would not have been competent for either of them to have asked Wednesday last for unanimous consent for the adoption of a resolution calling for these papers; and whether he believes that anybody would have objected under their call?

Mr. BOCOCK. May I answer that question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BOCOCK. The gentleman from New York, over the way, made some allusion to that subject when he was up. My friend, here, from Maine, has suggested it two or three times, but does my friend remember that those upon whom he imposes this responsibility do not want this information?

Mr. WASHBURN. Nor do they want anybody else to have it.

Mr. BOCOCK. The gentleman says, why did not the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means offer the resolution? Why does he not ask for information? Did my friend ask for it? Suppose that he saw enough on the face of the treaty to satisfy him that it was right. Suppose that he saw on its face that the United States acquired from Mexico enough to justify us in paying this money, and was satisfied to pay the money, why should the gentleman from Alabama, on his own motion, have asked for the information?

But let me notice another thing. The gentleman has suggested that Monday was the first day on which this resolution could have been offered. Well, how does it come that he has offered it to-day? Why could he not have offered it as well Wednesday. Why could he not have asked the unanimous consent of the House Thursday, Friday, or Saturday, as well as to-day? Did he wish to sit still, say nothing, and expect the gentleman from Alabama, who saw on the face of the treaty enough to justify him in voting for the money, to call for the information? He comes to-day and asks unanimous consent, excusing himself for not doing so on Wednesday last.

Mr. PECKHAM. I did not see the treaty until Saturday or Monday, I think not until Monday; but I was perfectly satisfied that if I offered the resolution calling for the correspondence then, that it would have been, beyond all question, objected to by some gentleman. Acts of the House satisfied me of that. Hence I offered it at the first moment I could move to suspend the rules. Then, if gentlemen had thought proper, we would have had most abundant time to have got the information.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. One word.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. I cannot yield further. Gentlemen may cross-question each other when I have finished.

This call for the correspondence is the only other matter on which I am to speak. I desire to address myself to it before it is exhausted by other gentlemen. As I have already said I never intend to get up on this floor, and repeat over and over in a different language ideas already expressed. I have not done it as yet. I therefore cannot yield further for fear they may exhaust the subject, and leave nothing for me to say. [Laughter.]

Now they have the matter pretty well exhausted, but I believe I have one or two ideas yet left upon the subject. I stated that this treaty was sent to us at a time when, by the rules of the House, we could not offer resolutions calling for information upon the subject, and get to a vote upon it without it was on Monday last, without unanimous consent. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOCOCK] says that this treaty was negotiated months and months ago.

Mr. BOCOCK. Upon its face it appears that it was.

Mr. PERKINS. I should not dare if the gentleman had not already done so, to have referred to what took place some three or four months ago in reference to this treaty. It is true it was published in the Herald, and it was said to have been improperly obtained. If what was published in the Herald was true, we have the strongest reason under heaven for a call upon the Government to know something about this treaty. According to the statements published in that paper, we were to pay $20,000,000, but the Senate sent it back to Santa Anna, striking out one half of the sum, and Santa Anna signed it immediately. If the commissioner was grossly imposed upon, or wheedled into this thing by speculators, I would like to know why it was he was wheedled into giving just as much as Santa Anna was willing to take. I have the strongest conviction upon my own mind, that it was never intended that this House should have access to these papers, and that the parties concerned in it believed, if we obtained that information, that it would be the means of defeating the treaty. I predicate that belief upon this fact: that this treaty was sent here in the middle of last week, and the day, or the next day after it was sent here, the President had business to Old Point Comfort. The rules of the House do not permit us to introduce a resolution calling for information, unless by a suspension of the rules on Monday, except by unanimous consent. What has transpired here to-day, whatever conviction it may have upon other minds, satisfies me, beyond all possible doubt, if a resolution of that character had been offered the day the treaty was sent here, that objection would have been made to its reception. I have not been accustomed, either in the Legislature of New York or here, to vote appropriations of money blindly, and in the dark. If I do not understand them, and cannot inform myself about them, I either will not vote at all, or I will vote against them. If I should vote to give away money without a just conviction that it was right, I should consider myself as thieving in the pockets of the people.

Then, sir, I do not know the occasion which called out from the Union the declaration and argument that it was absolutely incumbent on this House to grant this appropriation. But I have a sort of conviction that it grows out of, and is connected with, a similar declaration to the effect that if Spain does not want to sell Cuba to us, we must declare war and take it. Now, I do not know anything about what price will be offered for Cuba, but I do not think that I am going to vote for paying Spain two or three hundred millions for it without my knowing thoroughly the reasons calling for that appropriation. And in this case I am not going to set a precedent which will give the Government an excuse for refusing such information as the House may deem necessary. So far as I am concerned, I say, give me the information necessary to enable me to act intelligibly, or else, I will not, in this way, put my hands into the pockets of the people.

Mr. MILLSON. Up to one minute ago, Mr. Chairman, I had no purpose of addressing the committee; but a remark which just now fell from the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PECKHAM,] and a similar one made by his colleague, [Mr. PERKINS,] render it necessary that I should say a word or two for the purpose of explaining to them that I, at least, was no party to any understanding which both gentlemen say prevailed in committee, in regard to offering the resolution calling for correspondence, and that I had nothing to do with violating it.

Mr. PECKHAM. I, for one, did not intend to intimate anything of the sort. I did understand, from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—and I think he so stated to the committee—that he had no objection whatever to this information being laid before the House; and with the view of procuring it, and with that understanding, I made the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. MILLSON. The gentleman said that there was a general understanding of the sort throughout the committee.

Mr. PECKHAM. I meant my remark to be in the shape I have mentioned.

Mr. MILLSON. When the motion was made that the committee rise, it was evident to me that the object which the gentleman had in view could not be accomplished, as there was no quorum present, there being not more than thirty or forty gentlemen then in committee; and it immediately occurred to me that if the committee rose, objection would be made to the offering of the resolution; and that if opposition should also be made to returning into committee, which I thought probable, the debate which was then going on would be abruptly terminated. For that reason, I voted against the motion that the committee rise; and as soon as we got into the House, I moved to return into Committee of the Whole, because, as I then stated, no quorum was present. And certainly, in doing so, my purpose was not to violate any understanding; for I was party to no such understanding myself; but my object was to enable the gentleman who then had the floor, [Mr. Giddings,] and other gentlemen who I supposed would seek the floor, to continue the debate, which I saw would be brought to an abrupt close through the efforts of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PECKHAM.]

And besides, I never would have agreed to allow the gentleman from New York to introduce his resolution under the circumstances then existing. I never would have consented that a resolution which, considering its bearing and objects, involved so high and important a principle, relating, as it did, to the constitutional rights and privileges of this House, should be voted upon while there were only some thirty or forty members present; or in any other way than by yeas and nays.

It was from no disposition to prevent the introduction of the resolution under proper circumstances, or to defeat the call for information, but because I saw that at the time it was offered, it was impracticable to obtain it, and because I felt certain that the House would find difficulty in returning into committee, as they afterwards did, that I made the motion that the House should resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and I requested that no division might be called for on that motion, in order that the want of a quorum might not be made apparent.

Mr. HAVEN. I understood that the gentleman from Virginia wanted the information himself, and that he could not get it.

Mr. MILLSON. I did not say that I wanted the information, nor did I express any opinion whether the failure to call for it would, or would not, be any surrender of the constitutional rights of the House. What I did mean to say was, that the resolution itself presented a very high and important question, and that I, for one, would not consent that this question should be voted upon, except by yeas and nays, and in a full House.

I do not intend to enter at large into the argument of this subject. I shall only state a few general principles that seem to belong to it. I am exceedingly gratified that nearly all the gentlemen associated with me in political communion have expressed views which meet my hearty approbation.

Sir, it is an unquestionable right of the House of Representatives to call for information, and to exercise its own free and independent judgment in reference to the execution of any treaty which requires the agency of this House. I entirely dissent from the opinion expressed by some gentlemen, that, because the President and Senate alone are the treaty-making power, a treaty approved by them becomes instantly the law of the land, and imposes an obligation upon the other departments of the Government to carry it into effect.

The President and the Senate, it is true, are the treaty-making power; that is to say, they have the sole right to negotiate treaties. But it is not an unqualified and absolute right. In the initiation of treaties, their jurisdiction is exclusive, but not unlimited.

In the first place, a treaty imposes no such obligation, when made in violation of the Constitution; and even when it is not inconsistent with any provision of the Constitution, it does not follow that in every such case it must necessarily be carried into effect. When it stipulates for something that lies within the peculiar province of some other department of the Government, the assent of that department is indispensable to its validity; and it cannot be commanded by what is called the treaty-making power.

But, sir, let me first consider the case of an unconstitutional treaty. I know it has been contended by some—I hope very few are now chargeable with this heresy—that every treaty is the supreme law of the land; for that while the Constitution declares that the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, shall be the supreme law of the land, it does not impose this condition upon treaties, but provides that “all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.” They infer from this that a treaty need not be made in pursuance of the Constitution; but if made by the President, with the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate, it would be the supreme law of the land, though it might undertake to nullify an express provision of the Constitution itself.

If this were so, it would involve the absurdity of supposing that there may be two inconsistent supreme laws of the land,—the Constitution itself directing one thing, and a treaty directing another, and yet both of them being the supreme law of the land, according to this fanciful method of argumentation.

It would also involve the still greater absurdity of supposing that the Constitution authorizes a subordinate agency to destroy itself, and that this treaty-making power, brought into existence only by the Constitution, may survive the destruction of that by which alone it lives.

But, sir, the language of the Constitution leaves no occasion for this argument. For it does not recognize all treaties that may be made by the President and Senate as the supreme law of the land, but only such as may be made under the authority of the United States. What these States may have prohibited in this Constitution, which is the work of their hands, cannot be done under their authority. A treaty, then, if unconstitutional, has no validity, and we ought not to carry it into effect.

And so, too, when a treaty contains a stipulation which, though not unconstitutional, relates to a matter confided by the Constitution to some other department of the Government, or withheld from all, it does not transfer to the treaty-making power the control over this matter. The rights of the parties having the proper control over the subject cannot be impaired or disturbed by the making of such a treaty. Without their assent it can have no validity. The inability to perform such an engagement might lead to embarrassing consequences; but the engagement itself would impose no obligation, other than a persuasive one, upon the party to whom the right to determine the question properly belongs.

Suppose a treaty should be negotiated with Great Britain, stipulating that the free blacks of Jamaica should be allowed to remove to, and reside within, the limits of the State of South Carolina. There would be nothing unconstitutional in it; I mean to say the treaty would not be in violation of any provision of the Constitution. But it must be ratified by the State of South Carolina before it could go into effect. And if South Carolina should refuse to ratify it, then all that could be said would be, that the President and the Senate had negotiated upon a subject which was not within their jurisdiction, and had not been confided to those branches of the Government.

And, sir, whenever the President and Senate make a treaty, the stipulations of which impose burdens upon the people which the Constitution requires to be laid by the House of Representatives, in conjunction with the other branch of Congress, then the President and Senate cannot, of themselves, lay such burdens. It would require the concurrent action of the House of Representatives in that case, in the same manner that it would need the assent of the State of South Carolina in the case I have supposed; and simply because the subject of the treaty is beyond the exclusive cognizance of the President and Senate. We see, then, sir, that the question is not whether the President and Senate alone have the right to make a treaty, but what kind of treaty they have a right to make; not whether the House should be a party in making the treaty, but how far the House is bound by the treaty when made.

It cannot be said that the good faith of the country would be violated by the refusal of the House of Representatives to assent to such a treaty—that foreign nations could justly exact a compliance with its stipulations. They must, at their peril, understand the powers of those with whom they treat. If a treaty were to be negotiated by the President alone, without the sanction of the Senate, would the foreign Government have a right to say: “We will hold you responsible for the treaty. We know nothing about your Senate, and have had no negotiation with them. We know nothing of your Constitution, and it is not our part to understand it. It is enough for us to know that the treaty has been made by the Chief Executive Magistrate of the Union, and we hold the whole people bound by its terms.” Why, sir, our reply would be, that is a matter of which you are bound to take notice. The President cannot make a treaty which shall be obligatory upon the United States, without the concurrence of two thirds of the Senate. Sir, that answer would be sufficient. They could not insist upon the execution of a treaty made by the President alone.

In the same manner, if it be the right of the House of Representatives, as I have endeavored to show it is, to withhold their assent from treaties involving an appropriation of money, foreign nations cannot plead their ignorance of our Constitution. They are bound to understand, that though a treaty be made by the President, and concurred in by the Senate, it still cannot be carried into execution until it has received the sanction of the law-making power. Mexico, therefore, would, in the present instance, have no right to complain of any want of good faith should the House refuse this appropriation; because she was bound to inform herself of the powers of our negotiators, and is presumed to know that the treaty could not be of perfect obligation upon the United States without the assent of this House.

But, sir, while these are my views, and while I am gratified to know that nearly every gentleman who has spoken in this debate has insisted upon these constitutional rights of the House of Representatives, it is another question, on what occasion we should exercise this privilege of defeating a treaty. Here is a treaty sent to us for our inspection. By the conditions of that treaty, the ratifications are to be exchanged within six months of the 30th of December last. We are now within some three days of the expiration of that term. Sir, it is, I think, unfortunate that so little time has been allowed the House of Representatives for the consideration of this question. We all understand the reason. We all, personally and individually, know why we are called upon thus hastily to act on so important a subject. We understand, as my colleague [Mr. BOOCK] has stated, that this treaty went some months ago to the Senate; that it underwent a very protracted investigation there; that important alterations were made; that it was sent back to Mexico, and that it has lately been agreed to by that Government in its amended form. I say we all, individually and unofficially, know these facts. I regret, to be sure, that the facts themselves were not stated, or, at least, that some allusion to them was not made in the message of the President accompanying the treaty.

I regret that the President did not, in the communication which he recently sent to us, state why it was that so important a treaty, and so important a message, were not sent to the House at an earlier period. We know, indeed, that it could not have been sent at an earlier period; and I am not imputing any sort of blame to the Administration for the delay that has occurred. As the treaty has just been received from Mexico, it could not have been sent here sooner. Still, it would have been well to insert in this State paper some allusion to these facts, which may not be so generally known at some future period as they now are to the members of this House. I think it would have been only a proper submission to the constitutional rights of the House of Representatives to give, in the message itself, some explanation of the reason why it was withheld till so late a period; and I think it unfortunate that it was not done. I do not doubt that it would have been done, had the attention of the President been directed to the subject. I feel sure that he does not entertain the opinion that the House has no higher or further agency, in such cases, than simply to make an appropriation of the stipulated sum of money, without inquiry into the facts, or any consideration of consequences. But I do not think he reflected upon the inference that may hereafter be drawn from the silence of the message upon this subject. The fact that it was not sent to us till within eight or nine days of the period fixed for the payment of the money, may, at some future time, be urged by those who deny the constitutional rights of the House, as an argument to show that the President regarded the House as under an antecedent obligation to carry the treaty into effect, without any investigation of its nature, or of the circumstances under which it was formed, and that the House submitted to this interpretation of their duties.

If this investigation were practicable now, I should be inclined to insist upon it, before we made a final disposition of the bill. But as it is not, I am unwilling to defeat the treaty merely because it might turn out to be a bad one. Even if slight objections should appear upon its face—even if any should suppose the benefits secured not altogether answerable to the price required to be paid—something is certainly due to the deliberate judgment of the President and the Senate.

Mr. BOCK next addressed the committee. His remarks will be found in the Appendix.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state what I understand to be some of the facts in regard to this treaty. I understand that this Gadsden treaty has been the subject of conversation in this city for the last five or six months. I understand, also, that a document purporting to be a copy of the original treaty was published in some of the New York papers, and that it is in some respects the same with the official copy now before us. But this matter has been sufficiently explained by my colleague, and I will not make further allusion to it.

On the 21st of the present month, the President of the United States sent a message to this House asking an appropriation of $10,000,000 to carry this treaty into effect. The treaty is plain and intelligible, and was published in all the papers of the city on the next morning, the 22d, on which day a copy of it was in the hands of every member of this House. These are undoubted and unmistakable facts. Those who are hostile to the appropriation asked for, and are opposed to this particular treaty, desire light, they say, upon the subject. If they were true to themselves, if they really desired to obtain the information which they deem so important, most assuredly they ought to have availed themselves of the earliest opportunity for obtaining such information.

But what is the fact, sir? The sharp, shrewd gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who puts questions, and answers them himself, who seems to have been deeply impressed with the necessity for information on this subject, is as calm as a summer morning. Not a whisper is heard, not an effort made, not an attempt originated in this House, for the purpose of obtaining information. None whatsoever. It lies over till Monday, on which day the gentleman from New York, on my right, [Mr. PECKHAM,] offers the resolution referred to in this day's debate. That resolution sought for information which the gentleman says the Executive might or might not have communicated. I do not now recollect the terms of the resolution; but that is, I understand, his construction of it.

Suppose, however, the call for information were an imperative one, the gentleman knows, and this committee knows, perfectly well—and no one can pretend to ignore the fact—that the Executive ought not to have communicated the information sought, unless a due regard for the public interests permitted him to do so. Suppose that the developments in that correspondence were of a character injuriously to affect our public interest, and our relations with foreign Powers, is there a member of this committee that would now say such information ought to have been communicated? Suppose that, upon such a call as that proposed in the resolution, the Executive should reply that, in his judgment, the public interests would not justify the communication of the information asked by this House. I ask the committee what would have been the consequence then? How would the enlightened gentleman from Maine have acted? How would the gentleman from the Albany district [Mr. PECKHAM] have acted, when he would have to sit down in darkness, seeking information which it was inconsistent with the public interest to communicate? Who would have then ventured to suppose that a coordinate branch of the Government—entrusted by the Constitution with power to negotiate treaties—had not wisely exercised their trust for the good of the country, and that it would be unwise and improper for the House to appropriate the requisite sum of money for the execution of the treaty? And yet we would have acted then in the dark, just as we will probably act now, with no other information than the treaty itself, and that general knowledge possessed by us all. Now, I ask this committee, was there any real desire to get the information? I put the question to the gentlemen here, whether, in the efforts that have been made by them, and the neglect practiced, they were seeking for light?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. We did want the light, and I would have made the call for information last week if I did not know very well that the resolution would have been objected to by the same gentlemen who have objected to the resolution of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SMITH. My dear sir, there is a way of getting over such objections.

Mr. WASHBURN. In what way could objection have been got over last week?

Mr. SMITH. Why, by appealing to the gentleman objecting, or to the House. I suppose the rules might have been suspended.

Mr. WASHBURN. On what day last week could they have been suspended?

Mr. SMITH. Why, on any day after the subject was introduced; and it might have been done even on Monday.

Mr. WASHBURN. The motion was made for the very purpose on that day.

Mr. SMITH. Exactly; I know it was. And I hold that it was perfectly right to object to it. Permit me to say, that when gentlemen who are always on the look out here for information, as they say, neglect to use all the means at their command to procure it, the fact of such neglect leaves it to be inferred that they have other purposes in view than those which they profess. The gentleman from Maine infers a good deal himself in reference to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who is not here to take care of himself; and he appeals to the candor and frankness of my colleague [Mr. BOCK] to admit his inferences. I do not wish to infer any want of candor and sincerity on the part of gentlemen here, when I say that some of us may have very different conceptions as to what constitutes candor and frankness. Some gentlemen, when their candor is appealed to, might, in the fullness of their heart, answer with a frankness from which others under like circumstances might shrink; and so there might be no reciprocity in this species of political dialectics.

I advert to this because I cannot understand what was meant by the gentleman from the Buffalo district, [Mr. HAVEN,] and by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. WASHBURN,] if they really mean what they profess. They are certainly gentlemen of very high intelligence, and of large experience here. And I mean no reflection when I compliment their intelligence. Yet, sir, they lie still—and the gentleman from New York is the first to move—they lie still and allow themselves to wait, and submit their application for information at so late a period, that they must know that, if granted, it could not be done without hindering and delaying the action of the committee and of the House. Suppose this resolution had been adopted. We know very well that a voluminous and very extensive correspondence must have preceded the treaty, the subject of negotiation for months; and if all the information in connection with that subject—as the character of the resolution would seem to imply—was to be communicated to the House, could it have been sent here within an hour, as the gentleman says? No, sir; no man ought to pretend that it could be; and the effect of passing the resolution at this late hour, would be to postpone the action of this House until a time when it would be too late to execute the treaty, which requires the money asked to be paid in New York by the 30th day of the present month.

But a contrast here strongly presents itself to my mind. We all recollect the Jay treaty. It was about the years 1794, 1795, and 1796. Well, at that very time there were three other treaties before the House. A resolution was offered to unite them all. They were, I think, the French treaty, the Spanish treaty, the British treaty, and the Indian treaties. Those upon my side of the House—I think I may say my side of the House, for I hold that I am a descendant of that school of politicians—those upon my side of the House demanded information, when called upon for an appropriation to carry Jay's treaty into effect. The friends of Jay, however, and of the treaty, interposed much more emphatic opposition than that which has been made here from any quarter. New York men then were standing up against the call; New York men now stand up for the call. But the State has been enlightened since that day. Parties have changed. Tempora mutantur, et nos mutamur in illis. A different state of things exists now. Why, sir, this House was then called upon to act, and to appropriate money for the purpose of executing that treaty, without other information than the treaty, and in the dark, or, at least, with only a few scraps of information drawn from the Senate; or which, from the secrets of the Administration, had found their way to the House.

With this and many such precedents before them, why do gentlemen take on as they do, and why have they postponed their requirements for information to so late a period, that, if granted, would produce the loss of the treaty. Let me tell the gentleman that the House will not allow such a result to arise from their action; and the country will not countenance a movement which will embarrass an important acquisition of territory by any such pretenses.

But one thing more. I stepped into the Hall when the venerable gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] was upon the floor, and just as he was saying that he would not vote away the people's money unless he had light upon the subject. Sir, it seems to be the fashion of the day to put questions to the candor of others. Now, I put it to the candor of the venerable gentleman to say whether that is the only reason of his opposition to this bill?

Mr. PERKINS. I will answer the gentleman. My opposition is based on the ground that we have not the information on which to act. I want the basis of these negotiations; and I would have voted for a resolution calling for them.

Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, I will ask another question, though I will not press for an answer. I should like to know whether the gentleman from New York has not some other reason for his opposition?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not believe that I have. Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, I called the gentleman out for an explanation, and I am bound to accept the one he gives. I was under the impression, however, that there were some other reasons which actuated the course of the honorable gentleman.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman state what he means?

Mr. SMITH. I understood that, in conversation, he took the ground that this was a result of the policy of the South. I shall be glad to know that I am mistaken; and I am, of course, bound to take the answer given by the gentleman himself. But I did understand that the gentleman had expressed it as his opinion that the South were steadily pursuing a policy by which they would enlarge their own territory until they were satisfied, with a view of their dissolving the Union and establishing themselves as a great southern Republic.

Mr. PERKINS. I did not say that; but I will, at the proper time, tell the gentleman what I said in the conversation to which he alludes. What I said had no relation to this bill.

Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, I am glad to know the gentleman did not; for I have, in many respects, participated with others in forming a very high impression of him. But I had heard that he, and perhaps others, were acting upon this question from sectional motives; and I have, therefore, sought the opportunity to set them thus distinctly before the House. There is, I think, or ought to be, no difficulty upon this subject.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. If the gentleman from Virginia will allow me. Did I understand the gentleman from New York to assert those as his opinions upon which he had acted?

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. No, sir. I will tell the gentleman what I did say. I expressed the idea that in the event of the acquisition of a large section of country to the southern section of the Union, that I believed a portion of the people of the South had that result in contemplation. In reference to this little strip of land, however, it is too insignificant to be spoken of in such a connection. I have no sort of objection to it from any such ground. But in reference to the annexation of large tracts of country, I believe that is the policy of nullification from beginning to end.

Mr. SMITH. Well, sir, then that has nothing to do with the matter before us. But really, with all due respect, it does seem to me that it does not become gentlemen, who are setting their faces against the laws of the Union, to speak of nullification. You have certainly had most lamentable displays of nullification out of the slave States—to wit, in the free-negro States.

Sir, whatever passes under our constitutional forms, and under the authority of the Constitution, is the law of the land, and it becomes every true man to give it his entire and undivided support. Practical nullification is found nowhere except in the free States—nowhere else. Resistance to the laws have alone been there developed. The clause of the Constitution which enjoins on the Federal Government the duty of suppressing domestic insurrections has never been called into exercise, except in the free States.

Mr. PERKINS, of New York. It was called into exercise in Georgia in reference to the Indians.

Mr. SMITH. I am not speaking of the Indians at all. I repeat, sir, that it is a remarkable fact, that that clause of the Constitution which imposes on the Federal Government the duty of suppressing domestic insurrection has never been called into execution, except in the free States. In Shay's rebellion in Massachusetts, in the whisky insurrection in Pennsylvania, in Rhode Island, in the case of Dorr, and in other cases of less importance, we have seen the power of the Federal Government, at a heavy tax on the public Treasury, called into exercise; but at the South it has never been called into exercise—never. Our own conservative character, our own self-reliance, the perfect law and order which prevail among us, have secured a quiet, faithful, and true execution of the laws there. I mention this because it is proper that gentlemen should not forget it; for we are frequently taunted with that provision of the Constitution which northern gentlemen say binds them to suppress domestic insurrection.

The question now comes up; and God knows that I have no feeling of ill-will—I never nurse my wrath to keep it warm; for I would rather laugh at any moment than to scowl—the question comes up, shall this treaty, which secures to the American Union the right of way across this continent for a railroad, be carried into execution by the requisite appropriation or not? Louisiana is now constructing, in the northern part of her territory—

Mr. PECKHAM. If the gentleman refers to the eighth article, it does not secure a railroad to the Government.

Mr. SMITH. It secures a track for one.

Mr. PECKHAM. No; but to a chartered, independent company.

Mr. SMITH. I am speaking of a railroad. It is in the family; and, therefore, what the gentleman states does not matter, even if so.

Mr. PECKHAM. It is not even in our family.

Mr. SMITH. In Louisiana?

Mr. PECKHAM. I am speaking of the Tehuantepec route.

Mr. SMITH. I am not. I was going on to say that Louisiana was now engaged in building a road in the northern part of her territory to the line of Texas, and that the State of Texas had already appropriated most munificently to secure a railroad in continuation through her territory of eight hundred miles to the territory near El Paso, ceded to us by this treaty. And thence a distance of about six hundred, and fifty miles, a considerable portion of which is through the State of California, to the Pacific.

Mr. PECKHAM. That right of way was secured to the Government by Mr. Walker long before this treaty.

Mr. SMITH. You have got that from over the way.

Mr. PECKHAM. I got it from the documents of the Government.

Mr. SMITH. We know nothing about that, except what we see in the newspapers. Even conceding that Mr. Walker had secured the right of way, did it secure to the American people the right of eminent domain over that territory? No, sir, without this treaty the first railroad from our own territory that would connect the two oceans, would still have to pass through a foreign land, owned, if not occupied, by the most worthless population of the earth. Does the gentleman desire to see an improvement such as this, with all its gigantic consequences, under the control of foreigners, and foreigners such as those of Mexico? I know his own patriotism and good feeling would recoil from the idea, if such a result could be avoided in any reasonable way.

By this treaty, also, there is a right of way secured to us over a route of undoubted value, if we are to believe the current history of the times; and for which Mr. Buchanan, when Secretary of State, authorized Mr. Trist to give $15,000,000. I mean the Tehuantepec route. Then, too, by this treaty we are released from that unhappy provision, the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. And now, when such substantial and important advantages are secured, gentlemen pause, and complain that they are denied information upon this subject. Gentlemen talk about the correspondence relating to this treaty being confidentially communicated to this House—confidentially communicated to two hundred and thirty-six men! Why, sir, in a body of sixty-two men only, composed of Senators, complete confidence and secrecy is out of the question. Then, what chance is there in a body like this of keeping anything confidential? It is too late now to call for the information; and the question is really, independent of all outside considerations—will this committee refuse to report to the House, for its adoption or rejection, a bill which shall enable the President to execute this treaty? If the appropriation is to be made, it must be made without delay, or the treaty may not be executed at all. Will gentlemen hesitate what course to adopt when they take into consideration the comparatively small sum asked, when compared with former sums demanded by the Mexican Government? I do not believe they can hesitate a single moment under the circumstances, and I am quite confident that the appropriation now asked to carry into effect the provisions of this treaty will be readily granted.

Mr. HAVEN. I am about to make the motion that the committee rise; but before doing so, I wish to make a single remark. I have listened with great pleasure and interest to the speeches of the last two gentlemen who addressed the committee, wherein they have undertaken to show that it was not of any importance that this House should have information upon the subject of this treaty. They will excuse me for saying that I cannot concur with them; and I believe this House and the country would rather have ten minutes perusal of the correspondence upon this subject, than two hours speeches from the gentlemen themselves, eloquent as they are. I now move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the temporary Chairman of the committee [Mr. JONES, of Tennessee,] reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House (No. 405) to "enable the President of the United States to carry out the third article of the recent treaty with Mexico," and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

The House thereupon (at ten minutes before eight o'clock, p. m.) adjourned to to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. BRODHEAD presented the memorial of Anne S. P. Chew, executrix of W. W. Chew, of Pennsylvania, deceased, praying that a claim for outfit of her testator, as chargé d'affaires to Russia, preferred by him during his lifetime, may be allowed to his estate; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion by Mr. BRODHEAD, it was Ordered, That Phineas Nighingale, administrator of Nathaniel Greene, deceased, have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

REPORTS FROM STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. SEWARD, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Abraham Cutter, praying the payment of a balance due him for his services as a lieutenant in the late war with Great Britain, and that he may be allowed a pension for injuries received, while in the discharge of his duty, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for his relief; which was read, and passed to a second reading. The report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Gabriel Denton, praying that further relief may be extended to the soldiers of the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a memorial of Clements, Bryan & Co., praying indemnity for losses sustained by the rescinding of a contract for furnishing supplies, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate to make a short explanation, which will only take a few minutes, in reference to the publication of the remarks made by me on last Monday. I did not desire to proceed to the explanation until the Senator from Massachusetts came in, as he is somewhat involved in it. I see he is now in his seat, and I shall therefore proceed.

It will be recollected that on last Monday I made some remarks, which were published on Tuesday morning in the Globe, in which I, in terms not very complimentary, spoke of the Senator from Massachusetts having publicly avowed that he disregarded the obligation of the oath he had taken to support the Constitution. In those remarks of mine I find the following words, published as a response from that Senator:

"Mr. SUMNER. I said I recognized no obligation in the Constitution of the United States to bind me to help to reduce a man to slavery."

Mr. President, these remarks were not made by that Senator at all during my remarks. If they had been made they would have been false, and would have been promptly pronounced so by me.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I call the Senator to order. The Senator states with regard to myself that certain remarks attributed to me there were not made by me at that time. To that, I reply they were made.

Mr. PETTIT. I will prove in his teeth that it is what I have stated—utterly false.

Several SENATORS. Order! Order!

THE PRESIDENT. The Senator must confine himself within the rules of order.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, I charge in this place, and I will establish it before I sit down, that the Senator did not make those remarks upon this floor, but that he went to the reporter of the Senate, and got him to interpolate them and put them in after the Senate adjourned. I will not leave any doubt upon that point, for I shall clearly establish it. I say, further, that he made no such remarks; and that if he had made them, they would have been untrue, and I should have replied to them promptly.

Now, sir, before proceeding further, let me say a word in reference to the propriety of reports and their publication. I hold that no Senator can be reported unless he has the floor. He must first be recognized by the Presiding Officer. The floor must be given to him before he can say anything. He cannot, in fact, speak a senatorial speech, or utter a senatorial word, until he has the floor of the Senate for that purpose. How garbled would be your reports, if a Senator was at liberty to go to the reporter of the Senate, after remarks were made, and tell him that "here, at this point, I said so-and-so; I pronounced the speaker as uttering a falsehood; I pronounced him base; I pronounced him a coward; I pronounced him a liar;" and all that should be published the next day without any remark in response to it. I say, therefore, as a matter of parliamentary fact and usage, the Senator could not have uttered the words. He had not the floor on any occasion for that purpose at all.

Sir, an instance occurred between myself and the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] which may illustrate this matter very well. That Senator, when the Nebraska bill was returned to us from the House, during the course of his remarks upon it, asked me directly, whether I expected, by a repeal of the Missouri compromise, that there would be a better law and a better policy established for the Territories of Nebraska and Kansas, than their then law? That Senator gave me the floor to reply. He took his seat; he desired to have me answer. I got up. The President recognized me. The Senator yielded me the floor. I responded to him in words which I recollect distinctly, and which he recollects. I said, I did not expect they would get a better law; but that I did believe they would get precisely the same law, and that my object in repealing the existing law, and allowing them to make their own, was that it should be the result of their own begetting; that it would come from their own loins, and they would love and cherish it as the father did his legitimate offspring. That Senator, notwithstanding I had the floor, and had the right to make that response, saw fit, in the publication of his speech to leave it out entirely. I made no complaint. The Senator, after his speech was published, came and mentioned it to me. I should never have read his speech to see whether it was published or not. It was possible that the Senator was not willing that my reply should go with his question. It was possible that he was unwilling the historian hereafter, in hunting up the record of his life and actions, should find my name in juxtaposition with his. However that may be on his part, perhaps I should be as reluctant to have it found there as the Senator himself.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the Senator allow me the floor?

Mr. PETTIT. Certainly.

Mr. SEWARD. I called upon the Senator the next day after the publication of my remarks, and explained to him that the report was deficient in the omission of his remarks, owing to the fact that the report was printed from my own notes of the speech, and not from those of the reporter. I explained the case to him briefly, and told him that, if he desired, I would have his remarks inserted.

Mr. PETTIT. Certainly the Senator said all that; and I said to him that it was wholly immaterial; but there was an instance where the remarks of the Senator, who was called to the floor, and who had it legitimately, were left out of the published official proceedings; but, sir, this is a different case. This is a case of putting in that which was not uttered upon the floor, and that which would have been untrue if it had been so uttered; and I will establish it.

But in laying out the premises, I have a further complaint to make. I went to the printing office to see the first impression, the proof sheet as it is called, of the remarks which I made. I went at a late hour. It was about eleven o'clock at night. They were furnished me at the office of the Globe. I took them to my room, promising to return them by eight o'clock the next morning. On reading them over, I was never more surprised in my life than I was to find in my speech the remarks which I have read, as purporting to come from the Senator from Massachusetts, and to which I made no response. I could make no response, for I did not hear them. I could make none, because they were not uttered. I took my pen and struck them out entirely. I said they were never uttered, that they formed no part of the proceedings during my remarks upon that day.

I carried them back at one o'clock that night, with a witness with me, to the printing office. I told the foreman of the official printer of the reports of the Senate that they formed no part of the Senate proceedings whilst I was making my remarks, and that they should not be published. Despite of that, I see that your official reporter has reinstated them; remarks which were never made, and which the Senator who was speaking at that time forbade to be published. So far I have a complaint against the official reporter. It is not personal against Mr. Rives, for although I saw him when I got the first impression I did not see him when I returned it, but his foreman was there. I do not know his name, and I do not know that I should recognize him if I were to see him again; but such is the fact. A gentleman of this city was with me at the time.

Sir, I have said that these remarks were not made upon the floor of the Senate Chamber, that they could not be made technically when the Senator was in his seat. He could not speak without rising and addressing the President of the body; but, as a matter of fact, they were not made, as I will establish now. I shall be compelled to read what I was saying in connection with this matter. Here is what I was saying:

"I ask that Senator—you, who to-day have stultified yourself—you who have said that the solemn oath which you took at that stand, administered by the President of this body upon the holy Evangelists of God, kissing the book, giving seal and sanction to your asseveration—you, who have said to-day that you would spit upon that oath, would disregard its obligations——"

Then, according to the report, the Senator broke in with the exclamation "Never! never!" I suppose this meant that he did not say technically what I attributed to him, that he would spit upon his oath and the Constitution. Then I proceeded thus:

"You, who denied it; denied its power to bind you; you, who said you would not maintain the Constitution of the United States——"

According to the report, at this point comes in the Senator from Massachusetts, thus:

"Mr. SUMNER. I said I recognized no obligation in the Constitution of the United States to bind me to help to reduce a man to slavery."

By my remarks which immediately follow, it will be seen that I did not answer this. Why? Because no such thing was uttered. I went on to say:

"Mr. PETTIT. I ask you, do you claim to be the equal of your revolutionary sires?"

"The PRESIDENT OFFICER. The Senator must address the Chair, not the Senator from Massachusetts."

Thus you see, sir, I went on without paying the least attention to the alleged denial of the Senator. Now, I wish to turn to what was said while the Senator from South Carolina was speaking, and we shall see that the Senator from Massachusetts said no such thing, and that if he had said it whilst I was speaking, it would have been untrue. He did not say it at all, and I had no opportunity to respond to it. Now, let us turn to what did take place whilst the Senator from South Carolina was speaking. He said the Senators from Massachusetts proposed to repeal the fugitive slave law, and he wished to know whether they would send back fugitives slaves, under the provision of the Constitution, if that law were repealed. Here is the report, as published:

"Would they send fugitives back to us after trial by jury, or any other mode? Will this honorable Senator [Mr. SUMNER] tell me that he will do it?"

"Mr. SUMNER. Does the honorable Senator ask me if I would personally join in sending a fellow-man into bondage?"

Mark, that even if this is not an interpolation by his order to the reporter, it is not a question put by the Senator from South Carolina, but it is a question put to himself by the Senator from Massachusetts. There is no response. The Senator from South Carolina does not say that he asked that question, but what then does the Senator from Massachusetts say? "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing." Sir, the history of Hazael may well have been applied to the man who uttered these words, for he proved himself to be a dog. The prophet—the man of God told Hazael that he should be the murderer of his master the king of Syria; that he should oppress and persecute the Jews; that he should slay and destroy them; that he should put to death their men, women, and children. Then it was that Hazael said "is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing." But the very next day he showed himself to be that dog. The very next day he falsified what the prophet had said. After the king asked him what had the man of God replied to the query, as to whether he should recover his health, he lyingly told him that the prophet had said he should surely recover and not die. Sir, the words of Hazael used by the Senator from Massachusetts as classic, came from Hazael the murderer, the ingrate, the usurper. On the very next day the Senator's prototype smothered his master, the king, with a wet blanket, put him to death, ascended the throne, and spread bloodshed and destruction throughout the land. Sir, the Senator's response was very illy chosen.

But what further is there in this? Immediately after the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from South Carolina went on, and the report thus proceeds:

"Mr. BUTLER. These are the prettiest speeches that I ever heard. [Laughter.] He has them turned down in a book by him, I believe, and he has them so elegantly fixed that I cannot reply to them. [Laughter.] They are too delicate for my use. [Renewed laughter.] They are beautiful things; made in a factory of rhetoric somewhat of a peculiar shape. But, I must be permitted to say, not of a definite texture. Now, what does he mean by talking about his not being a dog? [Continued laughter.] What has that to do with the Constitution, or the constitutional obligations of a State? [Laughter.] Well, sir, it was a beautiful sentiment, no doubt, as he thought, and perhaps he imagined he expressed it with Demosthenian abruptness and eloquence. [Laughter.] I asked him whether he would execute the Constitution of the United States without any fugitive slave law, and he answered me, is he a dog——"

"Mr. SUMNER. The Senator asked me if I would help to reduce a fellow-man to bondage? I answered him."

Now, the Senator from South Carolina asked no such question. No such question was put by him. He asked the Senator from Massachusetts whether he would abide by the Constitution, and return the man already a slave. He did not speak of reducing a man to slavery. There is no man in the country North or South who could be got to reduce a fellow-being, who is not a slave, to slavery or bondage. There is no one for whom I would have a greater contempt than he who would seek to reduce a man from the condition of freedom to the condition of slavery. But that is a very different thing from controlling a man who is already so reduced, and is already a slave. But we find that immediately after the Senator from Massachusetts made this statement, the Senator from South Carolina, thus proceeded:

"Mr. BUTLER. Then you would not obey the Constitution. Sir, [turning to Mr. SUMNER,] standing here before this tribunal, where you swore to support it, you rise and tell me that you regard it the office of a dog to enforce it. You stand in my presence, as a coequal Senator, and tell me that it is a dog's office to execute the Constitution of the United States?"

"Mr. PRATT. Which he has sworn to support."

"Mr. SUMNER. I recognize no such obligation."

That is the language: "I recognize no such obligation." What obligation? Why, sir, the Constitution and the oath which he had taken to support that instrument. At the point where the interpolation of which I complain comes in my remarks, I am using no smooth or honeyed terms, I confess, in reference to the Senator, for I admit it was the most abhorrent thing I had ever heard in or out of the Senate, in reference to the Government of the United States, and the obligations of its officers under it. What, sir, are Senators in high official position to publicly declare that they disregard the Constitution and the oath they have taken to support it? Suppose the President of the United States should make that declaration, how soon would the other House present articles of impeachment against him, and how promptly would this Senate pronounce judgment of expulsion or removal from office against him? What is the consequence? If the President, his Cabinet, your military commanders, the judges of your courts, your Senators and Representatives, may repudiate the obligation to perform the oath to support the Constitution, all is chaos, all is wilderness; and so far from the Government being stable, in which the rights of individuals are fixed and chaotic secure, it is a mass of confusion, without form, unshapely, and uncomely. All the horrors of anarchy and civil war must necessarily ensue.

No announcement, therefore, could have greeted my ears so harshly as to hear a fellow-Senator say that he disregarded the obligation of his oath to support the Constitution of his country. Then, after my making this statement, came in the alleged remark of his. Thus he took my speech and altered it in the hands of the reporter, after it was written down, and he put in whatever he pleased. The Senator said he called me to order because he did use those words. I say he did not, and I will prove it. It is never worth while to go to war until you have the guns loaded. I have the Paixhans charged.

Mr. President, I need not repeat that the Senator had not the floor, and therefore could not have used the words; and if he said them in an undertone, they had no right to go in the report at all. How was I to answer them? He might have said anything else, ever so offensive to me, in the same manner, and with the same propriety that he claims to have said this. But I have said he did not use the words in point of fact, and I now proceed to prove it. Not only did I not hear them, not only had he no right to utter them, but he, in fact, did not utter them, as I will show.

This morning I addressed a letter to the reporter, Mr. Sutton, asking him whether these remarks were in the report when I had concluded my speech—whether they were in the stenographic notes—whether the Senator from Massachusetts did not go to him, after the adjournment of the Senate—for it will be recollected that immediately upon the conclusion of my remarks the Senate adjourned, the only intervening business being the obtaining of the floor by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. Dixon.] I asked him whether the Senator from Massachusetts did not go to him and have those words interpolated, or have what he is reported to have said, altered and changed. I have Mr. Sutton's letter in reply, dated this morning, addressed to me, and I will read it for the benefit of the Senator:

"In answer to the several inquiries in your note of this morning's date, I beg to state that the words reported to have been delivered by Mr. SUMNER, 'I said I recognized no obligation in the Constitution of the United States to bind me to help to reduce a man to slavery,' were not in the short-hand notes of that day's debate."

They were not in the notes. He says, "Mr. SUMNER called upon me after the adjournment." What right had he to call on the reporter, and interpolate into my remarks things which he did not say—things that should have been promptly answered, and would have been by me promptly denied, as not containing the truth? He went and called on the reporter after the Senate adjourned, and told him to insert this, as being what he said. It was false, because he could not have said it. "It was false, because he did not say it. Mr. Sutton's note proceeds:

"Mr. SUMNER called upon me after the adjournment to revise the remarks he had delivered, which is a right reserved to Senators."

The words are, "revise the remarks he delivered." I say he had delivered no remarks. He had not the floor, and could have made no senatorial remarks. He had not the floor to make any remarks, and therefore had none to revise; but his object designedly was to put me in the position of not contradicting that statement, which was entirely the reverse of what I was saying. He went to revise his remarks. I went to the official printer's to revise my remarks, and I said distinctly that the alleged remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts were not made. I took a pen and blotted them entirely out, as falsehood ought always to be blotted out; and yet the printer reinstated them. Such a course of conduct will not do in an official printer, or in his subalterns. The letter goes on:

"As the notes had been transcribed, and the transcript sent to the printing office, at his request the short-hand notes were read to him, and he dictated the changed form in which they appear."

He dictated the changed form! Did he utter these words? He cannot get even a reporter to say that he used them in ever so silent a tone.

"He dictated the changed form in which they appear. As originally written, that part of your speech and Mr. SUMNER's observations stood thus."

His observations had no right in the debate, for had he not the floor to make them. But the reporter says that, as written out originally, they "stood thus:"

"I ask that Senator—you, who to day have stultified yourself—you, who have said that the solemn oath which you took at the stand, administered by the President of this body upon the holy Evangelists of God, kissing the book, giving seal and sanction to your asseverations—you, who have said to-day that you would spit upon that oath, would disregard its obligations—

"Mr. SUMNER. Never! never!

"Mr. PETTIT. You who denied it; you who denied its power to bind you; you, who said you would not maintain the Constitution of the United States.

"Mr. SUMNER. I said I never would surrender a fugitive slave."

Thus it seems that as the Senator's alleged remark stood in the reporter's notes, it was "I said I never would surrender a fugitive slave." Is that what he has interpolated here? Even if that had stood, he had no right to have that inserted. I did not yield him the floor for the purpose of saying that. He was not on the floor. He could not have uttered those words senatorially. But are those words the same as published? How changed is the whole of it? Who asked that Senator, what man from the North or the South asked him, or any other Senator, to reduce a man to slavery? No one. His remark, as interpolated in my speech, in violation of all propriety, courtesy, and truth, reads thus:

"Mr. SUMNER. I said I recognized no obligation in the Constitution of the United States to bind me to help to reduce a man to slavery."

The original notes, as taken down, were:

"I said I never would surrender a fugitive slave."

It is evident, from my remarks, which immediately follow, that I did not hear this at all, and that, therefore, these words were not spoken senatorially. The report goes on, immediately after these words, to say:

"Mr. PETTIT. I ask you, do you claim to be the equal of your revolutionary sires?"

This runs on in connection with what I was saying without interpolation of any kind, original or supposititious. Then we find this:

"The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator must address the Chair, and not the Senator from Massachusetts."

"Mr. PETTIT. I ask the Chair, then, whether the Senator from Massachusetts, with this odium on his lips, is the equal of his revolutionary sires?"

Of course, I meant the odium of his having said, in his response to the Senator from South Carolina, that he disregarded all such obligations as maintaining the Constitution which he had sworn here to support. He said, directly and emphatically, that he disregarded all such obligations. Then, as I have said, after my speech was over, and after we had adjourned, he sent to the reporter and interpolated what he did not say, and what he could not say, and what I have shown he did not say in any form or in any manner whatever.

Now, sir, how a man can reconcile such a course to his own sense of propriety, if he have any sense of propriety left, I do not know. I leave that Senator to reconcile it. I only say, that if he uttered any such words, I should have promptly said then, as I say now, that he did not make any such response to the Senator from South Carolina; but, on the contrary, did say what I was charging him with, and what the report shows he did directly say—that he disregarded the obligation.

A few words now, sir, before I sit down, in reference to the rights of Senators to have the control of that which is to be printed as theirs. The resolution employing the Senate official reporter secures to each Senator, expressly, the right of revising his own remarks—his own speech. For that purpose I went to the printing office. For that purpose I was courteously presented, Mr. Rives himself being there, with the first impression of my remarks. I took them to my room, and, as I have said, was utterly surprised to find that any such thing was reported in connection with them. I pronounced it false. I took the sheet back to the office with that interruption utterly obliterated, saying it was false, and should not be published with my remarks, cutting my speech entirely in two, and inserting that which did not and could not have taken place at all. In violation of that, the employee of the official reporter and printer of the debates reinstated those remarks, and published them in all their obnoxious form. It is time that the Senate inquired into this matter. We must know whether we do, or do not control our remarks, or whether the caprice of a man who may be temporarily employed in that office is to determine what is to be put into a Senator's speech. As well might the printer have inserted that that Senator said I was a liar, that I falsified the truth, that I was not to be believed, that I was traducing or abusing him, or any other offensive words, as to have inserted what I have alluded to. The words were not uttered; they could not have been uttered in form or in fact, of that I informed the printer; but despite of that notice, he has put them in. Sir, it is time some step were taken to know what is to go into our official reports. Is every side-bar, or undertone remark which may be made here, to be inserted? Shall I find published to-morrow morning, with these few desultory remarks of mine, statements of that or any other Senator disrespectful, contradictory, abusive, or anything else? Shall any Senator go to-night to the official reporter, and tell him that during my remarks he said so and so, which would have been the grossest indignity and insult to me? Is what he so tells the reporter he said, to be printed with my remarks, not by mistake, but after they have been stricken out and obliterated by me, and their publication positively forbidden? Is he to publish them under such circumstances? The Senator from Massachusetts can alter his own speeches, but cannot touch mine.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I do not undertake to determine the proper rule for the reporters, but I content myself with simply repeating that the remarks in question were made by me substantially as reported. On calling upon the reporter with the notes of the speech delivered by me in the Senate on that day, he read to me, at my request, the remarks of the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] so far as they especially related to me, and also my interruptions of those remarks. I had not supposed that anything from me during the speech of the Senator from Indiana would find a place in the report; but the reporter himself kindly volunteered to say that he had, in his report, notes of something that I said during the speech of that Senator. "Read them, then," said I. He did so. The first was the exclamation "Never! never!" in reply to one of the charges of the Senator. The second was still another and larger interruption, which being read, I said to the reporter, "These remarks were made from my seat, and I did not suppose that they reached your ear. The latter remark is not taken down precisely as it fell from me. It was substantially as follows." And with his pencil he wrote down what I then said, and I left him. That is the last I saw of the reporter in connection with this affair. I did not see the remarks in print until I read them in the Globe, nor did I express to the reporter or printer any further request with reference to them. The Senator says he told the printer not to publish them; and that, notwithstanding this injunction, they afterwards appeared. Of that I know nothing. With regard to all else that has fallen from the Senator from Indiana, I have nothing to say.

SURVEYS IN ALABAMA.

The joint resolution of the House of Representatives directing the connection of the public surveys in Alabama with the boundary line between the State of Alabama and Florida, was read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I ask the Senate to consider that joint resolution now. It is to permit a small survey in my State, to connect with the Florida line, which cannot now be done, because there is no surveyor general in my State. The bill was prepared by the Department, and passed the House without opposition. I do not think it will be necessary to refer it.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

It proposes to resolve that the connection of the public surveys in Alabama with the boundary line of the States of Alabama and Florida, shall be made under the direction of the General Land Office, and shall be executed as early as practicable.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKEAN, Chief Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills:

A bill confirming certain land claims in Louisiana, in the Bastrop grant;

A bill to reimburse the Common Council of the city of New York, for expenditures made for the first regiment of New York volunteers;

A bill for the relief of Priscilla C. Simonds;

A bill for the relief of Zadoc C. Inghram;
A bill for the relief of Llewellyn Washington;
and
A bill for the relief of Moses Olmstead.

RAILROAD IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. STUART. I move to dispense with the prior orders, in order to take up the bill from the House of Representatives "to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad therein." The Delegate from that Territory is exceedingly anxious that the bill should be disposed of, in order that the interests of that Territory may not suffer.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Dixon] had the floor yesterday upon another subject, and he came here then prepared to speak, but, in deference to what seemed to be the wish of a majority of the Senate, he generously yielded the floor. I submit to the honorable Senator from Michigan now that it would be unjust to impose on that Senator another postponement to-day. I think courtesy to him, as well as the usual form of transacting the business of the Senate, requires that we should take up the unfinished business, and hear him on that subject. I hope, therefore, the Senate will not take up this bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to offer a resolution which can take but a moment, and I ask the consent of the Senator from Michigan to allow me to submit it.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. The consideration of this bill will not take as much time as the reading of that resolution, I care not what it is. This bill, or one similar to it, passed the Senate some time ago, and was sent to the House. The House has passed the same bill with a slight amendment, as a House bill, and sent it to us. It will not consume five seconds, unless there be objection to it, and I do not think there can be objection, because we have passed twenty bills of the same character at this session. I hope the Senate will take up and pass the bill.

Mr. CLAYTON. During the morning business, resolutions are in order, and, therefore, I submit that the resolution which I wish to offer ought to have priority. I have no objection at all to taking up the Senator's bill.

Mr. STUART. If the Senator will allow the bill to be taken up, I will consent, with great pleasure, that his resolution shall then be disposed of.

The motion of Mr. STUART was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GEYER. I think it is unnecessary to consume the time of the Senate in reading the bill, for it is in the usual form.

Mr. STUART. It is in the usual form of all the railroad bills which have been passed at this session.

Mr. BAYARD. I prefer to have the bill read. It certainly is not in the same form as the other bills which the Senate have passed. These only allowed lands nine miles back from the line of the road to be taken, but this, I understand, allows a selection at any distance.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. No, sir, only fifteen miles back.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

Its object is to aid in the construction of a railroad from the southern line of the Territory of Minnesota, commencing at a point between township ranges nine and seventeen, by way of St. Paul, to the eastern line of the Territory, in the direction of Lake Superior. For this purpose it proposes to grant to the Territory every alternate section of public land, designated by odd numbers, for six sections in width, on each side of the road. If, when the route is definitely fixed, it shall appear that the United States have sold any section, or part of a section thus granted, or that the right of preemption has attached to it, the proper territorial authorities may select, in alternate sections, nearest to the tier of sections granted, but within fifteen miles from the road line, lands equal to those sold, and to which preemption rights have attached. The lands granted are to be exclusively applied in the construction of the road designated, and are to be disposed of only as the road progresses. All lands along the route heretofore reserved to the United States by competent authority, are exempted from the operation of the bill, except that the right of way is granted over such lands where it may be necessary.

The lands reserved to the United States within six miles of each side of the road, are not to be sold for less than double the minimum price, nor are they to be subject to private entry until first offered at public sale at the increased price. The lands granted are to be subject to the disposal of the Territorial Legislature, for the purpose of aiding in the construction of the road, and are not to inure to the benefit of any company heretofore organized. The railroad when built is to be a public highway for the use of the United States Government, free from toll or charge on the transportation of any property or troops of the United States. The United States mail is to be transported over it at such price as Congress may direct, but until the price is fixed by law, the Postmaster General is to determine it.

No title is to vest in the Territory of Minnesota, nor is any patent to issue, for the lands granted, until a continuous length of twenty miles of road shall be completed through the lands granted. Then a patent shall issue for a quantity of land not exceeding one hundred and twenty sections, included within a continuous length of twenty miles, and so on at the completion of each additional twenty miles; but if the road be not completed within ten years, no further sale is to be made, and the land unsold is to revert to the United States.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment; ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. BADGER. I call for the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT. It is the petition of men of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for the repeal of the fugitive slave law. The pending question is on the motion made to refer the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOUSTON. I wish to forward business as much as is within the compass of my power; and presuming that next Saturday will be a leisure day as we have been in the habit of adjourning over Saturday, I desire to give notice that I will on that day, in my place, make a personal explanation. I make the announcement in order that the Senate may, if it pleases, not adjourn over that day.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair. The floor was assigned to me upon the bill which has been vetoed by the President of the United States, at some time last week, I believe before this petition from men of Boston was presented. I wish to know whether this petition has precedence of that bill?

The PRESIDENT. This petition takes precedence during the morning hour.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I do not wish to throw any obstruction in the way of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, but I desire to say to him, and to the Senate, that I should like to have twenty minutes before we adjourn, to make a few remarks on the bill which has been vetoed. I desire to leave town to-morrow, and I should like to make those remarks to-day. Any time before or after three or four o'clock will suit me.

Mr. DIXON proceeded to address the Senate upon the subject-matter of the petition. [A report of his speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. CLAYTON. I propose that by unanimous consent this subject be now passed over until to-morrow. If that be done, I desire to submit a proposition to take up Senate bill No. 316, which will occupy the attention of the body but a very short time.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that the Senator will move that it lie upon the table.

Mr. CLAYTON. I have no objection to that. Mr. GWIN. I move then that it lie on the table; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays. I want to stop the debate altogether.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no.

Mr. GWIN. My object is to stop the debate which will lead to no practical result.

Mr. SUMNER. I rise to a question of order. I ask whether it is in order, when a motion to refer a memorial is before the Senate, to move that that memorial lie on the table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART in the chair.) Undoubtedly it is in order to submit such a motion at any time. It is a privileged question.

Mr. SLIDELL. I hope that the Senator from California will withdraw his motion. I trust that there will be no more debate upon the question. But by making his motion now, he will place a number of us in a very false position. I am decidedly in favor of the reference—

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDING OFFICER. This question is not debatable.

Mr. GWIN. I desire to say why I make the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator, then, to withdraw his motion.

Mr. GWIN. I withdraw my motion, then, for a moment.

I desire to give the reason why I made the motion that it lie upon the table. I shall not go into its merits. I look upon the reference of the subject to the Committee on the Judiciary, for the purpose of taking into consideration the propriety of repealing that law, as being just like a proposition to refer to that committee the question of the propriety of dissolving the Union. We all know, that by the repeal of the fugitive slave law the Union will be dissolved. Now, Mr. President, we are—

Mr. BADGER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him? I wish merely to suggest to him that, before the subject-matter of the petition is disposed of, I desire to submit a few remarks to the Senate. I think it is due that that subject-matter should be considered.

Mr. GWIN. Then I will move to postpone its consideration until next Monday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Delaware has submitted a proposition that, by unanimous consent, the subject be postponed until to-morrow. Is there objection to it?

Mr. CLAYTON. I trust my proposition will be agreed to.

Mr. CHASE. I object.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I desire to inquire if the proposition offered by the honorable Senator from Delaware be taken up, and it leads to a debate, whether he will consent to let it go over for the purpose of taking up the special order—the indigent insane bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposition of the Senator from Delaware has been objected to, and therefore cannot be entertained.

Mr. BADGER. Then I move to postpone the further consideration of the question until to-morrow.

Mr. CHASE. I think, with great deference, that we had better proceed with this matter until it is disposed of. There are several Senators who desire to address the Senate upon it; and if we postpone it until to-morrow, it will take up a great part of the day, and may occupy a great portion of the time of the Senate for a week or more. I think it would be decidedly better to proceed with it to-day, and close the debate.

Mr. CLAYTON. The whole of this debate is out of order. It interferes with the fixed order of the Senate. The Senate was proceeding with the regular debate on the special order, when upon the mere presentation of a memorial, there sprung up a debate which would usually be parliamentary in the morning hour; but it has been protracted until it has interfered with the special order. On that ground I hope the motion to postpone will prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on postponing the further consideration of the subject until to-morrow.

Mr. MALLORY. I should regret to see that motion prevail. I think undue importance has already been given to this petition; and by postponing it from day to day we are but adding to that importance. I think the deliberate judgment of the Senate is in favor of the reference. I have no doubt that, if the question could be taken now, or had been taken at any time since the submission of that petition, it would have been decided in favor of the reference. I have no doubt it could be done now. I have no doubt that is the sense of the Senate. I do not, therefore, see that any necessity exists for debating the subject from day to day. I should exceedingly regret its postponement until to-morrow.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

33D CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JUNE 29, 1854.

NEW SERIES...No. 98.

Mr. ADAMS. This is business which belongs to the morning hour. The morning hour has expired. I am opposed to its interfering with any other business; and I therefore insist upon the special order.

Mr. ROCKWELL. I do not design, on the question of the reference of the petition, to address the Senate again. Remarks have been made in relation to the fugitive act, for the repeal of which the petition prays; but I do not desire now to reply to honorable Senators who have made them. I think the petition should be referred without going into a discussion on that law now. It seems to me that the more proper time for that would be when the report is made. I hope, therefore, the petition will be referred without a postponement.

Mr. SUMNER. I am unwilling to stand in the way of the general desire of the Senate to go on with its business. I desire, at all times, to promote its business; but this question has been presented and debated. Several Senators have already expressed themselves on it. Other Senators within my knowledge desire to be heard. I claim, sir, the privilege of being heard again in reply to remarks which have fallen from honorable Senators since I have addressed the Senate. I hope, therefore, the petition will have no disposition that will preclude its complete discussion.

Mr. BUTLER. I hope that the discussion will go on now, and I believe we shall save time by doing so. I should certainly think it unfair to the honorable Senator, if any current opinion should go out without, at least, giving him the privilege of making the remarks of which he has given us notice. I hope the discussion will go on now.

Mr. CLAYTON. I desire to raise a point of order. I wish to know whether, when any Senator rises here and presents a petition in the morning hour, he can get up a discussion that shall interfere with the established, special order of the Senate? I maintain that the whole of this discussion, after the morning hour has passed, is out of order, and I make that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it is a question which is under the control of the Senate. It has been the usage when the end of the morning hour arrives, for such a discussion to go on, unless the Senate otherwise order it. It is a question entirely within the disposition of the majority of the Senate.

Mr. RUSK. I regret that this discussion has grown up at all. I am sorry that the motion of the honorable Senator from California, that it be ordered to lie upon the table, was not submitted at an earlier period. Whether the country will be much edified or not by the debate, I do not know; but I confess I have not been much edified by it. I shall vote against the postponement, for my deliberate judgment is that the longer you postpone it the more speaking you will have upon it; and, as a matter of saving of time, and so getting at the regular legitimate business of the Senate, I shall vote against postponing it.

The motion to postpone was not agreed to by a vote on a division—ayes 9, noes not counted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is now on referring the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MALLORY. Inasmuch as I have just expressed an opinion in favor of the reference to the committee, and in order that that expression of opinion may not be misunderstood, I will take the liberty of making a remark or two upon the subject. This discussion, Mr. President, originated in the presentation of a petition, purporting to be signed by certain men of Massachusetts, for the repeal of the fugitive slave law. Its terms are entirely respectful to the Senate. There is no objection to it that I know of in that respect. The manner in which it has been presented by the honorable Senator, on the other side of the Chamber, [Mr. ROCKWELL,] the manner in which its subject-matter was discussed by him, and in which the position of his State upon that subject was referred to, was in accordance with the reputation which preceded the gentleman here, and I doubt not commended itself to the respectful consideration of every member of this body. He said nothing calculated to awaken an undue excitement, nor to offend the self-respect of the North or South; and when he concluded his remarks, I was prepared, and I doubt not every Senator was prepared, to sustain the great right of petition in this respect. I still desire to sustain it; but, sir, such was not the effect produced by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts on this side of the Chamber, [Mr. SUMNER.] No, sir; when that honorable Senator here, in the face of the country, in the presence of this Senate, within these hallowed walls, which have so often responded to the eloquence and patriotism of his own State—when he at the foot of this altar, upon which he pledged his fidelity to his country, upon which he called upon God to witness that he would defend and sustain her Constitution—when he rises in his place and tells the American Senate that he does not recognize the obligation of that Constitution, what does he expect at the hands of the Senate?

Mr. SUMNER. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator places in my mouth words and sentiments which have never fallen from me.

Mr. MALLORY. I should be unwilling to place in the mouth of a dog sentiments which were unbecoming to him; and I will therefore ask the Senator, with all proper respect, to state what he did say, for that, I presume, is the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. SUMNER. I stated that I would never render any personal assistance in returning or reducing a fellow man to slavery.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President—

Mr. CLAY. I feel it due to truth, and due to justice, to speak on this occasion. I had not intended to interpose a word; I had intended to be silent and to permit this matter to rest; but, sir, when I hear the Senator from Massachusetts, with unblushing presumption and insolence, [Order,] without shame, without contrition or repentance, contumaciously repeating that he had said only that he would not reduce a fellow man to bondage—

Mr. SUMNER. Return.

Mr. CLAY. Return a fellow man to bondage—

Mr. SUMNER. Or reduce, which is the same thing.

Mr. CLAY. When I see him endeavoring to throw upon the reporter of the Senate (who, though I have not the pleasure of knowing him personally, I am bound to believe is an honorable man) the imputation of having misrepresented him, and misrepresented what he said—when I know honorable Senators around me, who have never shown themselves unworthy of their position, or recreant to their duty to themselves or their country—who have never shown themselves unwilling to vindicate their honor, and maintain the truth of their assertions—when I know that such men around me sustain me, and sustain that reporter, and sustain the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. PETTIT] in the charge which he made—I should feel that I was false to my trust and to my duty, and accessory to a suppression of the truth, if I did not rise to sustain them. Sir, if this report were not to go out to the country; if it were confined to the Halls of this Senate, I should not interpose, because I do not believe that that reporter's reputation would suffer in any conflict of veracity with the Senator from Massachusetts; but, as it will go abroad, where they are not both equally known, and where the Senator's accidental eminence here may give greater weight to his word than the position of the reporter of this body gives to him, I feel it due to that gentleman, as an honest and an honorable man, to say that his report is true. I paid special attention to what fell from the lips of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I now say that he never qualified that denial. I say, as the reporter said, that those words which I shall read are interpolated. And, sir, as to what I say, I call upon the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] the Senator who sits near me, and who propounded the interrogatory, [Mr. BUTLER,] the Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. SLIDELL,] who also sits near me, and the Senator from Texas, [Mr. RUSK,] who sat close by the Senator from Massachusetts—I appeal to all of them, honorable men, to state whether that reporter's own report was not correct, and the interpolation of the Senator from Massachusetts incorrect? Sir, this qualification of the Senator is a precious afterthought, hatched by many hours of incubation.

Mr. SUMNER. What qualification?

Mr. CLAY. The qualification which I shall read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in order for the Senator from Massachusetts, while sitting in his seat, to interrupt the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. CLAY. Here is the qualification. The Senator from South Carolina asked the Senator from Massachusetts whether, if the fugitive slave act were repealed, he would fulfill the obligation of his oath, and maintain and support the Constitution by returning, in conformity to its requirements, a fugitive slave. Here is the real answer, and I shall show what is the pretended answer. He said, "Does the Senator ask me what I would do?" and then answered, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" Now, sir, what was the question propounded? Whether he would maintain the Constitution, whether he would fulfill its provisions, if the fugitive slave act were repealed. What was his reply? "Does the Senator ask me what I would do?" "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" What was the inference, the universal inference of the Senate, from this denial? Why, that he would violate the Constitution; that he was willing to prove his desecration of this Senate Chamber with his tread and his pollution of the Holy Evangelists with his lips, by violating a solemn oath; that he was willing to commit moral perjury—a crime in the eyes of God and honorable men, as odious and as infamous as that legal perjury which would be visited with the penitentiary, or with branding of the letter "P" upon the hand or forehead. That was the inference, the legitimate inference? How does he endeavor to shirk it? How does he endeavor to avoid the just and condign sentence of condemnation visited upon him by every honorable mind in this Senate? Why, sir, by going to that reporter, and foisting into the report, words which he never uttered, materially qualifying his denial. And what are those words? I will now read them to the Senate: "Does the Senator ask me what I would do?" was his language; and his response, "Is thy servant a dog that he should do this thing?" Here, though, is what he placed in the report, and says that he said: "Does the honorable Senator ask me if I would personally join in sending a fellow-man into bondage?" I say those words were never uttered. I appeal to those honorable men, who sat near him, to say whether they were uttered. I do not believe he can find anybody here to sustain him, unless it be his confidant and uniform supporter, [Mr. CHASE,] who was suggesting to him responses, and who sits near him. If he said it, he spoke it sub rosa—in a whisper. I would rather believe, to make the best of it, that it was one of those mental reservations with which he took his oath; but I do not even believe that there was any mental reservation. He did utter, and he did mean what was charged by the Senators from South Carolina, [Mr. BUTLER,] from Virginia, [Mr. MASON,] and from Indiana, [Mr. PETTIT;] but after he found the indignation it invoked upon his head, and heard the denunciations hurled at him from every quarter, and saw the smile of scorn that played upon every face, he shrunk from the words he uttered, and endeavored to make an instrument of the reporter of this body to shield him from the infamy which he deserved.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President—

Mr. CLAY. Excuse me one moment. I am not in the habit of trespassing often on the Senate. Mr. President, I could go on and show that there is intrinsic evidence in this report to sustain the original report of the reporter; and what is it? Why, sir, that notwithstanding this qualified denial, the Senator from South Carolina treated it as a positive denial of the Senator from Massachusetts, that he would support the Constitution of the United States. Now, I ask, does any intelligent man believe, if the Senator had qualified that denial in the manner in which it appears now, that the Senator from South Carolina would still have maintained that he refused to obey his oath, that he had refused to sustain the Constitution? Does any one believe that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Mason] would have repeated the charge? Does any believe that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. Pettit] would also have repeated it? Certainly not. Then there is intrinsic evidence in the report itself that these words have been interpolated—that they were not uttered.

Now, Mr. President, I have a few more words to say which I utter with great diffidence, and with the profoundest deference to older Senators on this floor. We have no means of preventing these violations of the dignity and proprieties of the Senate. There is no penal statute which can reach a man who only avows his willingness to commit crime. But, let me ask, suppose a private citizen, however wealthy and well born, however highly cultivated his mind, however great his talents, or rich his acquirements, should openly avow a readiness to commit moral perjury; should day by day evince a disposition to instigate other men to crime, which, from want of personal courage he did not dare perpetrate himself; should daily encourage other men to violate the rights of his neighbors, to steal their property, to kidnap their slaves, and to refuse to return them; should daily assail the feelings of his neighbors by wanton, rude, and uncalled for assaults upon their characters, and, when rebuked for it in the harshest, most offensive, and opprobrious language, like the spaniel, should quietly submit or beg for quarter, but never repair the wrong or resent the insult—a sneaking, sinuous, snake-like poltroon, who would violate all the rights of associates or friends, and never make reparation or acknowledge his error, and who held himself irresponsible to all law, feeling the obligation neither of the Divine law, nor of the law of the land, nor of the law of honor: I ask you, how would such a miscreant be treated? Why, if you could not reach him with the arm of the municipal law, if you could not send him to the penitentiary, you would send him to Coventry. You would exclude him from the pale of society; you would neither extend to him the courtesies that are shown gentlemen, nor permit him to offer such to you. You would make him feel that he was shunned like a leper, and loathed like a filthy reptile; and you would soon render him as impotent for evil as he was disinclined for good. Such characters, though rare, may be found, and have been known. I can give, from memory, the general outlines of one portrayed by Mr. Dickens, in his novel, David Copperfield—that of Uriah Heap. Uriah was mean, yet affected honor; was malignant, yet feigned benevolence; presumptuous, yet pretended humility; instigated others to violence he dared not commit, yet assumed an air of meekness; suggested crimes and incited others to their commission, yet bore himself with studied amenity of manners, and choice expressions of benignity. We have such a character on this floor. I have suggested our means of rebuking, if we cannot silence him; of disabling, if we cannot disarm him. If we cannot check individual abuses, we may preserve the dignity of this body. If we cannot restrain or prevent this eternal warfare upon the feelings and rights of southern gentlemen, we may rob the serpent of his fangs. We can paralyze his influence by placing him in that nadir of social degradation which he merits. I am surprised, I repeat, I am surprised, that honorable men, but especially southern men, should so far forget their rights, and those of their constituents, and their duties to them, as well as to themselves, as to lend any countenance to such a character as I have portrayed.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, when I gave way to my friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] I had remarked that the Senator from Massachusetts, who sits near me, [Mr. SUMNER,] had here, in the face of the country, in the presence of the Senate, at the foot of that altar whereon he had pledged his fidelity to his country, and sworn to maintain and defend her Constitution, risen and disclaimed the obligations of the Constitution. I was interrupted by the Senator, who said that I had put words into his mouth which he did not utter. Sir, I deny it! I acknowledge that I heard the declaration with equal regret and indignation; and, as unwilling as I am to say anything which the rules of the Senate do not justify, or the occasion demand, I am still more unwilling to stand here and permit such language to pass without some note of condemnation. Sir, I heard the honorable Senator say, in open Senate, "I recognize no such obligation." Whether that appears in the report or not, I have not examined.

Mr. SUMNER. It is there, and I repeat it now.

Mr. MALLORY. Sir, if the Senator will examine the Constitution, he will find it there written that a fugitive from service or labor "shall be delivered up." If he recognizes no such obligation, I leave it to himself to explain the consistency between the oath which he has taken and the sentiments which he avows. Sir, if there be any principle in the breast of the American citizen which, more than any other, lies at the foundation of law, morals, and society, it is his habitual observance and recognition of all the sacred obligations of an oath; and this no man knows better than the Senator himself. As a lawyer, he knows that the humblest citizens in the courts of our country, daily recognize the sacred obligations of an oath. And no man knows better than himself that if there be a society in this country which adjures, or does not recognize this obligation, that society must inevitably be regarded as dangerous to the peace of the Union. Sir, can he rise in his place and say here that a Senator shall be permitted to make mental reservations? Is that the explanation? That he is at liberty to exempt himself from those obligations which bind the humblest citizen? Sir, without any disposition to allude to what the Senator has said elsewhere, I cannot but recollect that there was a gentleman in Boston who, upon a certain public occasion, apostrophised in this manner the President of the United States, who signed the fugitive slave law: "There are depths of infamy as there are heights of fame, and better for him had he never been born, better for his posterity had he never lived, than that he should have signed such an act." However vindictively and treasonably that may have been said, it can more properly be applied to the man who approaches such an altar as this is, in such a presence as this, and say he does not recognize, under the Constitution, his obligation to return or deliver up fugitive slaves. I do not speak now in his individual capacity as a citizen, but as a legislator standing in these Halls to whom the American people look at least for truth, if not for guidance.

Mr. SUMNER here addressed the Senate at length. His speech, withheld for revision, will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I do not wish to anticipate my friend from South Carolina; for it is properly his province to respond to most that has fallen from the Senator from Massachusetts. I cannot forbear, however, making two remarks in response to the Senator. He has put the question, whether any Senator upon this floor would assist in returning a fugitive slave? No response was made to the interrogatory; and lest he should herald it to the world that there was no Senator upon this floor who had the moral courage to say "aye" in response to the interrogatory, I tell him that I would do it.

Mr. SUMNER. Then let the Senator say the immoral courage.

Mr. CLAY. I will respond to that, sir. There is an old adage which is approved, I believe, by the reason of all honorable men, that "the receiver is as bad as the thief." The Senator from Massachusetts may not recognize the truth of that adage; I do; and inasmuch as I would not steal a slave, neither would I receive him and withhold him from the owner. That much I have to say in reply to his remark. But there is another thing to which I wish to call the attention of the Senate; and I do so in order to forewarn them against further altering of the records of the Senate. I do so to admonish them to watch narrowly tomorrow, and see what other interpolations are made to change the sense of what has been spoken to-day. I make no objections to amendments of form, where the meaning is not substantially altered. The Senator, with that cunning which characterizes those animals who are deficient in courage, but to whom nature, in her kindness, has given some compensation for the want of that nobler attribute, has shirked the issue which was presented him. He was charged by the Senator from Indiana with having interpolated and falsified the reports of this House. That charge was repeated by the Senator from Florida. He denied it then; but I rose to my feet and called upon honorable Senators who were sitting around me, and upon every Senator on this floor, to sustain the reporter, and to establish the falsehood of the interpolation. That was the charge. He has shirked it, and, by his silence, has acknowledged, I think, the justice of the imputation.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, if it be supposed by the Senate, or by the Senator from Massachusetts, that I shall indulge in any excited remarks, it will be a very great mistake. I think I never had a heart that could use a pen to write a libel, especially in matters involving truth and justice. Whatever I do say may be tinged and toned by the effusion of the moment; and the Senator himself will see, before I conclude, that I have been rather too good-natured for his purposes. He may think that I shall imitate him in sectional retaliation. Under the great storm which he has attempted to excite, he shall not escape under a panoply that he has no right to use.

Sir, I will say gravely, in the beginning of my remarks—and the Senator will have to take it as I assert it—that every thing which he has said for effect in Massachusetts has been upon a false issue made by himself, and not authorized by the facts. I do not know but that I might make the proposition more unqualified, and say that, in every issue upon which he has chosen to go to the country in regard to the topics involved in this debate, he has made an issue for his own purposes, without the authority of facts, and in perversion of them. But, sir, as the Senator assumes somewhat to speak as the organ of history, I will refute him in the estimation of every Senator here, and every page, and every individual who hears me.

Mr. BADGER. I will ask my friend from South Carolina whether it would not be better for him to allow us now to adjourn?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I would not subject myself to the temptation of preparing a reply that might have something in it that, like a hyena, I was scratching at the graves in Massachusetts to take revenge for the elaborate and vindictive assault that has been made by the gentleman who has just spoken. I prefer to go on now, trusting to recognized truth, rather than to consult musty records, for the purpose of producing effects that might be inconsistent with justice. I say, sir, that every issue upon which the Senator has chosen to go to the country by the remarks which he has submitted to the Senate, is not founded on the facts assumed by him. The facts assumed by himself are, as I shall show, unfair in statement; and his denials of the statement made by myself, in the speech to which he has alluded, are palpably against the truth of history. In what he has said he has aimed a shaft more to offend than it can hurt. He has been guilty of historical perversion. Sir, I made a remark the other day, and I thought truly, as matter of history, that the independence of America was won by the arms and treasure of slaveholding States. This remark is historically true. The sectional separation indicated by the gentleman was not in my mind—his own has made it. When the Declaration of Independence was made, was not Connecticut a slaveholding State?

Mr. SUMNER. Not in any just sense.

Mr. BUTLER. Sir, you are not the judge of that. Was not New York a slaveholding State?

Mr. SUMNER. Let the Senator from New York answer.

Mr. BUTLER. Sir, if he answers, he will answer the truth, and perhaps it might not be exactly agreeable to you. Was not New Jersey a slaveholding State? Was not Rhode Island, that sent Greene to South Carolina, a slaveholding State?

Mr. SEWARD. It is due to the honorable Senator from South Carolina that I should answer his question in reference to New York, since it has been referred to me. At the time of the Revolution, every sixteenth man in the State of New York was a slave.

Mr. BUTLER. The Senator from New York is right.

Mr. SEWARD. I am sorry for it.

Mr. BUTLER. Sir, I shall put the interrogatory in such a way that the Senator from Massachusetts will be ashamed of his historical proposition. I intend to make it so palpable that he cannot undertake to throw derision on me for the statement which I have made. I continue: Was not New Hampshire a slaveholding State? Was not Pennsylvania a slaveholding State? Was not Delaware a slaveholding State? Was not Maryland a slaveholding State? Was not Virginia a slaveholding State? Was not North Carolina a slaveholding State? Was not Georgia a slaveholding State? So far as it regards the relation of master and slave, were they not as much so as South Carolina, the State selected for the gentleman's prepared attack.

Mr. SEWARD. I am requested to make my answer a little more accurate, according to the truth. I understand that, at the time of the Revolution, every twelfth man in New York was a slave.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not care about the proportion; I do not think that at all important. But were not the States which I have named slaveholding States at the time of the Declaration of Independence? History can recognize no distinction between them. In the progress of events changes have taken place; this progress may go on, and greater changes may take place. These will afford no excuse for denying the irrevocable certainty of the past. They can afford no refuge for historical falsehood such as the gentleman has committed in the fallacy of his sectional vision. I have shown that twelve of the original States were slaveholding communities. Now, sir, I prove that the thirteenth, Massachusetts, was a slaveholding State before, and at the commencement of, the Revolution. But why talk of proving what no one can deny? The gentleman cannot deny the fact. As to the character of slavery in that State, that may be somewhat a different thing, which cannot contradict the fact stated in the newspapers of the day, that negroes were held, were advertised for sale, with another truth, that many were sent to other slaveholding States in the way of traffic. When slavery was abolished, many that had been slaves, and might have been freemen, were sold into bondage, with the consideration in the pocket to afford a supply to the philanthropy of the vendor. I have said that the independence of America was achieved by the arms and treasure of slaveholding States. I will never, in a parliamentary sense, be personal; but I say that I convict him of historical falsehood. Dare you, sir, look me in the face and deny it?

Mr. SUMNER. Deny what?

Mr. BUTLER. That independence was won by the arms and treasure of slaveholding States?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The Senator must address the Chair.

Mr. BUTLER. He cannot and dare not deny it.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir, because I want to hear what you can say on that subject.

Mr. SUMNER. What I can say is very easily said, and, I think, is very decisive. When, in our history, we speak of slaveholding States, we mean those in which slavery has been an established policy, and professedly an essential element in their civilization. This, I believe, is common, if not universal. Of such I spoke when I spoke of slaveholding States—such as were regarded as slaveholding States at the adoption of the Constitution—which, in those days, were called southern States, in contrast to the northern States, sometimes called the non-slaveholding States. By slaveholding States, of course I mean States which were peculiarly, distinctively, essentially slaveholding, and not States in which the holding of slaves seems to have been rather the accident of the hour, and in which all the people, or the greater part of the people, were ready to welcome emancipation.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, I think the remarks of the Senator verify exactly what I said, that when he chooses to be rhetorical it is upon an assumption of facts, upon his own construction, and by an accumulation of adjectives. I quit that part of the subject, for it is too palpable to need argument, and leave it to the country to say what shadow of truth has the gentleman to cover him in saying that I had made a remark betraying an ignorance of the subject, or one made in irony? Upon this remark of mine, thus characterized by him, the gentleman has poured out what he would have us regard as rebuking invective.

I again repeat, that the independence of America was won by the arms and treasure of slaveholding States.

Sir, he made the assertion with a view to assail South Carolina. That was his object. He did it with a view to assail a State in which, I may say, whatever have been her distractions and difficulties, there is scarcely a stream or a path that was not sprinkled with the blood of men contending for the liberties of the country. Does he suppose that I can be required to defend South Carolina, or can be provoked into an attack on Massachusetts by anything that he—he—can say of South Carolina? No, sir; I never made the attack on Massachusetts imputed to me; but he has assumed that I did so, with a view to make his speech, exactly as he assumed the other day that I asked him a question which I never asked, as I will prove when I come to it. He assumed that I asked him a question which I did not put. It is a matter in regard to which I should have said nothing, but for the display which he has made to-day.

I never asked him the question which, it now appears, he assumed to answer the other day. But he had in his drawer, with his fingers fixed on it, his reply, and he drew it out without exactly knowing what I had said. I give him credit for that; I believe he did not know what I asked; and just in the same way now he has undertaken to assume that I assailed Massachusetts. I said not a single word in regard to Massachusetts, in the way of censure on her history. God knows, as I would say if I stood before his tribunal now to be judged, the Senator could not provoke me to it. An illustrious predecessor of the Senator, [Mr. Webster],—I will not institute a comparison, much less a contrast between them—once said: "Massachusetts needs no eulogy; there she stands; she speaks for herself." I may add, that she will borrow nothing from the Senator's rhetoric. No, sir; the pages of her history have been written, and I shall read them, and let the northern audience hear them. I shall read them with pride, with pleasure, and here acknowledge that I have been inspired by the lessons of her thrilling annals, and have been animated by the examples of her illustrious men. And in that history I did not look for materials of a libel on her true character. Do not suppose for a moment that I could not find pages for censure. No, sir; as I would think of Hancock and Laurens I will think of Massachusetts and South Carolina, as they were. The very first mission, as I have learned from a respectable source, that was sent for aid in counsel and treasure, came from Boston to Charleston. It came from a Colony that had taken the step in the Revolution that would have led to her destruction but for the aid of the now denounced slaveholding State, and from the libelled State of South Carolina. The communications then were between communities on whose soils had been fought the first battles of the Revolution—between the men of Bunker Hill, and the men of Sullivan's Island.

But, sir, do you suppose that I shall be provoked into an assault upon Massachusetts? No, sir; Massachusetts and Boston, so far as I can see, have done their duty, and stand vindicated before the Confederacy, in spite of their misrepresenting advocate. Sir, what I said to the gentleman was not to him as the Representative of the people of Massachusetts, either as they were or as they are. I did not magnify him into the Representative of Massachusetts. In assailing the small target at which I shot, I never assumed that I was going to make an assault upon the gravity, the dignity, and the historical reputation of Massachusetts. He has thought proper, however, to turn round, and, by his miserable shifts, to dig up, in the last night, I suppose, by the aid of jackals and hunters—worse than slave-hunters, men whose malice would lead them to do anything—musty records, in order to distort and misrepresent history; and he expects me to-day, in a moment, to answer his libel. I can refute, and might denounce it. I shall trust to transient indignation.

Sir, in what I said the other day, and in what I have said at all times, I never instituted the comparison which the Senator has chosen to make. In the rather playful remarks which I made in reference to Massachusetts some time ago, to which the Senator has referred, I said that Massachusetts, like South Carolina, and all the other States, had undergone a material change of opinion on the subject of slavery; for at one time, as I showed, there was a statute in Massachusetts—illustrating opinion, I did not mention it by way of reproach—providing for whipping every negro who returned there. Now, in their philanthropy, they are so much better off that, instead of their whipping negroes, they invite them there, with a view, I suppose, to exhibit this wonderful spirit of liberty called "a spirit of resistance to the Stamp Act"—for the purpose that I referred to the tolees quotes statute, as I termed it, under which a colored man going into Massachusetts was liable to be whipped as often as he did go there from another State—I had a right to do so. It was to show that Massachusetts had very little sympathy then for the negro race. It was to show the state of opinion that existed then. The truth is, Massachusetts at one time had the same opinions as other States in relation to the colored race. When she owned them, she used them as slaves.

Well, sir, the Senator has said that Massachusetts was not a slaveholding State at the time her distinguished heroes, statesmen, and poets illustrated her history. I might say now of the Senator and his confrères, that, like some of the degenerate poets of Rome and Greece, they could praise Marathon, Thermopylae, and Salamis, but they never lived in a period when they were capable of the achievements of those whom they attempted to praise. I distinguish between the ripe orator, who is proud of the reputation of his State, and the vapid rhetorician. The gentleman has indulged himself in a tone of indignation in response to me, for saying that Massachusetts was once a slaveholding community. Nay, more; he has denounced me for my ignorance on the subject; and he seems specially to think that the laurels and honors of Hancock, Warren, and the Adamses, will be tarnished by anything that can be said of them, even by attribution, in connection with the character or relation of a slaveholding people. Why, sir, if he had made true that these great men did not live in slaveholding Massachusetts, would he have it supposed that, on that account, they would have claimed a superiority to their equally illustrious compeers? But let the gentleman take the truth, that these great men, with names illustrating a common history, were born and bred in a slaveholding community, and that they were as good as others born since.

Is it not now apparent that the gentleman has selected his own positions, and has erected his batteries for the discharge of his sectional cannon on grounds denied to him by truth? Has he not falsified history to make his production the vehicle of his designs? Has he not denied what I stated, and what all must admit is true? And for what purpose?—to take aim at South Carolina, from a rest. It is like the concealed archer, who shot at the star because he had his arrow aimed at it.

Here there are two propositions in which I have refuted him upon the moment, without looking back through musty records to find out all these things which are to be hunted up. No doubt his editors had them already prepared to throw out his speech upon Massachusetts to inflame the public mind. I know, sir, he said the other day that all he said was the effusion of an impulsive heart; but it was the effusion of his drawer. Talk to me about the effusions of the heart! What kind of effusions are those which escape from tables—from papers—played like cards sorted for the purpose? They are weapons prepared by contribution, and discharged in this body, with a view of gratifying the feelings of resentment and malice; with a view of wounding the pride of the State which I represent, and through her to stab the reputation of the other southern States. But, sir, we are above the dangers of open combat, and cannot be hurt by the assaults even of attempted assassination.

Sir, it is a sore thing to the gentleman that I will not attack Massachusetts. It is what he wanted. It is what he has asserted. I have never assailed her. She is doing her duty now, as far as I know. All that I did say was, that if the exaggerated feelings of which the Senator was, I thought, the vapid rhetorical advocate, did prevail generally, it would make up an issue, which we had to meet, of the separation of these States. Since I spoke I have had put in my hands, a document which entirely refutes the statements of the gentleman so elaborately prepared. It is, in my judgment, one of the ablest productions of the times, and has every guarantee of accuracy. It comes from one who loves truth, and pursues it in the spirit of fairness. It is a pamphlet published by a citizen of Virginia, Mr. Garnet. I take the liberty of appending extracts from it, as a note to my remarks.*

I have now gone over the two issues upon which the Senator has spoken, and they are both false.

Now, sir, a few words in reference to the affair of Mr. Hoar, in Charleston; and I am sorry that it has been brought up again. Mr. Hoar did go to Charleston, with a view to interfere with a law which had been passed by South Carolina in reference to colored seamen. Here let me say that that law would never have been passed by South Carolina, but for the excited fanatical feeling of some portion of the northern States; I will not say Massachusetts particularly; I will guard myself in that respect. But, sir, I say that that law, to which the Senator has referred, and which he has reprobated with so much violence, was passed to guard against the very feelings which he would excite; to guard against the incendiary who would come and burn your dwelling in the night, and not act like the man in a fair fight, who would advertise you that he would meet you in an open field.

*"We shall not dwell upon the revolutionary struggle, though it might easily be shown that the South bore more than her proportional share, both in its expenses and its battles. The white male population over sixteen years of age in 1790, was about the same in Pennsylvania and Virginia; the former being 110,788, and the latter 110,924; yet according to General Knox's official estimate, presented to the First Congress, Virginia furnished 56,721 soldiers to the Revolution, and Pennsylvania only 34,965. New Hampshire had a military population 513 larger than South Carolina, yet she contributed only 14,906 soldiers to South Carolina's 31,131; not half. The latter quota in fact is nearly equal to Pennsylvania's, who had triple the military population, and twice the whole population, free and slave. It exceeded New York's 29,836, though New York had much more than double the military population, and forty per cent. more of total population. Connecticut and Massachusetts did more than any of the free States in that great war; yet we find that while South Carolina sent to its armies thirty-seven out of every forty-two citizens, capable of bearing arms, Massachusetts sent but thirty-two, Connecticut thirty, and New Hampshire not eighteen! And it must be remembered that, as General Knox says, 'in some years of the greatest exertions of the southern States, there are no returns whatever of their militia,' while at the North every man was entered on the rolls, as the pension list too plainly shows; that while the war assumed a regular character there, it was here brought home to every fire-side, and there was scarcely a man who did not shoulder his musket, even though not regularly in the field. The slave States not only fought their own battles nearly unaided, but sent numerous troops to the defense of the North; and when we consider that the free States had the protection of almost the whole regular Army, and the benefit of its large disbursements, while the South was left to be scourged by the enemy, and that the almost utter ruin of the incomes and private fortunes of her citizens far exceeded any amount of taxation ever levied, we cannot doubt that her sufferings in the great cause were far heavier than those of the North. But we will not pause to consider any inequality of revolutionary burdens; if the South bore more than her share, it was voluntary—a free will offering on the altar of independence. We will pass at once to consider the action of the Federal Government, and its value to the North when the South was no longer her own mistress.

"The pension system throws a strong light on the tendency of the people of the free States to quarter themselves on the General Government, at the same time that it shows the usual progressive inequality of expenditures between the two sections. A calculation, founded on data in 307 Senate Document, 1838-'9, shows that from 1791 to 1838 inclusive, $35,598,964 had been paid for revolutionary pensions, of which the North received $28,262,597, or $127.29 for every soldier she had in the war, and the South $7,336,367, being only $49.89 for each of her soldiers. The number of soldiers is here estimated according to Knox's report, which confessedly does not show, by a great deal, the full exertions of the South in raising troops. Let us then compare the amounts received with the white population of each section in 1790, and we find the free States in 1838 had received $14.35 of revolutionary pensions for every soul in their limits in the former year, while the South had received only $5.61 for every white. But the military efforts of the slaveholding States were fully in proportion to their whole population, for the labor of the slaves on the plantations left a much larger proportion of their masters free to take up arms. On this supposition, the southern soldier received only $3.74 for the same revolu-

But for the intrusive interference of those whose conduct gave rise to the law, it would, I am sure, long since have been modified. I have not hesitated to give that as my opinion whenever consulted. I think it may be modified, and if the State should be left to her own counsels—free to do as she may think proper—with no threatening foreign influence exerted upon her, she will do justice to herself and others. But depend upon it, such remarks as those which have been made by the gentleman will exert nothing but a baleful influence. Allow me now to mention a fact to which I referred once before on this floor, when a predecessor of the Senator [Mr. Winthrop] undertook to arraign the same law. That gentleman brought it up upon the case of Captain Ranlet. Now, what was the case of Captain Ranlet? Yes, sir, the grievous operation of that law was brought to the view of this Senate, by a pathetic and an elaborately prepared letter of Captain Ranlet, written to a Senator from Massachusetts, a gentleman for whom I had, by the by, a high respect.

That letter may be well referred to as a specimen of paper philanthropy, and as a fair illustration between conduct and sentiment. That letter disclosed what was supposed a flagrant and crying oppression—the South Carolina law. It disclosed circumstances like these: that Captain Ranlet, with his crew, were themselves in distress; but obtaining some temporary relief, they had an opportunity of going to the relief of another vessel; and not being indifferent to the temptations of gain, they acquired a right to salvage, and went into the city of Charleston to secure it. Well, sir, what took place? Two colored seamen were temporarily imprisoned, under a municipal law. Now, sir, what do you think this captain did? Instead of relieving his men by paying two or three dollars, he went to Boston to agitate, and to write pathetic tionary services which brought the northern $14.35. This gross inequality remains the same, by whatever test it is tried. For example:

The seven free States contributed to the expenses of the war.....	$81,971,170
And had received in pensions, in 1838.....	28,262,597

Balance in their favor.....	$53,708,573
-----------------------------	--------------

The six slave States contributed.....	$2,438,123
And had received, in 1838.....	7,336,367

Balance in their favor.....	$45,101,756
-----------------------------	--------------

Now, let us see how it stands with single States:

Virginia contributed.....	$19,085,982	ratio as $100
And received in pensions to 1838.....	1,969,534	to 10.3.
Massachusetts contributed.....	17,964,613	ratio as $100
And received in the same time.....	4,058,031	to 22.8.
South Carolina contributed.....	11,523,299	ratio as $100
And received in the same time.....	431,141	to 3.5.
New York contributed.....	7,179,983	ratio as $100
And received in the same time.....	7,850,054	to 109.3.

"To appreciate this injustice fully, we must remember that the South, not only paid into the Federal Treasury all she ever received back in pensions, but also $16,663,653 of the pensions given to the North. The inequality of the apportionment of these revolutionary pensions has grown with the northern majority in Congress. In the first decennial period, 1791-1800, the free States received annually $53,000 more than the South. In the next period, this yearly excess was diminished to $43,000, but it rose to $339,000 in the third period. From 1821 to 1830 it averaged $799,000, and from 1831 to 1838, $855,000. In like manner grew the burden upon the South in paying the pensioners at the North, besides those at home. In the first period it was $417,449; in the second, $370,000; in the third, $3,000,000; in the fourth, $7,500,000; and in the last period, (of only eight years,) $9,750,000.

"According to General Knox's report, the North sent to the Army one hundred men for every two hundred and twenty seven of military age in 1790, and the South one hundred for every two hundred and nine. But in 1848, one out of every sixty-two of the men of military age in 1790 was a revolutionary pensioner in the North, and only one out of one hundred and ten in the South. New England alone then had three thousand one hundred and forty-six of these pensioners, more than there were in all the slave States; and New York two thirds as many, though she contributed not one seventh as much to the war.

"The results are equally remarkable, if we have regard to the whole number of pensions, revolutionary and other. The expenses under this head, for the four years ending in 1837, were $8,010,051 in the free States, and $2,588,101 in the slave States, who not only paid their own share, but $6,300,000 to the North. New England alone received $3,924,911, rather more than two dollars a head for every man, woman, and child in her limits. During the same four years she paid in taxes to the Federal Treasury, according to our tables, $1.72 per head, so that she actually received more in pensions than she paid in taxes! In 1840 there were not quite two and a half times as many pensioners at the North as at the South, but in 1848 there were more than three times as many. New England had more revolutionary pensioners than the five old plantation States had pensioners of all kinds."

letters to his Senator. He did not wish that such as the Senator near me should have a monopoly in the professions of liberty, and declamation on philanthropy. I believe the history of the matter is, that some gentleman in Charleston released the sailors, leaving the captain to furnish the materials of such a speech as the gentleman has made, joining in the work rhetoric. I am afraid the business is running down. If the law should be repealed, we may never have another reference to the Hoar case again. This is more than the fourth time that it has been referred to. The law had to remain as a speech-making stimulant.

The gentleman has spoken of Mr. Hoar being expelled by a mob. Sir, there was no mob. Mr. Hoar was informed by a committee of gentlemen that it was desirable he should not continue in Charleston, with an intimation that any portion of his family with him would be treated even as guests, if they choose to remain.

But, sir, these are matters apart from the subject. I am very sorry that I have been provoked into this discussion. It is against my feelings that I partake in it at all, but now I will come to the most specific charge in the indictment against me.

It is not my wish or purpose, while I am a member of the body, to charge intentional falsehood made on any issue by a gentleman who represents a sovereign State, but so far as regards the remarks made the other day, I am bound to make a statement which I think justice demands, and let it go for what it is worth. The Senator will have to take it as I make it. I should not say a word about it if he had not gone back into the graves of South Carolina. He deserves no quarter, and perhaps I should give him none. The other Senator from Massachusetts will perhaps have to listen to what I am to say, and I think the Senator will have, in some measure, by its opinion at least, to hear testimony to the truth of what I do say. How far it may effect the Senator I know not. I was speaking the other day in regard to the petition praying for the repeal of the fugitive slave law which had been introduced, and had given rise to so much excitement. I said that originally I was rather opposed to such a law, believing that, if the Constitution, with its self-sufficing energy and powers was left to execute itself, the States themselves as parties to the compact ought to perform under that compact, the duty of returning to the master a fugitive slave, or of delivering him up, to use the language of the Constitution. Such was my belief, and believing that, I thought it was unavoidable for Congress to do anything until we saw that the States themselves would not act. We found in many instances that the States not only refused, but threw obstructions in the way. They not only did not afford the usual assistance in apprehending a runaway slave, they in many instances not only refused assistance, but interposed actual statutory opposition to the law. In doing so they took apology from the case of Prigg, vs. the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and to that extent they had some excuse.

I said that this memorial was likely to be referred to the committee of which I was chairman, and it was a subject upon which I had great difficulties. I said that the fugitive slave law had never had a great deal of my confidence; but that, before I could undertake to say what ought to be done, in relation to it, I must inquire of gentlemen on this floor, representing non-slaveholding States, what those States would do? I referred especially to the Senators from Massachusetts who had spoken most loudly on the subject. I particularly appealed to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. ROCKWELL,] who had addressed the Senate with calmness, whether he supposed, if all such laws were swept from the statute-book, and the Constitution was left to its self-executing and self-sufficing power, Massachusetts, on demand of the master, would deliver up a fugitive slave who had escaped into her territory? I will do that Senator the justice to say, that I did not expect he would be able to answer, except as a representative. I wished to get his general opinions on the subject. Having paid him that compliment, which I thought he deserved as the one who presented the memorial, I turned to the Senator near me, [Mr. SUMNER,] and said, "What say you on the subject? What would you do?" I did not ask the Senator whether personally he would assist to reduce a human being to bondage, or to return him to bondage?—as he has put it. I did not ask him any such question as that. I did not approach anything like it. I asked him a question of exactly the same import which I had put to the other Senator from that State: "What would you do?" I meant, what would you do as a public representative, on that subject? Would you advise the abrogation of the present fugitive slave law, with the understanding, on your part, that when you go home you will advise your constituents to do their duty in relation to this matter? I turned to him and asked him what he would do? Well, sir, what do you think he said? I have no doubt he had his reply in his drawer fixed, ready for me. It is a pretty thing, no doubt. He did not, however, answer my question, nor did he answer the question which he made for himself.

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to correct him?

Mr. BUTLER. You may correct me, if you can.

Mr. SUMNER. I am very reluctant to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. I would rather you would not interrupt me. I do not think you can correct me.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to call the Senator's attention to a report to which I alluded before.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. STUART.) Does the Senator from South Carolina yield the floor to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BUTLER. I think the Senator had better let me finish.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to show this now.

Mr. BUTLER. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. The New York papers, which came to-day, under the telegraph head, give a report of what passed, which is necessarily more brief than that in the Globe. The statement here is as follows:

"He [Mr. BUTLER] would like to ask the Senator, if Congress repealed the fugitive slave law, would Massachusetts execute the constitutional requirements, and send back to the South the absconding slaves?"

That is the statement of the Senator's interrogatory in the New York papers, as addressed to my colleague. Then the report in the Globe, which, I presume, has been revised by himself—

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir, not that part; I never will touch personal matters; I give you to understand that.

Mr. SUMNER. The report in the Globe goes on, "Will the honorable Senator [Mr. SUMNER] tell me that he will do it?"

Mr. BUTLER. That was my inquiry.

Mr. SUMNER. Then the New York papers represent me as saying, "Do you ask me if I would send back a slave?" Then they go on to say, that the Senator from South Carolina answered, "Why, yes." That is to say, the question was, would I send back a fugitive? to which I replied as you know.

Mr. BUTLER. I will not undertake to say here what was the Senator's exact interrogatory. I know what mine was. Of that I have a right to speak.

Mr. SUMNER. Unquestionably.

Mr. BUTLER. Though I have been asked frequently by others, I will not say what his interrogatory was; for I never will do injustice.

Mr. SUMNER. I cheerfully concede the Senator that right. I know he could not misstate on this floor; but what I concede to him I claim for myself; and I believe it is reasonable to suppose that what I said is better within my memory than within his.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, will the honorable Senator from South Carolina allow me to state my recollection?

Mr. BUTLER. I am perfectly willing that the Senator shall do so.

Mr. SUMNER. I believe the Senator from Maine sat at some distance from me.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I sat on this side of the Chamber, and listened very attentively to what was said. My recollection is, that the Senator from South Carolina first addressed himself to the Senator from Massachusetts, on this side of the Chamber, [Mr. ROCKWELL,] and, as I understood the inquiry, though I cannot pretend to give the precise language, it was to this effect: Suppose the fugitive slave law to be repealed, will Massachusetts then pass laws, or see that fugitives are returned?

Mr. BUTLER. Under the Constitution.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir, I believe the words "under the Constitution" were in the inquiry. The Senator from Massachusetts, on this side of the Chamber, did not immediately reply to the Senator from South Carolina, and then turned to the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] and put the same inquiry to him.

Mr. BUTLER. I think so.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator from Massachusetts immediately said, as I understood him, "Does the Senator ask me if I would return a fugitive slave," or something of that kind; I cannot tell his exact language; and then he made the quotation.

Allow me to state one thing further that has come to my knowledge. The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] as I understand, has addressed the Senate on the supposition that there was a misunderstanding and contradiction between the Senator from Massachusetts and the reporter; and he alluded to the letter from the reporter which was read by the Senator from Indiana. That letter states that the remark of the Senator from Massachusetts, as published in the Globe, was not in the reporter's notes. Now, sir, I have very good reason for saying, and I can substantiate it very readily, although it may not be precisely in order for me to show how, that there is no contradiction whatever between the reporter and the Senator from Massachusetts; because, although the remark, as given in the precise words in which it is given, was not in the reporter's notes—and that is all the reporter meant to say—the substance of the remark, the same idea, was in the reporter's notes, and written out; but the mere phraseology, not changing the idea, was altered by the Senator from Massachusetts, as stated. On that the debate has proceeded, being predicated on an entire misapprehension. That misapprehension is, that, as to the substantial remark, there was a dispute between the honorable Senator from Massachusetts and the reporter, which, I say, with very great confidence, does not exist.

I may say further, that after the scriptural quotation made by the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from South Carolina made some remark to the Senator from Massachusetts, which I distinctly observed, in regard to his unwillingness to support the Constitution. What the precise phraseology was I do not know. The answer made by the Senator from Massachusetts was in these precise words: "I recognize no such obligation." I did not understand that Senator as meaning to say that he would not obey the Constitution, or would disregard his oath; nor, allow me to say, was he so understood by many gentlemen on this side of the Chamber; but he simply meant to say (I certainly so understood him) that he did not consider that the Constitution imposed any such obligation upon him. That is all.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President, what I mean to say the honorable Senator from Maine of course does not undertake to controvert. I meant to put the same proposition to this Senator [Mr. SUMNER] that I had put to his colleague. When he answered, he answered a question which, perhaps, he put himself; but it was not the inquiry I proposed.

Mr. SUMNER. I wish to say to the Senator from South Carolina—and I do say it most unfeignedly—that, in answering him at that time, I answered him honestly and frankly, according to my position. He addressed me, and I regarded the appeal as addressed to me individually—as, if I may say so, an argumentum ad hominem. Will you join in doing this? I so understood it; I so declared, and then I answered the Senator, understanding him to ask me if I would individually, personally, join in sending back a slave. That was my interpretation, and accordingly I answered, and by that answer I stand. I state this with all frankness and simplicity before the Senate. I think the controversy does not justly arise on the facts.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield the floor?

Mr. BUTLER. Yes, sir, I do, in connection with this matter; for I do not undertake to recollect anything, except the question which I put myself. That I do recollect.

Mr. RUSK. I have no desire to be a volunteer in this matter; but I happened to be sitting very close by both Senators, and I think I have a very distinct recollection of what occurred. The honorable Senator from South Carolina was addressing the Chair on the subject of the reference of this petition to the Committee on the Judiciary. Among other remarks, he said that he had not put a very high estimate upon the fugitive slave law passed by Congress, and that he was very willing to investigate the subject; but that, before investigating it, with a view to its repeal, there was a question which it would become necessary to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, alluding to the Senator on the other side of the Chamber, [Mr. ROCKWELL,] or, at all events, addressing him. It was whether, if Congress should repeal the law in regard to fugitive slaves, Massachusetts would execute the provision of the Constitution. What the other words which he used in that connection were, I do not exactly remember; but they were to this effect, that he did not ask for a direct answer from him, but that it would become a material inquiry, in the investigation of the question, whether the fugitive slave law should be repealed. He then turned round to the other Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER,] I was under the impression he did it as a matter of politeness—that having asked one Senator, he thought he ought, perhaps, to ask the other.

Mr. BUTLER. That was my real feeling.

Mr. RUSK. He put the question to him, "What would you do, sir?" The Senator from Massachusetts became very much excited, and I think he was not in a condition to remember exactly what he did say. He said, "Do you ask me if I would do so and so," and he immediately said, "Is thy servant a dog, that he should do this thing?" That is about the way I understood it. I was sitting close to both Senators, and I think I heard fully all that passed.

A word now in answer to a remark which fell from the Senator from Maine. The observations to which he alluded last occurred in a question between the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. PATT,] The Senator from Maryland said something, and the observation which the Senator from Maine repeated was in reply to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It might have been so; but I remember that the statement to which so much exception was taken in the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts, was made distinctly in the terms I have stated, according to my recollection.

Mr. BUTLER. I do not think this matter very important, and I shall not detain the Senate longer upon it; but I will say what I know to be the true explanation of it. The same interrogatory which I proposed to the Senator from Massachusetts on the other side of the chamber, I intended to propose to the Senator on this side. When he chose to make his reply by a quotation, he assumed that I had made an interrogatory which I had never made, but it verifies again what I said before, that all his rhetoric has been upon issues of his own creation. I did not make them. I did not ask him whether he would join with the police as an individual, to pursue a slave, and he knows I did not. His elaborate impromptu, in his quoted answer, was an affair of his own altogether.

I make now the qualified remark—for upon personal matters I wish always to be correct—that whatever may have been the Senator's assumptions, in nothing that I did say, in no interpretation that could be given of what I did say, ought he to have supposed that I would have asked the question, whether he, as a Senator of Massachusetts, was bound to join with the police and apprehend a slave. He may have been expecting such a question, and was prepared for it. Sir, I asked a graver question, whether he, in his place, as a Senator of Massachusetts, would say here that Massachusetts would execute the Constitution of the United States, and whether he would concur in carrying out that Constitution? That was the interrogatory I proposed to him; and he evaded it by saying, "if the gentleman says so and so, then I answer by this quotation." I made one issue by my interrogatory, and he made another. I do not say that it may not have been a misconception. I will be qualified on the subject; but when he made that remark, I assumed that he regarded himself absolved from the obligation taken by his oath here to maintain that provision of the Constitution which required every State in this Union to perform its duty in returning a fugitive slave. I assumed it, and I denounced it. At first I did not say much about it; but I treated it rather with ridicule, until it became a subject of more than ridicule by a subsequent remark of the Senator, and then I did denounce it in a very few sentences. I do not think he could take much exception to even those sentences, compared with what others have said. But before them he cannot find a place where I bestowed a single epithet on him, except that I characterized his speech as vapid rhetoric. I had a right to do so. On some occasions I had thought and spoken well of his taste; but thought there was justice modifying that judgment, in saying that the same thing, attenuated and repeated, had lost something of even its originality. In this criticism he may have been touched.

Now, by way of episode, let me say, as the Senator has referred to me, that it would have been my wish to have him perform the part which I would have assigned him. If he would discharge the duties for which I think he is fitted, I should be satisfied. Perhaps I ought not to indicate what those duties are. I have never shown an unfriendly feeling. Now, he will allow me to state the reason why I was excited on that day. I wish him to understand why I was fairly excited in regard to the matter which has been the cause of so much controversy here. Considering that the remark to which I have referred came from a man of his responsibility, talent, and scholarship, I think I had a right to be excited at it. Why, sir, did not that Senator rise and say in the Senate of the United States—not speaking in an adversary Commonwealth, whose flag had been erected by the voice of his own State, not as standing upon Bunker Hill and inspired by the spirit of liberty—he was willing to run the hazards and risks of battle; not that he was willing to encounter the pains and penalties of a separate movement against the Federal Government? But what I was excited at was that, in this Senate he should say that the provision of the Constitution of the United States, a compact into which Massachusetts entered, recognizing the existence of slavery and the obligations of the non-slaveholding States to perform their duties in returning a fugitive, imposed no obligation upon him! When I saw him rise upon this floor, and heard him say that that clause, and all laws intended to carry it out, were worse than the Stamp Act, and that before God he would be as much justified in resisting them as our forefathers were in resisting the Stamp Act, I was excited. When a coequal Senator stood on this floor, and said it would be as lawful, as heroic, as glorious, to resist this provision of the Constitution, as to resist the Stamp Act, I was indignant. As I understood him, he justified combined communities, mobs, in resisting the fugitive slave law, or that provision of the Constitution. Sir, he identified with the glorious resistance to the Stamp Act, as exhibited in Boston and elsewhere, resistance which he was willing to make to the Constitution of his own country!

Did he suppose that I, as a southern man, interested in the institution of slavery, representing a slaveholding Commonwealth, could stand here and hear myself denounced, and my community denounced, for maintaining an institution of that kind, and for insisting upon the constitutional obligations of others, to conform to the terms of the Confederacy? When he said, that before God—I do not know whether he used those words, but he made some solemn assertion—the enormities of the Stamp Act sunk into insignificance, compared with the enormities of this provision of the Constitution, or any act intended to carry it out, it was enough to excite me. It was, however, but a temporary excitement; and if the Senator had not this morning come here, and indited a libel against South Carolina—not in the name of Massachusetts, for she would not do it—if he had not come here this morning, and with concocted malice, poured out a prepared speech, on the assumption that I had said a thing which I never said; if he had not come here deliberately prepared to take materials brought together in a fell spirit, with a view to make a distinction between the North and the South, and against South Carolina, I should have said nothing. God knows South Carolina has had her difficulties throughout the whole period of her existence. Her history is written in blood and trial. But I forbear. When she invited Greene, and he took command of her militia and regulars, I will not say certainly, but I do not think there was a Massachusetts soldier who followed him. Perhaps some of the officers might have been from Massachusetts. Greene was invited to take command of the southern army. He had good taste enough to appreciate the gratitude and the offerings of friendship bestowed upon him by Georgia and South Carolina. His grave is there. They bestowed upon him fortune. They rewarded him with something more than the laurels which the rhetorician can bestow upon the hero whose merits I am afraid he cannot appreciate. Sir, when he speaks of my honored State by culling history which I have not had an opportunity of examining, I admit we had our difficulties. The truth is, it is a wonder that South Carolina ever went to the rescue of Boston. Boston made the war with Great Britain. She was the first. She made it in the spirit of hardy Massachusetts, of slaveholding Massachusetts. I do not say, however, that the fact of her being or not being slaveholding had anything to do with it. I do not say that a State is better or worse for being slaveholding or non-slaveholding. But, sir, when Massachusetts made the declaration and involved the country in the issues of war, we came to her rescue, and our history will illustrate the annals of that day. I will not say more, for more would not become me or him on that point.

It might be expected that I should reply more specifically to some things said about South Carolina. I will do so when there is a real occasion. So long as the names of Kirkwood, Howard, Morgan, and Rutherford; of Marion, Clarke, and Elbert, shall remain in history, the southern States will require no vindication on this floor. And so long as the names of Lincoln, Greene, Stark, Putnam, and Knox, shall remain, they will serve to shed their rays on a common history. That is secure from the North or the South. They will go to show that slaveholding communities can achieve an organized independence, and can institute constitutions for the maintenance of rational liberty.

I will now conclude by saying that what I have said has been the effusion of the moment, and not the effusion of the drawer; but what the Senator has said this morning has been the deliberate preparation of two or three nights' lucubrations, collecting the materials of history, and making them subservient to the maintenance of false issues. With that proposition I leave the subject. Upon false issues he has made his speech.

Mr. CLAY. I do not rise to make a speech; I have no idea of trespassing on the time of the Senate at this period of the day; but I rise to repeat—and I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to it—that there is a material difference between the Senator from Massachusetts and the reporter. Before I allude to the evidence to establish the truth of the position assumed by the Senator from Indiana, and reassured by myself, I will say to the Senator from Maine that I do not doubt that he labors under an honest misapprehension, and that he really believes what he has stated. Now, I wish to call his attention, first, to the fact, that the Senator who put the question, and who stood immediately before the Senator from Massachusetts, understood him as denying the obligations of his oath to support the Constitution of the United States; that he so treated it, and continued to treat it throughout the remainder of his speech. And that the Senator from Massachusetts so intended at the time, there is confirmation in the record itself; and I call the Senator's attention to it. Here it is, found in the following remarks of the Senators from South Carolina, from Maryland, and from Massachusetts, as exhibited in the report before us:

"Mr. BUTLER. Then you would not obey the Constitution. Sir, [turning to Mr. SUMNER,] standing here before this tribunal, where you swore to support it, you rise and tell me that you regard it the office of a dog to enforce it. You stand in my presence, as a coequal Senator, and tell me that it is a dog's office to execute the Constitution of the United States?"

"Mr. PRATT. Which he has sworn to support."

"Mr. SUMNER. I recognize no such obligation."

That is "a confirmation strong as proofs of Holy Writ" that he was not misapprehended, and that he reassured what he had before asserted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not undertake to say how the Senator from South Carolina understood it, nor do I undertake to say how the Senator from Alabama, or any other gentleman, understood it. I only say that the language was such as I have stated, and that I did not understand the Senator from Massachusetts as conveying such an idea as is imputed to him, nor did many other gentlemen, to my knowledge, on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SUMNER. Nor had I any such idea to convey.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I imputed at the time the construction which was put upon the language of the Senator rather to the heat of the debate and, perhaps, a want of capacity—not a general want of capacity, but a want of capacity under the excitement of the occasion—properly to appreciate the real meaning which the Senator intended to convey.

Mr. GILLETTE. I will state, sir, that I was in my seat, paying very close attention to the remarks which were made that day. As the Senator from South Carolina turned to the Senator from Massachusetts, the latter Senator rose, and in this manner asked the question, "Do you ask me whether I would return a slave?"—emphasizing the "me" and the "I," which, to my mind, banishes all doubt as to the matter. That is the way in which I understood him.

Mr. PETTIT. Mr. President, there may possibly have been some mistake as to one point, but there can be none as to the last. Did the Senator from Massachusetts make use of the following language: "I recognize no such obligation?" No Senator, not even that one himself, pretends to deny it. Now, what is that obligation which he says he does not recognize? Gentlemen may fix up as many beautiful sentences as they please, but I shall very easily show what it means. The Senator from Massachusetts asked the Senator from South Carolina, according to the report, (which I contend was an interpolation,) whether he interrogated him so and so? Then, after his answer, the Senator from South Carolina went on thus:

"Mr. BUTLER. Then you would not obey the Constitution. Sir, [turning to Mr. SUMNER,] standing here before this tribunal, where you swore to support it, you rise and tell me that you regard it the office of a dog to enforce it. You stand in my presence, as a coequal Senator, and tell me that it is a dog's office to execute the Constitution of the United States?"

"Mr. PRATT. Which he has sworn to support."

This remark of the Senator from Maryland did not change at all what the Senator from South Carolina was saying; for he had already told the Senator from Massachusetts that he had sworn to support the Constitution. But to that, what was the response of the Senator from Massachusetts? Here is the issue, and it is narrowed down. He promptly responded:

"Mr. SUMNER. I recognize no such obligation."

What, sir? The Senator from Massachusetts not recognize the obligation of the Constitution, and the oath he has taken to support it! That is what the Senator from South Carolina and the Senator from Maryland alike charged upon him. They notified him, they warned him, they advised him, they refreshed his memory, that he had sworn to support the Constitution; and directly, in the face of both these advices, warnings, and reminders that he occupied such a position, he expressly said, "I recognize no such obligation."

Now, sir, how does the Senator attempt to get out of it? How can he, or how can his numerous friends, undertake to excuse him, and get around it? He may quibble as to the other question, "whether you asked me whether I would do so and so," emphasizing the me and the I; but I say that he said he recognized "no such obligation," as the Constitution of his country, and the oath he had taken before the Presiding Officer of this body, upon the Gospel of God, to support it; and that he boldly stated here in our presence, (and was the first high official that ever did utter such words; and no man can say he did not utter them,) that he recognized no such obligation. No such obligation as what? The Constitution of his country, and his oath to support that Constitution. His words are, "I recognize no such obligation."

Sir, the Senator stands convicted, not by my testimony alone, but by the testimony of your reporter, the testimony of the Senator from Alabama, the testimony of the Senator from Florida, the testimony of the Senator from South Carolina, and the testimony of the Senator from Texas, of having said that he recognized no such obligation.

Sir, while I am up I will say what I intended to say when I was up before, that in any remark which I have made I have not designed to attribute anything improper, unjustifiable, or censurable to the reporter of the Senate. To that gentlemen I am under many obligations this year, and in years gone past, in the other House and in this body, for efficient, correct, and faithful reports of what I have said. I have no complaint to lay at his door. He may have thought he was justified in allowing the Senator to interpolate in my remarks what he did allow him to interpolate; and he has come forward promptly to show, by the letter which I read to-day, and which will appear in my remarks to-morrow, that he did interpolate, that they did not exist, and that, even as reported, they were different in form and substance from what appears in print. The Senator cannot get out of the charge that is here made against him. He said he recognized no such obligation as the obligation of the Constitution, and of his oath to support it. He cannot, he has not shirked, in any form, the allegation that he interpolated what was not true, what he did not say, what he could not have said, and that he forced it in the report to the detriment of the then speaker.

Mr. TOUCEY. Mr. President, I should be unwilling to hold any Senator to the consequences of a hasty expression. I beg leave, therefore, to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether he now recognizes an obligation to return a fugitive slave? I put the question in general language: Does he recognize the obligation to return a fugitive slave?

Mr. SUMNER. To that I answer distinctly, no.

Mr. CLAY. Now, I trust nobody will again undertake to qualify the language of the Senator from Massachusetts, or to screen him from an imputation that is made against him.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to refer the petition to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. FORNEY, their Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill, entitled an "Act to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a rail road therein;" which was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

INTRODUCTION OF A BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Iowa. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate, in behalf of my absent colleague who is confined to his bed by sickness, to introduce a bill to aid in the transportation of the mails. My object is merely to have it referred to the proper committee.

By unanimous consent, leave to introduce the bill was granted, and it was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 28, 1854.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

FULLER'S SURVEY OF THE OHIO RIVER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the resolve of the House of Representatives of the 20th instant, a report of the Colonel of Topographical Engineers, containing information in respect to Fuller's survey of the Ohio river, (made in 1853,) and in the vicinity of Marietta, Ohio, with such reports, estimates, explanatory notes, and other papers, on file in the War Department, adapted to illustrate the same.

Ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

Mr. COBB. Now let us have the morning hour.

Mr. JONES. Well, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. COBB. Then I call for the regular order of business.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DE WITT, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the following bills; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker:

An act to reimburse to the common council of New York city the expenditure made for the first regiment of New York volunteers;

An act to confirm certain land claims in Louisiana on the Bastrop grant;

An act for the relief of Priscilla C. Simonds;

An act for the relief of Moses Olmstead;

An act for the relief of Zadoc C. Inghram; and

An act for the relief of Llewellyn Washington.

PRESERVATION OF LIFE FROM SHIPWRECK.

Mr. SKELTON. By unanimous consent, and in pursuance of previous notice, introduced the following bill; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill for the better preservation of life and property from shipwreck on the coast of the United States.

MAIL TRANSPORTATION TO THE PACIFIC.

The SPEAKER. The business first in order is the consideration of the following bill:

A bill to provide a weekly mail service between the Atlantic States and San Francisco.

The pending question is on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. Cobb], to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COBB. I made that motion, and I will not withdraw it until I hear what the gentleman from California wants. Perhaps he is desirous of postponing it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to make a verbal amendment to the bill, for the purpose of relieving it from ambiguity.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

In the sixth line strike out the word "existing," before the word "contract;" and in the seventh line, after the word "contract," insert the words "to be made."

So that the clause shall read:

And it shall be the duty of the Postmaster General to determine any contract to be made for the service herein required, and to make a new contract therefor whenever a greater expedition can be procured within the provisions of this act expressed."

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That amendment is not only a verbal one, but it makes a material difference in the provisions of the bill.

Mr. McDUGALL. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will remember that upon a previous day it was stated by myself, in my place here, that there was no intention of affecting existing contracts. That bill was drawn up without any such design. The term of that particular provision is, that it shall only operate upon the services provided for in the act; but the term "existing" makes the sentence ambiguous. I do not wish the provision to be ambiguous at all, though I think, with my amendment adopted, the provision will be the same. I ask the gentleman from Tennessee to allow me to amend the bill so as to express the intention of the committee.

Mr. JONES. I think that amendment will not do.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire simply that the provision be clear and explicit.

Mr. JONES. I think the amendment is a material one, and perhaps it alters the whole gist of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made, then, to the amendment, the question is upon the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

Mr. COBB. I made that motion, and I believe the previous question has been called and sustained upon the bill.

The SPEAKER. The bill was ordered to a third reading under the previous question.

Mr. COBB. Then the previous question is exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. COBB. My object in moving to reconsider the vote was to keep the bill in the possession of the House, so that they could reconsider, and, if they found it necessary, when it should come up again, to amend it in such a way as to make it acceptable to the House. We have passed beyond the stage in which amendment can be made to the bill; and at the time I made the motion, I heard numerous objections made by the members of this House to the bill as it was then stated to the House. The committee which reported the bill now desire to amend it, and to qualify some of its language; and I hope it may be amended in a manner which will render it acceptable to the gentleman from California, [Mr. McDUGALL.]

I recollect distinctly that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE,] who is not now in his seat, voted for the bill on its second and third reading. In relation to certain provisions in the bill, however, I discovered that he dissented from the gentleman from California. He suggested that he desired to offer an amendment to obviate all difficulty in getting rid of the other contract. It is my desire, and I presume it is the desire of every gentleman here, if the bill is to pass, to put it in such a shape as to make it acceptable to the gentleman from California and to the House. But the next day, seeing that no particular attention was called to it, and knowing that if the further consideration of the bill was postponed, it must either pass in the condition in which it now stands, or be defeated, in order that the House might have the opportunity upon reflection to make such amendments as they might consider necessary, I made the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was ordered to a third reading.

In the condition in which the bill now stands I am prepared to vote against it. I desire that proper mail facilities shall be furnished between the Atlantic and Pacific coasts; and if the bill can be amended in such a way as to provide for the abrogation of the existing contract, I shall cheerfully vote for it. But unless some means can be provided by which we can get rid of the old contract, I shall feel compelled to vote against it, notwithstanding my earnest wish to afford the proper mail facilities between the two oceans.

I hope, therefore, the friends of the measure will go with me in this motion to reconsider, and give the House an opportunity to so amend the bill that it may pass in a shape that will be alike satisfactory to the gentleman from California and the House. But, sir, I do not intend to discuss the merits of the measure. I have risen merely to state that I shall vote for the bill with that amendment, and that I shall vote against it without the amendment. And now, sir, profiting by the suggestion of a friend, never to speak unless I could say something that would edify the House, I intend to withhold my fire, so far as the making of speeches are concerned, to a proper time.

Mr. McDUGALL obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. HAVEN, who said: Is the motion to reconsider now before the House?

Mr. COBB. It is; and I hope it will be carried, for the purpose of placing the matter in the hands of the House.

Mr. HAVEN. I do not wish to take any part in this discussion; but it seems to me to be only reasonable that the House should reconsider, and give the gentleman from California the opportunity to print the bill in the language in which the committee which reported it intended it should be, and then either vote down the bill, or pass it at once.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I ask the gentleman from California to allow me to say a word. When this bill was before the House for consideration, some days ago, not having read the bill carefully, I asked the gentleman from California a question, which it seems has brought the attention of the House to the point upon which the reconsideration is now asked. I asked the gentleman whether this bill would interfere with the existing contract? His reply was, that it did not interfere with the existing contract for ocean steam mail service between the Atlantic and Pacific coast. The gentleman was then, it seems, laboring under a misapprehension. Now, sir, if the gentleman from Tennessee still adheres to his objection to the amendment, I hope the House will grant so reasonable a request as the gentleman from California makes.

I regret that my friend from Tennessee objects.

But he does object; and I hope that the House will make the reconsideration and modification of the bill as desired.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I wish to say to the House that I do desire the reconsideration to take place. I do not wish, and would not seek to accomplish, anything by indirection; and if I had wanted the Postmaster General authorized to abrogate the existing contract, I should have so stated in plain terms. I sought nothing of the kind, as I stated on a previous occasion in my place here. I hope the House will allow the reconsideration to take place, that the proper amendment to express the views of the committee, as well as my own, may be made.

Mr. McMULLIN. Mr. Chairman, I am disposed to favor the proposition of my friend from California; but before doing so, I should like to have some information on the subject, from either the gentleman himself, the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, or the chairman of the select committee on steamship contracts. It is my desire to increase, within reasonable limit, the mail facilities for California. The cost of the present facilities, if I am correctly informed, is $838,000 the year; my friend's proposition authorizes and requires the Postmaster General to increase that expenditure $250,000.

There seems to be some difference of opinion between the gentleman from California, the chairman of the Post Office Committee, and the chairman of the select committee to investigate the subject of contracts with steamship companies for carrying the United States mails as to whether the contract immediately under consideration can be abrogated. Now, sir, while I am anxious and willing to afford all the mail facilities to California which justice may demand, still I cannot vote for this $250,000 increase unless I can have some assurance, or see my way clear in regard to the abrogation of the existing contract with this mail steamship company. Let the gentlemen to whom I have alluded give the House their reasons why the appropriation is a proper one.

Before I yield the floor, however, for the information I have asked, I repeat what I said on a former occasion when the question was before us, that we ought not to act on the bill until we had seen the conclusions of the investigating committee on steamship contracts, and the action of the House on its report. I understand from my friend that he intends to notice this point after the reconsideration; and when we get back to the merits of the bill, I shall not trammel, by any objection of mine, any of the friends of the bill. I think that the people of California need, and are entitled to, increased mail facilities; but I hope that the House may be now furnished with the information which I have indicated. On that information will, to some extent, depend the vote which I shall give. If we cannot give up the contract with this steamship company, so as to make better arrangement than that now existing, I am willing to vote what is asked; but I cannot consent to tax the Post Office Department $1,000,000 for mail facilities for California, when I know that there are other sections of the country similarly situated, and who demand at our hands further mail facilities.

Mr. OLDS. I am, perhaps, unable to give the gentleman from Virginia the information he has asked relative to the power of Congress to put an end to existing contracts for the transportation of the mails between New York and San Francisco. It depends entirely on the construction of the contract, involving, perhaps, some nice legal points that the House can decide for themselves. But I cannot, for the life of me, see what that has to do with this bill. The question is a simple one. Do we need increased mail facilities between the Atlantic and Pacific? If we do, let us have them. Then, if you have the power to put an end to the existing contract, and make a better one for that mail service, let us have that also. But it appears, if we need an increase of mail facilities, we should pass this bill without any reference to the other. Believing that the matter has been fully discussed, and to save the time of the House, I move the previous question upon the reconsideration.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Will the gentleman withdraw his demand for the previous question, to enable me to make an inquiry?

Mr. OLDS. I will withdraw it if the gentleman will renew it.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Do I understand this bill as contemplating that the same contractors shall perform the service as have performed it hitherto?

Mr. OLDS. No, sir. The contract will be open for any bids for carrying the mails, by any other route, at a sum not exceeding $250,000. It has not the most distant thing in the world to do with the existing contract for carrying the mail between Panama and Chagres.

Mr. MACE. It has been out of the power of the select committee on ocean mail service, up to this time, to submit a report to the House. The report, however, will be completed and submitted next week. I, like the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. OLDS,] can see no immediate connection between the Collins line of steamers and the steamers engaged in the Pacific mail service. But the point involved, in my opinion, in the whole matter of ocean mail service, is this: The contract with the Collins line of steamers needs overhauling, and a critical examination upon the part of members of the House. In addition to that, the mail service between the Atlantic and Pacific stands identically in the same condition, though these routes are disconnected with each other, so far as the contracts are concerned. In my opinion, it will be found, after a careful examination, that, if the Congress of the United States have the legal authority to interfere with the transportation of the mails for a violation of contract, the same principle will apply, and, perhaps, to a greater extent, to the steamers engaged in the transportation of the mails from the Atlantic to the Pacific. I remarked upon a former occasion, that I will go as far as the gentlemen from California to give them these increased mail facilities; but I am not prepared, at this time, to saddle this Government with an additional expense of $250,000 per annum for a weekly service.

I do believe, after a full investigation of this matter, and after the committee shall have submitted the report which they design making, that the House will have it in its power to curtail greatly the expenses of our ocean mail service, and afford equal facilities that they now do between New York and Liverpool; and also, afford the facilities which the gentleman asks for California.

With these remarks, I move the previous question, as I promised to do.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put, being upon the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for a count of the House, that we may see whether we have got a quorum.

Mr. OLDS. I ask for tellers. That is the best way to ascertain the fact.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and Cox were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 101, noes 24.

So the motion to reconsider prevailed. The question then recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. COBB. I now make a motion to reconsider the next stage in the bill, so that we can get back to a point where we can amend it.

The SPEAKER. It is amendable now.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I now propose the amendment which I offered before; and I call the previous question upon its adoption.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask for tellers upon the second.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HARRIS, of Alabama, and WHEELER, were appointed.

The House was then divided upon the demand for the previous question, and the tellers reported 92 in the affirmative, and 32 in the negative.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

The question now being upon the amendment proposed by Mr. McDOUGALL,

Mr. PHELPS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, James C. Allen, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Banks, Barksdale, Bell, Benson, Caruthers, Chastain, Churchwell, Cook, Cox, Crocker, Curtis, Dawson, Dean, De Witt, Dick, Disney, Dowdell, Eastman, Thomas D. Eliot, English, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Gamble, Green, Greenwood, Sampson W. Harris, Harrison, Hastings, Haven, Henn, Hillyer, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Daniel T. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Roland Jones, Knox, Kurtz, Latham, Lindsley, McDougall, Mc-Nair, Mace, Macy, Matteson, Maxwell, Middleswarth, Morgan, Nichols, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Orr, Parker, Peck, Peckham, Bishop Perkins, Pringle, Puryear, Reese, Riddle, David Ritchie, Thomas Ritchie, Rowe, Seward, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, William R. Smith, George W. Smyth, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, John J. Taylor, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thurston, Trout, Tweed, Upham, Vail, Walker, Walley, Walsh, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wells, Wheeler, Daniel B. Wright, Yates, and Zollcoffer—100.

NAYS—Messrs. Belcher, Bocoek, Bridges, Campbell, Carpenter, Chamberlain, Cobb, Corwin, Craig, Cullom, John G. Davis, Dickinson, Eddy, Ellison, Etheridge, Florence, Giddings, Goode, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Hiestler, Hill, Houston, Johnson, George W. Jones, Keitt, Letcher, Lilly, Lindley, McCulloch, McMullin, Mayall, John G. Miller, Murray, Olds, Mordecai Oliver, Pennington, Phelps, Ready, Ruffin, Russell, Sapp, Shannon, Singleton, Tracy, Vansant, Wade, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, and Witte—50.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Pending the call of the yeas and nays, Mr. McDOUGALL asked consent to make a brief statement as to the effect of the amendment.

Mr. LILLY. I object.

Mr. READY. I hope the gentleman will not object. Very few of us know what the amendment is.

Mr. LILLY. I object, for the reason that the gentleman from California himself called the previous question upon the bill without giving any one else an opportunity of saying anything upon it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I propose to make a single statement in reference to the bill.

Mr. JONES. I ask whether debate is in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. PHELPS. Is it in order to move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. It is not; the main question having been ordered to be now put.

The question was then put on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and there were—ayes 61, noes 63.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I demand tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the House will let the bill pass to a third reading, I shall call for the yeas and nays on its passage.

The SPEAKER. The House has refused to do so, unless in division, by tellers, it otherwise orders.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. WITTE and Cox were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 82, noes 76.

Before the Speaker announced the result of the vote,

Mr. COX said: I desire to correct the report made by the tellers. 'In our first count we reported sixty-six as voting in the affirmative. Since then six more voted in the affirmative, making seventy-two; and seventy-six have voted in the negative.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I then ask the yeas and nays upon the engrossment.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Have I a right to move to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. The previous question is not yet exhausted, and the motion indicated by the gentleman from California would not be in order.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. OLDS. Is it in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

The SPEAKER. No motion is in order, except to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. BRIDGES. I move to lay the bill upon the table; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Is it in order to move to postpone the further consideration of this bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion can be made only by unanimous consent.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The yeas and nays were ordered upon Mr. BRIDGES's motion.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Bocoek, Bridges, Campbell, Carpenter, Chamberlain, Cobb, Corwin, Cox, Craig, Crocker, Cullom, Curtis, Thomas Davis, Dick, Dickinson, Dowdell, Eastman, Thomas D. Eliot, Ellison, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Flagler, Gamble, Giddings, Goode, Goodrich, Grow, Aaron Harlan, Wiley P. Harris, Harrison, Hiester, Hill, Houston, Johnson, George W. Jones, Keitt, Knox, Letcher, Lilly, Lindley, Lindsey, McCulloch, McDougall, Mace, Middlesworth, Milson, Morgan, Murray, Norton, Mordecai Oliver, Packer, Parker, Pennington, Phelps, Pringle, Puryear, Ready, Thomas Ritchey, Ruffin, Russell, Sabin, Sage, Sapp, Shaw, Singleton, Skelton, Gerrit Smith, John J. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Tracy, Trout, Vail, Vansant, Wade, Walley, Walsh, Elihu B. Washburne, Tappan Wentworth, Yates, and Zollcoffer—84.

YATES—Messrs. Abercrombie, Willis Allen, Appleton, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Banks, Bell, Benson, Chandler, Chastain, Chrisman, Churchwell, Clark, Cook, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Eddy, Everhart, Ewing, Farley, Florence, Green, Greenwood, Sampson W. Harris, Hastings, Hendricks, Henn, Howe, Hughes, Hunt, Ingersoll, Roland Jones, Kurtz, Latham, McNair, Macy, Matteson, Mayall, Smith Miller, Nichols, Olds, Orr, Peck, Peckham, Phillips, Preston, Reese, Richardson, Riddle, David Ritchie, Robbins, Rowe, Seward, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Frederick P. Stanton, Richard H. Stanton, Alexander H. Stephens, Hester L. Stevens, Straub, David Stuart, John L. Taylor, Thurston, Tweed, Upham, Walker, Westbrook, Wheeler, and Daniel B. Wright—71.

So the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. McDUGALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to lay that motion upon the table.

Mr. PECKHAM. I ask if the morning hour has expired?

Mr. McDUGALL. I move that the rules of the House be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PECKHAM. If the morning hour has expired, I move now that we proceed to the business on the Speaker's table, with the view of taking up the resolution from the Senate fixing the day of adjournment of the present session of Congress. We may as well dispose of it now as at any other time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. McDUGALL] has moved that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a point of order. The motion to reconsider is a privileged question, and takes precedence of every other motion, except a motion to go into committee.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider is a privileged motion; the motion to lay on the table is also a privileged motion; at the expiration of the morning hour it is in order under the rules to move to go to the business on the Speaker's table. The motion, however, to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is in order at any time, and is to be first put to the House.

The question was taken on Mr. McDUGALL's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 66, noes 90.

Mr. ORR. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. LETCHER. I suppose the question is upon the motion to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The SPEAKER. That motion is pending, and is the question next in order.

Mr. PECKHAM. Is not my motion next in order?

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider, and the motion to lay that motion on the table, take precedence of the motion to go to the business upon the Speaker's table.

Mr. JONES, of Louisiana, asked for tellers on Mr. LETCHER's motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KEITT and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported 79 in the affirmative, and 48 in the negative.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. PHELPS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. PECKHAM. I ask the Chair if that motion has not been just made and voted down?

The SPEAKER. It has; but business has since intervened.

Mr. PECKHAM. Well, sir, I hope the motion will be voted down.

The question was put on Mr. PHELPS's motion, and, on a division, there were—ayes 78, noes 78.

The SPEAKER. The Chair votes in the affirmative.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and KEITT appointed.

The question was then taken; and the tellers reported—ayes ninety-one, a further count not being demanded.

So the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was here received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, Esq., their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

An act (No. 403) creating a collection district in the State of California;

An act (No. 418) creating a collection district in Texas and New Mexico; and

An act (No. 305) to direct a reexamination of the account between the United States and the State of Maryland.

That the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. No. 209) entitled "An act for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont;" and to the bill (S. No. 344) entitled "An act for the relief of James Jeffries and Jeremiah M. Smith."

Also, that the Senate had rejected the bill (H. R. No. 404) entitled "An act to change the day for the annual assembling of Congress."

Also, informing the House that the Senate had passed the following bill and joint resolution:

H. R. No. 342. An act to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad therein.

H. R. No. 27. Joint resolution directing the connection of the public surveys in Alabama, with the boundary line between the States of Alabama and Florida.]

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled the following bills; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker:

Act for the relief of Joseph Jeffries and Jeremiah M. Smith; and Act for the relief of Ira Day, of Vermont.

The House then resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DISNEY in the chair,) on

THE MEXICAN TREATY.

The CHAIRMAN stated that when the committee last rose it had under consideration a bill "to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic of the 30th December, 1853, as amended by the Senate of the United States," and that the pending question was on the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The general debate having been closed to-day at twelve o'clock, m., by order of the House, I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw the motion to strike out the enacting clause.

There was no objection, and the motion was withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question then recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HOUSTON. My amendment was made for the same purpose as the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee, and I now ask the unanimous consent to withdraw it.

There was no objection, and the amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. HOUSTON then obtained the floor, and addressed the committee an hour. At the commencement of his remarks, he caused to be read the resolutions adopted by the House of Representatives in 1796, after President Washington had declined to furnish the House with the correspondence connected with the Jay treaty, as embodying his views on the rights and duties of the House respecting appropriations for carrying out treaties; they having the right to deliberate on the expediency of the appropriation, and to determine and act thereon as in their judgment may be most conducive to the public good.

He said it was a fair deduction from the course of several gentlemen who spoke of the necessity of obtaining the correspondence, that they did not desire the information they seem to call for, because they slept on their rights until the moment when he said that he would call up the bill now pending.

He justified the President for not sending in the correspondence; and denied that the rights of the House had been invaded because the President did not consult the House before the recent treaty was made. It was not the duty of the President to do so, although the gentleman from Missouri argued to the contrary.

He then proceeded to show that every Administration, from the days of Washington to the present day, without a solitary exception, (except, perhaps, in several cases of Indian treaties,) has committed itself over and doubly over to the doctrine for which he (Mr. Houston) contended. There is not one case to sustain the gentleman from Missouri.

He denied that Mr. Jefferson ever consulted the House on the subject of the Louisiana treaty, and challenged Mr. BENTON to produce proof to the contrary. He referred to the course of the succeeding Administrations in support of his views.

His speech, withheld for revision, will be published in the Appendix.

Mr. BENTON. Debate is terminated; but I desire to propound a question to the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is terminated on the bill, under the order of the House, except as it is provided for under the five-minute rule. Gentlemen may propose amendments, and speak five minutes in explanation of them.

Mr. BENTON. Without going through the formality of a pro forma motion to amend, I suppose that gentlemen will hardly refuse to allow me to say a word upon two points.

Several MEMBERS. Adhere to the rule.

Mr. BENTON. Then I move to reduce the appropriation one dollar.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is better to settle that point at the start.

Mr. PRESTON. I will make a point of order, at the request of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, at this stage of the proceedings. I conceive that a motion to alter the amount appropriated by the bill for carrying out the treaty is not in order, because that would be to exercise the treaty-making power, in fact, by the House, which is reposed by the Constitution in the President and the Senate. We must take the appropriation bill as it stands, exercising our discretion to accept or to reject it as it stands, and making no substantial amendment. I do not make my point of order for the purpose of precluding other amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would inquire if the gentleman from Kentucky rises to a point of order in reference to the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. PRESTON. I do raise it with all respect to him. But he can make an informal amendment to the bill. I desire the decision of the Chair now upon that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to overrule the point of order presented by the gentleman from Kentucky, and the Chair does it. The Chair thinks that it is competent for this House to vote any particular sum of money which, in its discretion, it thinks fit to be applied for any particular purpose for which it is asked; either to refuse it entirely, or to give any amount, consulting its own discretion. Whether it be or be not inconsistent with functions devolved upon the President and the Senate, is not for the House to inquire.

Mr. PRESTON. I shall not take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, though I do not think it would be a bill for an appropriation at all. My impression is, that it would not be in order to vote any other sum than that which the treaty contemplates.

Mr. BENTON. I move pro forma to reduce the amount one dollar, and will consume my five minutes. The Representative from Alabama [Mr. HOUSTON] falls heavily upon two gentlemen from New York, [Messrs. HAVEN and PECKHAM,] for having slept upon their rights; for not having applied in time for these papers; for not having applied when the message came in; for not having applied to the committee to call for them.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. I understand the rule to be that when an amendment is offered, the gentleman who offers it is compelled to confine his remarks to the subject-matter of the amendment. The gentleman from Missouri is not so doing, and consequently is out of order.

Mr. BENTON. I hope these questions of order will not be taken out of my five minutes.

I never am willing to repeat what passes between two members in their seats; but I leave it to that member [Mr. Houston] to say whether or not the moment the message was brought in and referred, I did not go to him and ask for the papers? And when he said that there were none that came with it, whether I did not insist that the committee should call for them? I leave it to him to answer.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Missouri and myself have had two or three conversations about these papers. I remember no such conversation as he refers to. I had no idea that the gentleman wanted to call for the papers until Monday morning. He may have said it to me, but I remember no such thing.

Mr. BENTON. Does he not remember my coming to him and asking him if the committee would call for them?

Mr. HOUSTON. You may have done it; but I remember no such thing.

Mr. BENTON. It is for these reasons that I never like to tell anything which passes privately between two gentlemen. But I thought I went to him. I thought I asked for the papers.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not remember anything about it. I know we had several conversations about the papers.

Mr. BENTON. My recollection is, that I did talk with the gentleman, and that we became rather pointed in our talk. My recollection is, that I insisted that it was the duty of the committee to bring those papers before the House; but he did not think so. That is my recollection.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the rules be enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia raises the question of order, that the gentleman from Missouri has offered an amendment, and does not confine his remarks to the explanation of that amendment. The Chair overrules the question of order, upon the ground that he understands the present colloquy between the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Alabama to be a personal matter, and partaking of a privileged character.

Mr. SEWARD. I did not understand the gentleman from Missouri as basing his remarks upon the ground that it was a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the proceeding between the gentleman from Missouri and Alabama to be as he has stated.

Mr. McMULLIN. If the gentleman from Missouri rises to a personal explanation, in connection with what passed between him and the gentleman from Alabama, I will not object, otherwise I do object upon the ground taken by the gentleman from Georgia; and upon that ground I shall take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to know if a personal explanation can come into the committee as a question of privilege?

Mr. SEWARD. I understand the gentleman from Missouri to have made a distinct motion to amend this bill, and to base his remarks upon that amendment. I submit, therefore, that no question of privilege, or a personal explanation, is raised. I did not understand the gentleman to put it upon that ground. And I do not understand that a question of privilege can arise upon a motion of that sort.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark, that a question may be pending, and a subsequent question may arise, and although that question may be pending, it will not prevent the introduction and decision of a personal matter which, according to the rules of courtesy and the usages of all legislative bodies, is tolerated and recognized as a matter of privilege.

Mr. SEWARD. I think the Chair is raising a collateral issue.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will repeat his decision.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, sir, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri offers an amendment to the pending bill. Subsequent to that motion, and while it was pending, he entered into a matter of privilege, in the judgment of the Chair, but not affecting the original motion, or his rights under that motion. To this course the gentleman from Georgia takes exception, and raises a question of order, that the gentleman has no right to introduce questions of this sort during the pendency of the original amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to the manner in which the gentleman states the case.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order, and from that decision the gentleman from Georgia takes an appeal; and the question is, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?"

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I merely wish to ask the Chair, if ever, in his recollection, there has been a question of privilege arisen in the Committee of the Whole heretofore?

Mr. RICHARDSON. There was never such a question raised before.

Mr. JONES. I submit to the Chair, and to the committee, that debate having been terminated by order of the House, the only debate in order in committee is that which may take place under the five-minute rule, upon the amendment made by the mover, in explanation of it, and by the one first getting the floor in opposition. I submit further to the Chair, that no personal explanation can be made in the House except by the unanimous consent of the House, and that the committee have no right to suspend the rules, even by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark, in the first place, that the rules of the House, by an express rule, apply in the Committee of the Whole, so far as they are applicable. Now, the rules of courtesy, as well as the usage of the House, and of every other deliberative body, tolerate personal matters as being of a privileged character. And the Chair repeats, what he said a moment since, that, although another question may be pending, yet a question of privilege may still arise while it is pending. In that light the Chair understands the matter before the House. The gentleman from Missouri made a motion to amend, and while that motion was pending, became involved in a personal matter with the gentleman from Alabama of a privileged character.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I desire to ask the Chair a single question. He has correctly stated that the rules of the House are applicable to proceedings in the Committee of the Whole. In order to make explanations in the House, there must be unanimous consent. If that be so, then must there not be unanimous consent for the same purpose in the Committee of the Whole?

Mr. McMULLIN. I understood the gentleman from Georgia as raising his question of order on the ground that a motion had been made to reduce the appropriation one dollar, and that the member from Missouri was departing from the discussion of that amendment. That was the ground of the gentleman's point of order. The Chair has overruled that point, from which decision the gentleman has taken an appeal; and I think that the appeal has been well taken.

Mr. SEWARD. I desire that the House should understand this matter, and that the Chair and myself should understand each other. I think the Chair is raising a collateral issue for the purpose of getting a vote on this question.

Now let us examine the question. The gentleman from Missouri proposes to reduce the appropriation one dollar. He also proposed to discuss that amendment under the rules of the House. Failing to do that, and seeking to go into an investigation of a matter which had already been discussed by members on this floor, in reference to the application for the papers connected with the making of this treaty, a dispute arose between the gentleman from Missouri and the gentleman from Alabama. I understood the Chair to decide that the question was a privileged one; that matters of public record and history are privileged questions, and that therefore he would indulge the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. It can hardly be necessary for the Chair to repeat that, under the rules of the House giving the privilege of five minutes' explanation, he would not hesitate to decide the member must be confined to the terms of the rule. That is to say, his remarks must be confined to an explanation of the pending amendment. If that point of order had been raised by the gentleman from Georgia, or any other member, the Chair would have so ruled. It is not as supposed by the gentleman from Georgia. The Chair did not overrule any such point. The Chair has attempted to explain, but he has evidently been unfortunate in doing so.

Pending a motion to amend, a question of a personal character arose, and the Chair, according to the usage of the House, tolerated it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to suggest to the committee, that, independent of the point which the Chair makes to sustain itself, the remarks of the member from Missouri are in order on the merits of his proposition.

Mr. HENN. I rise to a question of order. The appeal is not debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will remark that this whole discussion is out of order.

[Cries of "That is right!"]

Mr. CAMPBELL. It is very remarkable that the Chair has only just found that out.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. The gentleman from Tennessee, the gentleman from Georgia, and the gentleman from Illinois, have all been indulged, and without objection. Is not a gentleman on the opposite side of the House allowed to say one word?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Was I not entitled to the floor?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will repeat, that under the order of the House limiting debate, all this discussion is out of order. It has been indulged by the Chair until his attention was specially called to it by gentlemen, and demand made for the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Then the rule is brought to bear on me and not upon others.

The CHAIRMAN. It had to be brought to bear at some time.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I demand tellers on the appeal.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. Dawson and Latham were appointed.

The question was taken; and the tellers reported—ayes 76, noes 73.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. PERKINS, of Louisiana. The decision of the Chair has not been understood in this part of the Hall, and it is suggested that the Chair would repeat it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair simply decided that a matter of personal explanation was privileged in committee as well as in the House.

Mr. PERKINS. That the five-minute rule did not apply to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not say that.

Mr. BENTON. I would be very sorry to give any trouble to the House; and for the purpose of getting out of all this trouble, I withdraw the amendment I offered, and offer this one.

At the end of the bill add the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the sum herein appropriated shall be drawn from the Treasury until the President shall first have communicated to this House all the correspondence, instructions, &c., &c., connected with the negotiation of the treaty.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a point of order. I do not think that the amendment is germane to the main question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unfortunate in not concurring with the gentleman from Georgia on that point.

Mr. SEWARD. Well, I sympathize with the Chair in his misfortune. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment limiting the time at which the appropriation shall be paid is germane and in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of privilege. I am very willing to hear the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, but I wish to be informed upon a point. I understood that a resolution to close the general debate upon this treaty at twelve o'clock to-day was agreed to. Well, now, sir, the question which I wish to be informed on—I do not raise it—is this: Whether general debate can continue under the five-minute rule, or whether, under that rule, members are not to be confined to the amendments offered, and not to be allowed to enter into general debate, in favor of or against the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. In reply to the gentleman from Virginia, the Chair can but say that the rule expressly directs—and the construction of the House upon it has been—that the discussion shall be limited to explanations of the amendment.

Usage, however, has given a wider latitude in too many cases.

Mr. BENTON. Mr. Chairman, I believe that that amendment opens the question as to the papers. I therefore repeat what I think I did the moment the President's message was delivered to this House and referred. I think I went to the member from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and asked him if the papers were sent down. I think he said no. I think, then, that I spoke to him several different times about the committee getting these papers; and the last time I insisted that the committee ought to get them. That is what I think; and that he thought very differently from me, and we parted with different opinions upon that point. This is what I believe in respect to it; and if I am right in my recollection, the two gentlemen from New York are not subject to the censure which has, perhaps, been thrown upon them, of delaying to make application for these papers. I applied to the committee, because I felt that it would be hardly possible to get a resolution through the House, and because I thought it was a case in which you could not expect that no member of this House would object.

This is what I think; and I shall not object to the member from Alabama giving his recollection upon the same point.

Now, Mr. Chairman, with respect to the cases which I cited, in which there were laws of Congress appropriating money before the treaties were ratified, I limited myself to the instances in which the negotiation had ripened into an acquisition. I did not go into others at all. I took the three cases of Louisiana, Florida, and California, in each of which, before any treaty was made, a legislative act was passed appropriating the money. I knew there had been many more than those which the gentleman quoted. During Mr. Polk's administration, Secretary Buchanan authorized $100,000,000 to be offered for Cuba. I knew of these incipient steps, and I might have used broader language, but I was confining myself to cases in which negotiation had ripened into acquisition; the whole point was, that there was a legislative sanction before there was an acquisition.

Now, sir, Mr. Jefferson did not send down a message in writing; but, sir, nobody can make me believe that his friends did not all talk about it, and that Mr. Smith, of Maryland, and his closest supporters and counselors—for Mr. Jefferson had counselors in Congress—did not agree upon the matter between them, and that they were not supported by all the power of Mr. Jefferson's friends in the House. The measure passed the House, and it was sent to the Senate. That was in 1803; and when the treaty came back, Mr. Jefferson, in communicating it to the Congress of the United States, used these remarkable words—I quote from memory, though I presume I can state the language correctly—"that the provisional appropriation of two millions, made the preceding session, was considered as conveying the sanction of the House to the proposed acquisition." Consequently it was done before the acquisition.

So much for the act of 1803. Afterwards, I know Mr. Jefferson—and if I did not mention it in my speech, it was because I was in a hurry, although the House had given its previous sanction to the acquisition by this two million appropriation—in his message, did not demand the money as a matter of right under this treaty, but sent it in for the legislative consideration of the House, with a full acknowledgment of their right to grant it, or not to grant it, even after they had given their sanction. If I did not mention this fact—and the gentleman thinks I did not—it was upon my mind to be used as an argument, and one of the strongest arguments to show that Mr. Jefferson sent it to the House for their legislative consideration, leaving it to them to confirm or reject it, although he had their previous sanction.

In 1806, exactly the same thing took place in relation to the acquisition of Florida, and the same process was gone through. A motion was made in the House, and the sum was voted; and attempts were made to acquire Florida. Spain was willing to sell; but, irritated by the expeditions continually gotten up in the United States to invade her territory, she would not yield her consent as soon as she otherwise would have done.

I will merely say that the California treaty went through exactly the same process.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Missouri has attempted to state personal matters between him and myself, or I should not have troubled the committee again on this subject. Now, sir, while I reprobate in the strongest terms any attempt upon the part of any one to bring into a public debate private conversations that are not intended to be made public, I confess I feel rather humiliated that a gentleman with the experience of the gentleman from Missouri should bring before this committee a private conversation which he alleges to have taken place between him and myself.

Mr. BENTON. I should not have done it if the gentleman had not made charges against me.

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir, it never should have been done. Now, sir, so far as any conversation between the gentleman from Missouri and myself is concerned, before last Monday morning, I say again that I have no recollection of it. And I will say, further, that I never either promised or intimated to that gentleman that I would call for these papers. I did no such thing.

Mr. BENTON. No; you told me expressly that you would not call for them, and I so stated.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then why all this child's play in bringing the matter before the committee? Why disclose a private conversation to sustain it? Why bring this matter before the committee, when the gentleman says that I promptly told him that I would not call for the papers?

Then, sir, the gentleman stands upon his rights. Well, sir, why did he sleep upon his rights until Monday morning, at which time I had given notice that I would attempt to call up this bill? If I told him what he says I did, it was his province and his right to demand the correspondence. He makes no charge upon me, although he has seen fit to bring in a private conversation.

Mr. BENTON. No, I did not bring it in.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes, sir, bring in a private conversation; and yet there is not even a charge made against me by him. Now, sir, I attempted no censure upon the gentlemen from New York, [Messrs. HAVEN and PECKHAM;] but yet the gentleman from Missouri speaks of my censuring them. Sir, I did no such thing; I attempted no such thing; and if the language I made use of would imply anything of the sort, I did not so intend it. I merely said, that as the gentlemen slept over the matter for days, until it was too late, and then complained that they could not get the correspondence, I had a right to draw the deduction that they did not want it for their own information.

But the gentleman says that he confined himself to the cases of Louisiana, Florida, and California. I have already shown, that in the former case, correspondence for the purchase was actually commenced more than twelve months before the $2,000,000 were appropriated. I say, furthermore, that in my poor comprehension, it is a very lame get-out for the gentleman to say that the friends of Mr. Jefferson asked for the appropriation. The gentleman got up in the House the other day, and, without qualification, alleged that Mr. Jefferson did not make a move in the matter of the treaty referred to until after he had consulted the House of Representatives, and had the money placed at his disposal. He did so without any message or anything else to bear him out. The gentleman speaks of consultation. Yes, sir, consultation. When the President wishes to communicate anything to either branch of Congress he does so by message; and unless the gentleman can show one, I say his argument goes for nothing.

Mr. PECKHAM. I move to amend the amendment so that the bill shall not take effect until two days after the communication of the correspondence.

Mr. SEWARD. I notify the gentleman that I shall insist on his confining his remarks to the amendment. Personal explanations are now through with, I believe.

Mr. PECKHAM. I do not know about that. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words in answer to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SEWARD. I make the point of order here. I insist that the gentleman must confine his remarks to his amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is bound to presume that the gentleman will conform to the rule. As yet, he has said nothing to indicate to the Chair that he will not do so.

Mr. SEWARD. He announces that he is going to reply to the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The announcement of an intention is not a violation of the rule.

Mr. PECKHAM. The gentleman from Alabama has chosen to tell the committee that the application for these papers should have come on Thursday, or some subsequent day of last week, and that the delay until last Monday showed that the desire to obtain them was not really sincere.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must arrest the gentleman in his present course of remark. The rule is express that remarks must be in explanation of, or opposition to, the amendment pending.

Mr. PECKHAM. I wish to show, sir, the propriety of having these papers; and then, that they should be here for so long a time, before the appropriation can be used or passed.

The CHAIRMAN. That is legitimate, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. PECKHAM. The gentleman took that position. He has now told the committee and the country that we could have as well applied for these papers any day after last Wednesday as we could on Monday last; that it would have been as regular. That the committee know is not correct. Monday is resolution day; and if objection to the introduction of a resolution be made on that day, a motion can be made to suspend the rules; and if two thirds agree to it, the resolution may be introduced; whereas, on any other day than on Monday, a single objection defeats the resolution. On Monday last the gentleman from Alabama deprived me of the opportunity of moving to suspend the rules, by previously moving to go into committee, and refusing to withdraw his motion, which had a preference.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. PECKHAM. Has the gentleman from Georgia risen again to a point of order? I hope that he will not make it on me.

Mr. SEWARD. I will withdraw it.

Mr. LETCHER. I renew it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will rule that the gentleman must confine himself to the amendment he has offered.

Mr. PECKHAM. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houston] told us that he was really willing to have the papers laid before the House, if we had only applied within a reasonable time. Pray, sir, what would have been a reasonable time in the gentleman's view? Would last Thursday or last Friday—three days before we applied? Would sixty or forty-eight hours before have been a reasonable time? How accurate and close the gentleman is in his time of reason—or reasonable time. Monday, the very first regular moment, was just too late; and, sir, Thursday or Friday would have been just too early. The time would have been irregular and out of time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must again interrupt the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PECKHAM.]

[Cries of "Go on!" "Go on!"]

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the gentleman from New York going on. Let us have the rules enforced.

The CHAIRMAN. Any remarks of the gentleman from New York as to the propriety of furnishing the papers within two days would be legitimate, but outside of that they would not be in order.

Mr. PECKHAM. I leave this point, sir. If one half of the time spent by the gentleman from Alabama and his friends in efforts to avoid and evade the presentation of the papers connected with this treaty, and in giving excuses for objecting, had been appropriated to furnishing them, we would have had them in time, and this committee and the country would have had the benefit of them. The gentleman from Alabama makes the pretense now that he was very willing to favor the production of these papers, if the application had only come in time. Has not the course pursued by the gentleman warranted me in saying that his purpose was fixed never to trust those papers to this House?

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the Chair to enforce its decisions. The Chair has decided three or four times that the gentleman from New York was not in order; but he has paid no respect to the decision.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] has exhausted his time.

Mr. ORR. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, and I hope the committee will come to a vote upon it.

Mr. PECKHAM's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred upon Mr. BENTON's amendment.

Mr. HAVEN. I desire, for the purpose of saying a few words, to renew the motion of my colleague, restricting it to nine days instead of two. I submit to this committee, it is proper that this correspondence should be laid before the public, and I claim that this House should have it long enough before the money is used to enable it to interfere. In case the correspondence shows what has been intimated and alleged here, and in other places, that it would show when published, we ought to have time to act upon it. Now, I would not make this limitation of time nine days, if it was not for the tenacity and pertinacity of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, in endeavoring to crowd gentlemen here, who, in good faith, have asked him to wipe off this reproach from the Administration. The tenacity with which he holds on to this measure, shows that there is "something rotten in Denmark." There is no court on earth, that I know of, where a man is arraigned in a criminal case, unless it is in a capital case, and he stands silent, it is not adjudged a plea of guilty.

Why, then, has there been this tenacity exhibited on the part of my friend on the other side? Why can he not let us have the correspondence? Is he afraid of it? I, for one, will not have this issue changed. The issue is not whether the correspondence was asked for in time. It is whether they dare let us have the papers. That is the issue, and I hold him to it.

Mr. ASHE. I have heard with a great deal of surprise the remarks of my friend from New York in reference to the amendment which he submitted. He demands that, as a matter of right, this House be put in possession of these papers. Now, the question of right is a matter of controversy. For my part, I deny that we have a right to call for them. I deny that the President has, in any manner, compromised the privileges of this House by declining to send these letters with his message. This is an old question. It has been long argued in the country, and it has been asserted and held, time after time, that we have no right to such correspondence. Why have we not? Because the House of Representatives is not a part of the treaty-making power. I hold in my hand a message from General Washington to the fourth Congress, which has been, no doubt, referred to during this debate, which satisfied my mind upon this point. In that case he expressly refused to communicate papers. Congress, he says, in pursuance of the powers granted by the Constitution, must appropriate money to fulfill a treaty; but that they can only object to the treaty on two grounds—either that it is in opposition to the Constitution of the country, or that the execution of the treaty will engender consequences so injurious to the interests of the country as to justify their opposition.

We are not the treaty-making power. We can only participate in it by implication, as a legislative branch. Now, what information could these papers afford us, even if we had them for this purpose? Could they enlighten us on the point as to whether the treaty is constitutional or not? We could get no information whatever from them on that point. It would determine nothing. We have the treaty, and can see whether it is constitutional or not. And, sir, if it is unconstitutional, or incompatible with the public interests, let us refuse the appropriation. But what information can the papers give you on this subject? But they say, why have not the papers been communicated before? Have we demanded them? The President did not know that the House desired them.

Sir, the convention which framed the Constitution expressly decided that this House should have no power in making a treaty. This constituted one of the chief objections of the larger States to its adoption. North Carolina and Pennsylvania offered amendments to the Constitution giving us this power; but these amendments were never adopted. The best interest of the country demands that we should keep separate and distinct the divisions of power under the Constitution. Nothing short of stern necessity should induce us to arrogate power which does not belong to us. This treaty, as I conceive, presents no such case; and, therefore, I cannot accede to the course which we have been urged by its opponents to adopt.

The question was then taken on Mr. HAVEN's amendment; and it was rejected.

Mr. HARRIS, of Mississippi. I move pro forma to amend the amendment, so as to postpone the operation of the bill for eight days.

I look upon the negotiations with Mexico as a piece of unmixed, unmitigated stupidity, from the beginning to the end. In this respect there is nothing equal to it except the debate to which it has given rise in this House. The treaty against which you have all argued, the President's treaty, has been repudiated and rejected; the treaty which the House is called upon to consider, is a treaty made by ourselves, made by our Senate; it is a proposition which we deliberately made to Mexico, and which she has accepted. There may have been more or less of intrigue and fraud in the first treaty; it was a bad treaty, undoubtedly, and, for that reason, was promptly rejected. I will vote for the appropriation, but with no great degree of satisfaction. Five millions would have been readily accepted. So much for the treaty.

I desire to call attention to a kindred subject. Mexican negotiations naturally ally themselves to Spanish negotiations. This President, like his predecessor, exhibits promptitude of action against our own people. The Cuban troubles are about to end as they ended in Mr. Fillmore's time. Dogberry and Verges have discovered the conspiracy, and there is the end of it. What I desire to say is, that when the President thinks proper to proclaim against my people in the South, I want him to preserve some sort of uniformity. I demand a proclamation against the citizens of Missouri, who have notoriously combined to resist emigration to Kansas. They are striking openly and boldly at our most cherished privileges. The Nebraska bill is dubious, the rifle is certain; courts err, but the Missouri rifle rarely misses. It is a significant commentary, this Missouri movement.

Mr. DEAN. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi, and ask for the vote.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MCNAIR. I move that the committee do now rise; and upon that motion I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CAMPBELL and WHEELER were appointed.

The question was taken, and the motion was disagreed to; the tellers having reported—Yes 62, noes 81.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I move to amend by providing that the law shall not go into effect until four days after the President has communicated the correspondence in reference to this treaty to the House.

Mr. MAXWELL. I rise to a question of order. I would not make the point, but similar amendments have been already entertained, and may be entertained hereafter. I make the point that an amendment inconsistent with the main proposition of the bill cannot be entertained. I submit to the Chair and the committee that this amendment, which presupposes a call on the Executive for correspondence in connection with this treaty, which, in fact, has not been made, is inconsistent with the main proposition of the bill, and cannot be entertained.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the truth of the doctrine laid down by the gentleman from Florida, that if an amendment is inconsistent with the body of a bill, or repugnant to it, it is out of order. But whether the amendment proposed in the present instance is so repugnant, is for the committee to decide. The Chair cannot say that it is so repugnant as to come within the rule.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Ohio. I assure the gentleman from Alabama that it is not my intention to say anything prejudicial to the Committee of Ways and Means. I did suppose that, with so large a majority in the House—sufficiently large to pass this bill—they would have done away with any objection that might have been urged against the bill upon the ground that we had not sufficient information before us upon which to base our action. I desired, in all good faith, to vote for this treaty, if I could see my way clear.

I listened with the utmost attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HOBSON], and others who have spoken upon this subject, and endeavored to come to such a conclusion. But the only information I have in regard to the necessity of appropriating $10,000,000, is that gathered from the newspapers, the rumors circulating in the streets, and the individual opinions of gentlemen upon this floor. I desire more particularly to reply to the remarks of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. ASHE], who said, as I understood it, that this House has no right to call for the papers in this case. Can it be possible that, in reference to a treaty for which we are called to make an appropriation of $10,000,000, we have no right to call upon the President for the papers relating to it? I say that we have such a right; and while I have a seat in this Hall I shall insist on it. I will not censure the President if he says he cannot communicate the papers to us without doing injury to the public interests. It would be the duty of President Pierce to say that he could not communicate the information in relation to this treaty, if it could not be done without injury to the public service; and, for one, I should be satisfied with that communication.

It is said in the newspapers throughout the country, that some of the correspondence in reference to this treaty is utterly derogatory, and disgraceful to the United States. I do not believe it. I wish the President of the United States—whether he concurs with me in political sentiment makes no difference with me—to convey such information as he can to this House; and if I can sustain him in his acts, I will do so. I never acquiesced in the sentiment that we have no right to call upon the Executive for papers. We are now called upon to make an appropriation of $10,000,000 to pay for territory, and abrogate an article in the treaty which we have made heretofore; and I say we have the right to call for the papers in the case; and the President, according to his discretion, has the right to withhold them or not. Can it be possible that this House will say that we have not the right to call upon the President for this information? I, for one, insist that we have the right to call upon the President for it, and that he has the right to communicate it, if he thinks proper to do so.

My principal objection to this treaty is, that a large majority of this House are for withholding information in regard to it. Why was it not given to us on last Monday? In my opinion it might have been sent to us within two hours; and during that day the House could have received it without doing injury to the public service. And when he had communicated that much of his information, I, for one, would have acquitted him of all impropriety in the matter. Sir, he is not chargeable now with the course of gentlemen on this floor, or with the single objection which met the gentleman from New York, [Mr. PECKHAM.] When it is said "You shall not offer your resolution; you shall not have the desired information; you are required to vote this appropriation of $10,000,000," it is as if it were said, "Stand and deliver; you are not worthy to receive information at the hands of the Executive." Now, while I am disposed to acquit the President of the United States of each and every impropriety, I will stand here to do justice to the House of Representatives against each and every President, and against each and every majority who will thus radically withhold information which ought to be communicated to the Representatives of the people on this floor.

It has been said to me privately by an eminent Democratic gentleman connected with the public service, that he believed it was the duty of the President to have sent with this treaty all the information in his power to enlighten the Representatives of the people, and to enable them to form their judgment. Now, we have asked for information; you refused to give it to us. The only thing for us, then, to do, is to vote no. For my part, I have, on this account, made up my mind to vote against the bill, although I had earnestly desired to sustain it.

Mr. Chairman, this is a high prerogative of the House of Representatives. If you abandon it today, you may, in the course of two or three weeks, be required to abandon it in some other cases. We have other treaties pending, and I think that every member of this House ought to be more zealous to maintain its rights, than to make a treaty with the quondam savior of Mexico and with its quasi Emperor. If there is a necessity for a southern Pacific railroad route; if it is necessary to abrogate the eleventh article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo; if it is necessary for us to have a right of way across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, let us negotiate a treaty in a fair and honorable way, and let the negotiations be submitted to the Representatives of the people.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment of my friend from Ohio. I fully agree with him in his position that the House of Representatives has a right to call for information on such a subject; and if any gentleman had made the motion, I should have voted for it at any previous time; while the President would then be at liberty to decide whether or not it was compatible with the public interest to give the information asked for. The nature of that correspondence would not influence my vote. I do not know whether or not there is anything in the correspondence to hurt the Administration, Mexico, or anybody else. My vote would not be influenced by it. Therefore I am not disposed to delay the passage of the bill, or to vote for the amendment of my friend with a view to delay the ratification of the treaty. I presume it is the desire of the friends of the measure to vote upon it to-day, because unless it passes the House to-day, I do not believe that it could be got through the Senate in time. We are under the obligation, if we pass the bill at all, to pass it to-day. Therefore I hope, as I presume that every gentleman has made up his mind, that we will come to an understanding, and vote upon it this evening.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. TAYLOR; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on Mr. BENTON's amendment, it was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PRESTON. I now move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House.

Mr. PECKHAM. I move to reduce the appropriation $500.

Mr. HENDRICKS. You have not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. PECKHAM. I believe I have the right to offer an amendment.

Mr. PRESTON. I believe I have the floor. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a question of order. I present the question of order, not because I desire to offer any amendment; for I assure the committee I shall not do so. My point is, that the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is not in order. I need not repeat the reasons given the other day, when this same point arose.

A MEMBER. We all understand it.

Mr. PRESTON. Will the gentleman from Ohio permit me to say a word?

Mr. CAMPBELL. Certainly.

Mr. PRESTON. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. PECKHAM] desires to address the House, and therefore I withdraw my motion.

Mr. PECKHAM. I move to reduce the amount of the appropriation five dollars.

One chief purpose of this treaty, sir, seems to be, to obtain the cession of sufficient territory to secure a track for a Pacific road in the southern part of the country. I am in favor of it, so far as that point is concerned. I am quite willing that they should have a route. But it seems to be conceded that the town of El Paso ought for that purpose to be included in this territory. Now, the line of this new treaty runs three miles north of the town of El Paso. Captain Marcy, an accurate and scientific officer, reports on the map made by him that the line as run by Gray and Graham is eight miles north of El Paso. The south line of our territory, as fixed by this treaty, is just five miles south of that line, and, of course, three miles north of El Paso.

The object sought to be attained in that respect is not obtained, and it will leave room for a new negotiation to purchase more territory.

Another objection, which I will state, to this treaty—though I will not argue it on its merits under the circumstances—is, that it does not secure, as the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo did, the claims of our citizens upon the Government of Mexico. That treaty did provide that security, and many claims have been satisfied under it. Invited to do so by a circular issued by Mr. Walker, the then Secretary of the Treasury, many of our citizens took large quantities of merchandise to Mexico during our late war with that country, and while our armies were in her territory. When peace was declared, the goods in Mexico then undisposed of, owned by our citizens, were carefully guarded and secured to them by special and particular provisions inserted in the nineteenth article of that treaty; and yet our citizens owning that property were literally despoiled of their goods by the Mexican Government and their officials; the treaty, in that respect, was wholly disregarded and violated, and the property of our citizens sacrificed and entirely lost to them. Hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth were so lost to them, and claim has again and again been made by our Minister to that Government for redress, as I am informed, and we have applied in vain. Such claims for large amounts are now before our Government for relief against Mexico. A few days since I presented one for some $200,000 to this House. The attention of this Government had been fully called to this subject; and yet here we have a treaty negotiated and ratified, and the just claims of our own citizens upon the Mexican Government are entirely omitted, forgotten, or utterly neglected! We are paying over to an insolvent Government—a Government that may not, and probably will not, continue six months after this treaty shall be ratified—paying them $10,000,000; and yet we make no provision whatever to secure the just claims of our own citizens against that Government from this money! Ought we to sustain such a treaty by voting this appropriation?

Mr. WALSH. I had not designed to say anything in reference to this treaty. I was anything but favorably inclined towards it at first, and suppose I should have voted against it had there been no discussion upon it. But every argument that I have heard against it has weakened my opposition to it. Sir, with reference to these papers, and other objections that have been raised, I regard it as all moonshine. I suppose there are facts connected with the negotiation of this treaty that it is not proper the world should know. I am well aware, from my own personal knowledge, that there were facts connected with the introduction of Santa Anna into Mexico during the war that it is not proper for the world to know.

But I was opposed to the treaty mainly upon the ground that it gave $10,000,000 towards proping up a tottering despotism, which must naturally drop into our own hands. I was opposed to bolstering up a Government that affords no protection to property, and no protection to personal liberty, and that tramples upon the masses of the people. I was opposed to retarding that event which is looked for with confident hope by every good citizen in Mexico. But when I looked around, and saw the materials of which the opposition is composed, I must acknowledge that my doubts were shaken; so much so, that I am not certain that, if my vote should be necessary for the passage of the bill, I should vote in its favor on its final passage.

The question was taken; and Mr. PECKHAM's amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. PRESTON. I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, the chairman (Mr. DISNEY) reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House (No. 405) "to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic, of 30th December, 1853, as amended by the Senate of the United States," and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment, and with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move the previous question upon the engrossment of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read a third time.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be now put.

Mr. HOWE. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 103, nays 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abercrombie, Aiken, James O. Allen, Willis Allen, Ashe, David J. Bailey, Barksdale, Barry, Belcher, Bell, Bliss, Bocock, Boyce, Breckinridge, Bridges, Brooks, Caskie, Chamberlain, Chastain, Chrisman, Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Colquitt, Cox, Curtis, John G. Davis, Dawson, Dean, Disney, Dowdell, Eddy, Edmundson, John M. Elliott, Ellison, Ewing, Faulkner, Florence, Gamble, Goode, Greenwood, Grow, Sampson W. Harris, Hendricks, Henn, Hilker, Houston, Hunt, Ingersoll, Johnson, George W. Jones, J. Clancy Jones, Roland Jones, Keitt, Kerr, Kidwell, Kirtz, Lamb, Letcher, Lindsey, McDougall, McMullin, McNair, Macy, Maxwell, Smith Miller, Milson, Olds, Orr, Packard, Puryear, Reese, Richardson, Riddle, Robbins, Preston, Rufin, Seward, Shannon, Shaw, Stigleton, Samuel Rowe, William Smith, George W. NAYS—Messrs. Bennett, Benson, Benton, Campbell, Carpenter, Chandler, Cook, Crocker, Cullom, Thomas Davis, De Witt, Dick, Dickinson, Eastman, Thomas D. Eliot, Everhart, Farley, Fenton, Flagler, Giddings, Goodrich, Aaron Harlan, Harrison, Hastings, Haven, Heister, Howe, Hughes, Daniel F. Jones, Ketchum, Lindley, McCulloch, Matteson, Mayall, Middletown, John G. Miller, Morgan, Murray, Norton, Andrew Oliver, Mordecai Oliver, Parker, Peckham, Pennington, Bishop Perkins, Pringle, David Ritchie, Russell, Sabine, Sage, Sapp, Gerrit Smith, John L. Taylor, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Upham, Wade, Walley, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John Wentworth, Tappan Wentworth, and Wheeler—62.

So the bill was passed.

Previous to the announcement of the above vote, Mr. EWING said: I do not like to vote on so important a measure after so little discussion; but being the best that can be done now, but not the best under different auspices, I vote aye.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and that that motion to reconsider lie upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to reconsider the vote by which the title to the bill was adopted; and that that motion be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HENN, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as correctly enrolled an act of the following title; which thereupon received the signature of the Speaker:

An act to aid the Territory of Minnesota in the construction of a railroad therein.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and thereupon the House adjourned (at thirty minutes past four o'clock) until to-morrow at twelve o'clock, m.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 29, 1854.

Prayer by Rev. HENRY SLICER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to present the petition of Leonard Chase, and three hundred and two other inhabitants of Milford, New Hampshire, praying for the repeal of the fugitive slave act of 1850. I desire to state that this petition is not open to the same objections with regard to locality that were taken by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] the other day, in relation to the petition from Boston.

I have taken a little pains to look at the census, and I find the number of inhabitants of this town to be about two thousand, from which I suppose that these three hundred and two voters comprise pretty much all the voters in the town. The petition comes from the town of Milford, in the county of Hillsborough, which is, I believe, the native county of our present distinguished Chief Magistrate, and I suppose it will be entitled to some additional consideration on that account. I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The motion was agreed to.

ATMOSPHERIC TELEGRAPH.

Mr. MALLORY. The special committee to whom were referred the memorial and accompanying papers of Ithiel Richardson on the subject of the proposed atmospheric telegraph, have instructed me to make a report, and to ask that one hundred extra copies of it be printed. A bill will probably be reported by the committee at a subsequent period.

The report was ordered to be printed, and the motion to print one hundred extra copies was agreed to.

THE GADSDEN TREATY.

During the remarks of Mr. SEWARD, which follow, a message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McKean, Chief Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and the Mexican Republic, of the 30th December, 1853, as amended by the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask the general consent of the Senate to be allowed to take up that bill at once. It is to carry out the provisions of a treaty which we have ratified, and we have but little time left.

Mr. BADGER. What is the latest time?

Mr. HUNTER. This day.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest that the proposition of the Senator from New York must be first disposed of.

Mr. HUNTER. Of course I must have his consent.

Mr. SEWARD. I shall be very brief in my remarks.

The honorable Senator then continued his speech.

MAIL LINE TO CHINA.

Mr. GWIN. I ask the consent of the Senate to take up the bill reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads "to establish a line of steam mail ships between San Francisco, in California, and Shanghai, in China, touching at the Sandwich Islands and Japan."

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, the summer solstice is passed; the thermometer indicates 90°; time is becoming precious in the Senate; I shall, therefore, condense the explanation which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has instructed me to make.

The bill directs the Postmaster General to contract for five years with the lowest bidder, on fair competition, with good security, for the carriage of monthly mails between San Francisco, in California, and Shanghai, in China, by the way of the Sandwich Islands and Japan, in steam vessels of at least two thousand tons burden, constructed in the best manner with regard to speed and safety, at a cost of not more than $500,000 per annum, and directs also, that any deficiency of the accruing postages to defray the expense of the transaction, shall be paid by the Treasury of the United States.

Will the Senate please to consider that we have in operation a very perfect postal system, which pervades and penetrates all the inhabited regions of our country, while it is connected by steam mail vessels with similar European postal systems beyond the Atlantic, and that by this national agency, letters, newspapers, and commercial, scientific and political communications of all sorts, are regularly exchanged among the people of the United States, and those of western Europe. Will the Senate please to consider, also, that new efficiency has been recently given to these postal systems by the establishment of electric telegraphs coextensive with them on both continents. One hundred millions of letters pass through our own post offices annually.

Now, will the Senate once more consider that since our postal system thus described was established, we have forever ceased to be merely an Atlantic people, and that, on the contrary, having added to the Union one flourishing commercial State of vast dimensions, and also two territories which are soon to become States on the Pacific coast, and that being now engaged in filling up the territory thus rounded off, we have become a continental American Power, holding the same attitude to Asia that we do to Europe, and sustaining the same relations to the countries on each of those continents. What is now proposed is simply to extend our existing postal system westward on the Pacific ocean, so as to exchange intelligence with the nations dwelling on its islands and coasts as we already exchange intelligence with the nations that dwell on the islands and coasts of the Atlantic ocean. The very statement of the case in this form seems to me a complete demonstration. Nevertheless, I will briefly illustrate.

First. Please to look at the subject in its relation to the people of California, Oregon, and Washington. Those people morally, and by virtue of the Constitution, have rights in all respects equal with those which are enjoyed by their fellow-citizens residing on the Pacific coast. If the latter justly enjoy the aid of regular and speedy public mails in their intercourse with the countries accessible over the sea, which washes their shores, then, unless for some reason that must be assigned, the former have the same right to the aid of regular and speedy public mails in their intercourse with the countries accessible to them over the sea, which washes their shores. If this right should be absolutely denied, then they would be absolved from obligations of loyalty, and would seek to regain equality by separation and independence. I am sure that injustice will not be practiced so long as to give excuse for disloyalty. But this confidence, on the other hand, does not of itself justify postponement.

The measure proposed is not premature, if the extent of the national Pacific coast bears any fair proportion to the length of the national Atlantic coast, if there be in California and Oregon sufficient population, with adequate resources and capital for foreign trade and commerce, and if there be on the Asiatic coasts markets open and inviting such intercourse. All these conditions exist. Our Pacific coast stretches away from the thirty-first to the forty-ninth parallel—a length of sixteen hundred miles—without including the shores of the Straits of Fuca and of Puget's Sound, inland waters on the western, corresponding with the Gulf of St. Lawrence, on the eastern side of the continent. This coast is but little shorter than our Atlantic shore was before Florida was annexed to the United States. The population of California, Oregon, and Washington, already exceeds four hundred thousand, while San Francisco, the chief seat of their commerce, numbers fifty thousand. I need not expatiate on the commercial resources and capital of a people whose mines, besides the domestic supply, yield eighty millions of gold dust and bullion for exportation; or, to state the fact in another way, a people whose mines have, in six years, given stability and tone to our own before fluctuating currency, and enhanced sensibly the value of all property throughout the civilized world. As little is it necessary to enlarge on the commercial resources of the ancient "East," and the attractions it offers to the merchants of our western coasts. They have been, for four hundred years, the inspiration of human activity in its grandest development. British steamers connect all the principal ports of the Pacific and Indian oceans, from Australia to the Cape of Good Hope, and thus afford access to the places where are exchanged the productions of half of the population of the globe. Great Britain also carries on a trade in these ports of $200,000,000. But California, Oregon, and Washington have need of a trade unknown to Great Britain. With wide regions to reduce to cultivation, and gold-bearing mountains to be rendered productive, they need emigrant labor, while China and other Oriental countries have a population overcrowded and impoverished by ages of despotism, seeking escape to our newly discovered continent. But the inhabitants of our Pacific coast are not merely a mercantile people. Like all other American citizens, they are deeply interested in all the social, moral, and political movements of society in every part of the globe.

I submit then that the argument for the present measure is complete, even while it rests on the ground of its importance to the people of California, Oregon, and Washington. Happily, however, it is easy to show that in this case, as in most others, the local or sectional interests involved are inferior to the general interests of the Union. We have a habit of discussing questions of territorial enlargement, and of the extension of political and commercial influences and connections, with as much caution and anxiety as if we enjoyed always free choice to make, prevent, or control national movements in that direction. I grant that we do wisely when we refuse to commit ourselves blindly to the guidance of those who interpret to us what they are pleased to call our manifest destiny. And yet, sir, I confess that sometimes, when I take an outside position and review the thickly recurring changes through which we have passed, it seems to me that our course has been shaped, not so much by any self-guiding wisdom of our own, as by a law of progress and development impressed upon us by nature herself. When we consider the resistless impulses to expansion which have acted on the people of the United States during the last half century, together with the broad and tempting field which, at the beginning of that period stretched out from beneath their feet, and when we consider, in connection with these circumstances, how the Creole population who asserted claims to possess that field, had become physically and intellectually unable to defend it, and how France, consumed by anarchy and yet engaged in a death struggle with despotism, was unable to hold Louisiana, and that Spain, enervated by self-indulgence, sustained herself only by means of foreign aid, and was, therefore, obliged to relinquish Florida and Mexico, it is difficult to conceive how we could have much longer avoided that extension which has given us a broad region whose surplus productions must have way through many channels to western as well as eastern foreign markets. That extension has not only brought the Antilles under our constant surveillance, but has also brought us to confront the island and the coast of Asia, and obliged us to open passages to them across the territories of friendly Powers while preparing to make the more direct and important one over our own broad, but as yet imperfectly explored domain.

To what end has this expansion tended from the beginning? Whither does it now tend, if not to commerce and to influence on the islands and continents which lie between us and the setting sun? Beyond all doubt, this is its tendency, if we have sufficient resources and adequate vigor and energy to justify us in engaging in competition for that commerce. Great Britain largely monopolizes it, and yet, while her territory scarcely equals that of one of our largest States, her native resources are inferior to those of Virginia, or of Pennsylvania, or of Missouri, or of Texas, or of California alone. To speak of no others, Pennsylvania excavates coal from her mines at a rate of annual increase which promises $180,000,000 for the production of the year 1870. When we refer to our success in driving all competitors from the whaling fields under either pole; and when we find that our aggregate tonnage employed in commerce is already four million six hundred thousand tons, and exceeds that of Great Britain proper, is it not manifest that our energy and vigor have been proved beyond doubt or dispute?

The same tendency marks the political events which are occurring on the other side of the Pacific. Within ten years China, before closed against us, has opened to us five principal ports on various parallels of latitude along her entire coast. Just now a revolution is occurring there, doubtless the result of her departure from her ancient policy of exclusion, which seems likely to give us free access to every part of the Empire. Even while we have been engaged here in our annual labors, the news comes to us of the opening of three ports, with the addition of convenient stations for repairs and refitting in Japan; and we learn, also, that a messenger is on his way who brings to us a voluntary and unrestricted cession of the Hawaiian Islands.

The conclusion which follows the consideration of these events is, that the policy which the Atlantic nations have pursued so long, although so unsteadily, is on the eve of its consummation, that the East and the West, after a separation of three thousand years, are to be fraternally reunited. There is no Power but ourselves likely to either coöperate or compete with Great Britain in effecting that consummation. It is the proper work, not of one only, but of both of the branches of that great family which is spreading everywhere freedom and free religion with the capacious and comprehensive language of the British islands. If we abstain from such coöperation and competition altogether, then the trade and intercourse of the two hemispheres will pass around us, leaving to us only incidental benefits common to all other nations. If, on the contrary, we adopt the policy which has dictated this measure, and if we carry it out by extending our railroad, postal, and telegraph systems through our new Territories to the Pacific coast, then we shall not only open to all our cities and States the inestimable benefits of a liberal and active internal commerce, but we shall draw through our own ports and on our own Territories, as if it were a fertilizing river, the exchanges of the world.

The measure before us is less costly than any one we have heretofore adopted for a similar object. It calls for a smaller outlay than that by which we acquired Louisiana or California. If the whole expense were to fall on the Treasury, it would consume but $2,500,000 in five years; but the freights, passage money, and postages would, in the beginning, yield $200,000, and ultimately the mails would become a means of revenue.

We might perhaps wisely consent to delay the enterprise, if our commerce were not already in the Pacific ocean. It is there, and because it is there we have found it necessary to send a naval squadron there to secure it protection. National mails are every where equivalent to armed force for purposes of protection. Show me a place in the United States where the mails arrive and depart regularly, and frequently, and I will show you a place where a soldier on duty is never seen. Show me, on the other hand, a secluded region, where the post never or seldom penetrates, and I will show you the United States barracks and garrison. It is just so at sea. You had no mail intercourse with Japan, therefore you sent a squadron there to prevent the sailors driven on shore in distress from being exhibited in cages throughout the Empire. You have no postal connections with Africa, and therefore you maintain a squadron there to protect your own seamen, and prevent the slave trade.

I conclude with a practical illustration. Here is a letter and here a newspaper, the one written, the other printed, at Hong Kong, in China. They brought us the first intelligence of Commodore Perry's great treaty with Japan. They bear the post-mark of Hong Kong, but for want of a national mail they have reached us, not by conveyance across the Pacific and in our own mails across Panama, but by taking their circuitous way through India and the Isthmus of Suez, and over the Mediterranean sea, and then, after being stamped in the post office at London, they came to us over the Atlantic ocean. California and Oregon, nearer by two thousand miles to Hong Kong, and more deeply interested than we, got the same news nearly a month after it reached us—indebted for it to the mail steamers between New York and San Francisco.

British statesmen sometimes break the seals of letters on a plea of political necessity. Are we, who have conquered freedom from search on the high seas, willing that our Asiatic correspondence shall be subjected to the surveillance of the British Government through the post office? I think not.

During the course of Mr. SEWARD's remarks, Mr. ADAMS said: I rise to a point of order. It is whether it is competent for any Senator proposing to make a report to go on and make a regular argument in favor of that report before it is presented to the Senate?

Mr. SEWARD. The report was made some days ago, and the bill is now under consideration. Mr. ADAMS. It seems to me that it has not been taken up.

Mr. SEWARD. I think it was taken up, and it is now on its passage, I trust.

The PRESIDENT. A motion was made by the Senator from California to proceed to the consideration of the bill, but the motion was not put to the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. No objection was made, and the bill is before the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS. I understood the Senator from California to give way to the Senator from New York.

Mr. GWIN. No, sir; the bill is under consideration.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw the point of order. Mr. SEWARD continued his remarks. When he had concluded,

The PRESIDENT said: The Chair will state to the Senate that there is no proposition before the body, unless it be the report which the Chair understood the Senator from New York proposed to make.

Mr. GWIN. I made the motion to take up the bill on which the Senator from New York has made his remarks, and that motion was agreed to, as I understood.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair understood the Senator from California to withdraw his motion to enable the Senator from New York to make a report.

Mr. GWIN. The President is mistaken.

The PRESIDENT. The question is, will the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 411, which the Senator from California moves to take up?

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that motion will not be agreed to. We have a bill before us, making an appropriation for carrying out the Mexican treaty, which has to be considered.

Mr. GWIN. The steam mail ship bill was brought up, on my motion, before the ten million bill came from the House. I do not intend to interpose any objection to that bill; but the understanding of the Senate was that the other bill was taken up, and the Senator from New York was making his speech upon it.

Mr. HUNTER. The question is on taking up the bill which the Senator from California refers to, as I understand.

The PRESIDENT. That is the question.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe, if that is taken up, it will lead to debate, because the Senate is divided upon it. I therefore shall vote against taking it up. I hope the Senate will not take it up, but that the ten million bill will be taken up. There is a pressing necessity for acting upon that bill, to make the appropriation to carry out the treaty.

Mr. GWIN. We proceeded to the consideration of the steam mail ship bill. The Senator from New York, supposing it to be under consideration, addressed the Senate upon it. I hope the Senate will not interpose objection to it.

Mr. HUNTER. I understood the Chair to decide that we have not proceeded to its consideration; but that the question is whether we shall do so?

Mr. GWIN. The universal understanding of the Senate was, that it was under consideration.

The PRESIDENT. That was not the understanding of the Chair. The Chair understood the Senator from California to withdraw his motion to take up the bill.

On a division fourteen Senators voted in favor of taking up the bill.

Mr. CASS. I think the question is not understood.

The PRESIDENT. The Chair will state it again, if desired.

Mr. BELL. Do I understand if this bill is taken up, and it leads to debate, that it will be permitted to go over?

Mr. GWIN. Certainly. I am perfectly willing that the ten million bill should be acted upon to-day; and if the consideration of this bill leads to a long debate I shall be willing to let it go over.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to the Senator from California to permit the ten million bill to be acted on. After that I shall not object to taking up his bill. Certainly the ten million bill ought to be acted on first.

Mr. GWIN. If the bill which I have moved to take up should lead to such discussion as to consume the day, I should let it go over. I do not think it is right to put off a bill of more importance to the country than that, in order to take up a bill which will consume the whole day. I understand the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHIELDS] intends to move an Executive session on the ten million bill. We can dispose of this bill in an hour at the utmost extremity. I am not going to speak upon it. I hope the whole Senate understands the question. The other bill is going to lead to a long discussion, and will probably consume the day. We have had a speech on this bill. We want a reply to it. I hope it will be taken up and disposed of. It certainly was the understanding of the Senate that it was before the body; but as the Chair has decided otherwise, I hope it will be taken up and disposed of.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope there will be no debate on the ten million bill. I am not aware that there will be any. I think we can act on it to-day.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. The ten million bill is not under consideration. The Chair will suggest that the question before the Senate is on the motion of the Senator from California, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 411.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will inquire of the Chair what is the special order of the day?

The PRESIDENT. The special order is the bill vetoed by the President of the United States.

Mr. BRIGHT. It has been before the Senate for about four weeks undisposed of.

The PRESIDENT. It comes up at one o'clock, in its order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am as anxious as any Senator to accommodate my friend from California; but I am unwilling to take up any bill in advance of the one returned by the President with his objections. I think we should dispose of that subject, and after that is done, I shall give what influence I have to take up the bill known as the homestead bill. I shall not give preference to any measure that may be introduced here until the veto message is disposed of, and after that the homestead bill; unless there be a pressing necessity for taking up the ten million bill. If there is a pressing necessity for that, I am willing to give way for the purpose of taking it up now. I am anxious to go with the Senator from California on his proposition about which I know he feels deeply anxious. But I cannot consent that that measure, important as it is, which will lead to a lengthy debate without doubt, shall be taken up until the measures which I have indicated are disposed of.

Mr. HUNTER. The ten million bill must be acted upon to-day. I think this is the last of June, when the treaty provides that the ratifications shall be exchanged. This is, therefore, the last day on which the ratifications can be exchanged.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move to dispense with all prior orders, for the purpose of taking up that bill. The PRESIDENT. Another motion being pending, that is not in order.

Mr. BRIGHT. I shall make it when it is in order.

Mr. SHIELDS. I do not understand that to-day is the last day of June.

Several Senators. To-morrow is.

Mr. HUNTER. I thought it was; but to-morrow is. To-morrow is private bill day, when a single objection will prevent the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would state to the honorable Senator from Virginia that I shall ask for an Executive session before any action be had upon the ten million bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that that Executive session will not take long. I understand the object, I believe.

Mr. SHIELDS. Certainly it will not take long, so far as I am concerned. I never occupy the attention of the Senate, on anything, unless I have some views to express upon the question, and then I occupy no further time than is necessary.

The question being taken, Mr. GWIN's motion was not agreed to.

FUGITIVE SLAVE LAW.

Mr. SUMNER. I have a memorial from citizens of Pepperell, a county town of Massachusetts, the town which was honored by being the home of Prescott, who commanded at Bunker Hill. This memorial prays for the repeal of the fugitive slave act, stating that the remonstrants have no faith in past or future compromises, such measures having no binding effect on politicians of the present day; and that the said law is an insult to humanity and destructive of the cardinal principles of liberty. The remonstrance is forwarded to me by the gentleman who heads it, and who in his letter states to me that he is a Hunker Democrat of the olden time. I present it, and ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT. It will be so referred unless objected to.

Mr. ADAMS. It being disrespectful, I move that it lie upon the table.

Mr. SUMNER. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SHIELDS. Mr. President—

The PRESIDENT. The motion is not a debatable one.

Mr. ADAMS. I withdraw the motion, to get rid of the subject.

The memorial was then referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXECUTIVE SESSION—GADSDEN TREATY.

Mr. SHIELDS. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Executive business. I do that for the purpose of getting at the ten million bill.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe we can get at it sooner in that way. I hope, therefore, the Senate will agree to the motion.

Mr. CASS. Before we do so, I suggest that the ten million bill be read a first and second time.

Mr. SHIELDS. I would state to the honorable Senator that my object in making the motion is to get at the bill.

Mr. CASS. The bill has to be read three times, and one Senator may object to its being read more than once on the same day. I hope it will be read now.

Several SENATORS. This is not a question for debate.

Mr. SHIELDS's motion was agreed to.

The Senate accordingly proceeded to the consideration of Executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

BRITISH-AMERICAN RECIPROCITY.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if compatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate all correspondence between the Department of State and the British Minister resident near this Government, in the years 1849 and 1850, relative to the reciprocal interchange of the productions of the United States and the British North American Possessions, the fisheries, and the free navigation of the St. Lawrence and Rideau canals.

THE GADSDEN TREATY.

The bill from the House of Representatives to enable the President of the United States to fulfill the third article of the treaty between the United States and Mexico, ratified on the 30th of December, 1853, as amended by the Senate of the United States, was read a first and second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $10,000,000 for the purpose specified, $7,000,000 to be paid on the exchange of the ratification of the treaty, and the remaining $3,000,000 as soon as the boundary line shall be marked, surveyed, and established.

No amendment being proposed, the bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to a third reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. SEWARD. On that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Allen, Atchison, Badger, Bayard, Bright, Brodhead, Brown, Cass, Clay, Clayton, Dodge of Iowa, Douglas, Evans, Fish, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, James, Johnson, Jones of Iowa, Jones of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Norris, Pettit, Rusk, Sebastian, Sliedell, Toucey, Weller, and Williams—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Chase, Fessenden, Gillette, Seward, Sumner, and Wade—6.

So the bill was passed.

MAIL LINE BETWEEN SAN FRANCISCO AND SHANGHAI.

Mr. GWIN. Mr. President, I ask the Senate now to take up the bill which was put aside this morning for the purpose of acting on the bill which has just been disposed of. I move to take up the bill "to establish a line of steam mailships between San Francisco, in California, and Shanghai, in China, touching at the Sandwich Islands and Japan." I hope the bill will be disposed of.

Mr. BRODHEAD. I hope we shall proceed to the consideration of the order of the day, which is the bill for the relief of the indigent insane, which was vetoed by the President of the United States.

Mr. GWIN. The bill which I propose to call up, was put aside this morning for the purpose of taking up the bill which has just been passed. I move that we proceed to the consideration of the bill which I have named.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Postmaster General to enter into a contract for a term not exceeding five years, for a sum not exceeding $500,000, with such person or persons, being the lowest bidders, offering sufficient and satisfactory security, after due public notice, for the transportation of the United States mails, upon the best terms for the United States, monthly, from San Francisco, via the Sandwich Islands and Japan, in case any port in that empire shall be opened to the United States, to Shanghai, in China, and back, in steam vessels of not less than two thousand tons burden, of the best form of construction adapted to the navigation of the Pacific ocean; the same to be ready as early as practicable, and any excess of the moneys so to be paid over the amount of postages collected, is to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I rose this morning when that question came up before, upon the understanding that the bill was then under the consideration of the Senate, and I addressed the Senate upon it. It turned out, however, that, by some misunderstanding, the question was not before the Senate. Nevertheless, I concluded what I had to say upon the subject, and therefore I leave it in the hands of the Senate.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, being a member of the committee who reported this bill, and differing, as I do, from the committee in opinion, I would, under different circumstances, state at some length my objections to the bill. As it is desirable, however, that a vote should be taken this evening, I will not consume the time of the Senate in discussing it. I now wish to say that I am differently circumstanced from the champion of this bill—I mean the gentleman who addressed the Senate to-day on the subject—the Senator who reported the bill, [Mr. SEWARD.] He was the leader and the champion for the additional compensation to the Collins line of steamers, and now he quotes that as a precedent for the passage of this bill. First, he voted for that proposition, and then he quotes that as authority. I voted against that proposition on the same grounds that I shall vote against this.

I have an additional reason, sir. We have no direct mail from Mobile, a point of large commerce to a large portion of the State in which I live, or, at least, no more than a horse mail, once a week. Yet at that point there is a very large commerce, both of exports and imports. The embarrassments of the Post Office Department are so very great, that we cannot have a tri-weekly mail there, although there is a railroad extending one hundred miles of the distance. Senators can vote $500,000 now for a mail line between San Francisco and Shanghai, but the people I have the honor to represent are suffering from the want of mail facilities. This being so, by voting for this proposition, I should be doing what I consider to be improper.

In addition to this, I believe that the commerce of the country ought to justify the establishment of the line of steamers without the aid of the Federal Government, to the amount of half a million a year, to establish that commerce. It is an invidious distinction in favor of large commercial cities, to the detriment of the inland towns. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. President, I presume that, upon a subject of this kind, involving great principles and the appropriation of a large amount of money, every Senator must have come to a definite conclusion. Probably nothing which I may say can change a single vote. I will not embarrass, by any lengthy remarks, the passage of the bill, for I told my friend from California that I would throw no obstacles in the way of taking it up. I must say, however, that in many parts of my own State, and some in which the Government is very much interested indeed, we have mail facilities but twenty times a year. In others we have a tri-weekly mail; in others a semi-weekly, and in others again a weekly mail; and the utmost efforts of the delegation from the State of Florida, with the Post Office Department, have been impossible to improve the condition of things arising out of the embarrassment, and yet here is a proposition to appropriate $500,000 a year for foreign mail facilities, upon reasons insufficient, as far as I have heard them. I simply content myself with making these remarks.

Mr. RUSK. By the reading of the bill it will be seen, that of the $500,000, the excess over and above what is received from the actual postages, is to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States. It does not come as a charge upon the Post Office Department at all; so that the argument drawn from any want of mail facilities inside of the United States, has no sort of effect upon the bill. It is unnecessary to go into a discussion of the measure; it is vastly important. We have already incurred an expenditure of more than that sum for the purpose of opening Japan to the trade of the United States. This proposes to carry that out. It is a matter all-important, in my judgment, to the commerce of the Pacific ocean. It is so regarded all over the commercial world. It is very important to us that we should keep postal facilities, and I see no better manner of doing so than by the establishment of a line of mail steamers.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not propose to discuss this matter at length; but having been a member of the committee which reported the bill, I desire to state in a very few words the reasons which brought me to a conclusion favorable to it. The Senator from Texas has already stated to the Senate that it imposes no burdens upon the Post Office Department if there shall be a deficit for the service. It therefore proposes no diminution of mail service in the limits of the United States. I have voted, myself, I think, in no case, with perhaps but one exception, for any of the mail steamers which are in existence; but regarding this as opening a commercial intercourse which will perhaps be more beneficial to the United States than any other measure presented to us for our consideration—not only to the Pacific, but to the Atlantic States—I could not withhold from it a favorable vote. The amount thus appropriated is limited; and I cannot doubt that within a very short period of time the receipts of the service will fully discharge the expense. But even if it be not so, I ask Senators if they are not willing to open commercial relations with that country, with India, with Japan, and with the islands of the Pacific? If they are not willing to appropriate even the small sum incidental for postal arrangements which shall produce these results? These are the reasons which mainly controlled me; and I have deemed them sufficient to lead me to give the bill my support. For these reasons, I shall give it my cordial support now. I will also add that the contract is to be given to the lowest bidder.

Mr. GWIN. I merely wish to say that the Pacific railroad, and a telegraphic line between the Atlantic and Pacific are of more importance to the State which I represent than all the questions that will be brought before the Congress of the United States for a thousand years; I therefore look upon it as vital to the interests of that country that it should pass.

Mr. MASON. I think the original policy of our Government was to make the Post Office sustain itself; and I am not aware that, until very recently, the Government has thought it necessary to impose a tax upon the people for the purpose of carrying the mails, either at home or abroad; but, somehow or other, the legislative department of the Government, at least, has become more inclined to make these mail arrangements for our foreign correspondence at the cost of the Treasury, when it would not give mail facilities to the people at home by an appropriation from the Treasury. The honorable Senator from Florida has given the experience of his State, and I doubt not the experience of the Senator from Texas would be greater. There are many parts of Texas where our people are, where they cannot hear from the Atlantic States—from home—where they cannot conduct their business for the want of mail facilities; and he would be a bold man who would ask for an appropriation from the Treasury to carry on a mail communication at home. I was one of those who thought it wise on the part of this Government to send an expedition to Japan, for opening a new avenue of commerce, but I certainly never dreamed that the consequence of it would be that we should be asked for an appropriation from the Treasury of $500,000 a year to promote a correspondence, either with Japan or China. I do not know what may be the pleasure of the Senate, but I should be very desirous to record my
